The tableaux of the corridors of this court are of great interest. The lower register consists chiefly of battle-scenes; the upper registers are chiefly a series of representations of the ceremonies upon the dedication of this palace temple of Rameses. The western portion of the building was till recently completely buried in Coptic ruins. Much labor has been expended with but little result beyond broken columns, empty chambers, religious inscriptions of no special interest, and about a thousand mutilated statues of Osiris.

Among the historical tableaux on the extreme north wall of the temple are these:

1. Departure of the king and his army.
2. Grand victory with fearful carnage.
3. Prisoners brought to the king by his generals.
4. The king haranguing his generals.
5. Troops defiling to renew the war.
6. Victory, heaps of slain. The camp surprised, Women and children in flight.
7. March through a country infested by lions. One slain and another wounded by the king.
8. The only known Egyptian representation of a naval combat.
9. Halt on the march towards Egypt. Hands of the slain counted. Prisoners defiled. The king harangues the generals.
10. Return to Thebes, and thanksgiving to the gods.

The whole edifice was evidently designed as a lasting monument of the life and achievements of Rameses III. It has been called his autobiography in stone. All available genius and skill were enlisted for the perpetuation of one idea—and that idea was Rameses III. The ruins of two small temples are in the vicinity of this, but they require not much notice.

RUINS AT LUXOR.

After returning to the east side of the river we look over the ruins within the village of Luxor, where courts, and columns, and statues, and ruins are mingled in much confusion. One lonely obelisk stands erect, its companion having been removed to the Place de la Concorde at Paris, and near it are two mammoth statues, the lower parts of which are covered with earth. The front of the temple facing the river has a colonnade of massive columns, which give it an imposing appearance. It was built in the eighteenth dynasty, in the reign of Amunoph III., 1600 B.C. The colonnade facing the river is said to have been added in the reign of King Horus (1480 B.C.), whilst the great court, with two obelisks, the colossal statues, and the propylon were added by Rameses II. In the interior the names Tirhakeh and Psammiti-Chus and Alexander are inscribed as having additionally adorned the fabric. This temple, however, by no means equals in interest several others of the more elaborate temples in this vicinity.

We looked through the town and visited the market, which is a large open square where people from the rural districts bring their produce and offer it for sale, where it lies upon the ground, purchasers passing around among the same. Here, too, almost everything is on sale that the wants of this primitive people require. It was a busy scene, and afforded one a good opportunity to study the manners and customs of the inhabitants of the country. They are not very tidily dressed, nor have they a surplus of wearing apparel. The climate does not require much, and they do not deem it worth while to use more than is necessary. The mercury stands at 72° during the middle part of the day and settles to 45° at night, the change between the two extremes being quite enough for comfort.

THE TEMPLES AT KARNAC.

December 22d.—Karnac is about three miles below Luxor, and the road lies over a grassy plain, sprinkled with the remains of the ancient city of Thebes. The journey was made upon donkeys, and we found it a pleasant ride in the early part of the day before the rays of the sun poured down directly upon us. The grass, the young wheat and lentils, the scattering palms, with the accacia and other growths, enliven the way and make up somewhat for the dustiness of the road.

At the end of an hour we had reached the grandest ruins of ancient Egypt. The towering propylons, walls, and portals were seen when still at a distance, and we passed for nearly half a mile through an avenue of sphinxes, though in a broken and mutilated condition. It is said that this avenue of sphinxes originally reached for two miles, nearly to where Luxor now stands. They are neatly cut of stone, perhaps ten or twelve feet in length, with the body of a lion or other animal gracefully resting upon the ground, and with the head and breast of a woman. The rows of these, one on each side of the avenue and facing each other, are about thirty or forty feet apart, and about eight feet apart in the rows. It must have been a grand sight in the palmy days of Thebes to ride down this avenue between the hundreds of these statues and gaze upon the magnificent temple then in its glory and grandeur. We passed around the smaller temple, leaving it on our right, and approached the grand temple from the west, where is another avenue of sphinxes which once continued to the Nile, nearly a mile distant. A glorious portal with high, massive walls on either side, one reaching to a hight of one hundred and forty feet, stood before us. Up this square perpendicular wall several Arab boys were climbing more than half way to the top by placing their hands and feet in the joints between the square blocks of stone; it seemed marvelous how they could retain their position and not fall to the ground; but they are nearly as active as squirrels, and for "backsheesh" repeatedly make this hazardous ascent.

Passing into the grand court surrounded by massive walls, the court being nearly two hundred feet square, we passed up to where the two colossal statues once guarded the entrance to the temple, but which are now badly broken with but parts of the polished granite remaining, and before us opened up the grandest sight I ever saw. Here was the grand temple with a perfect forest of the most magnificent columns, thirty-six feet in circumference, covered with hieroglyphics, towering up to a hight of sixty-six feet above the base, or at least the center rows, surmounted by spreading capitals in imitation of the lotus flower; the outer rows have different capitals, but all look extremely rich and massive. When one enters in the midst of this gigantic wilderness of columns he is inevitably overwhelmed with their numbers, magnificence, and grandeur, and, almost appalled in bewilderment, he asks, Did the hands of men do all this? There are one hundred and thirty-four of these enormous columns, and the amount of labor necessary to cut them and inscribe them as they are from bottom to top with thousands of well-cut hieroglyphics, cartouches, and symbols, and place them where they are, with the massive stone roof, composed of huge well-cut blocks twenty feet in length, is wonderful to contemplate. This magnificent temple is a mile and three quarters in circumference, with walls eighty feet high and said to be twenty-five feet thick.

The first propylon is 370 feet in breadth, one of the towers 140 feet high, from the top of which a magnificent view of the country is obtained. This temple is thought to have been constructed by Amunoph III; the most ancient cartouches are said to be of Sethi I. (1450 B. C.). Originally the great hall was completely roofed in—daylight only coming in by the grilled windows, of which traces are still visible—thus the light must have been of the dim religious kind, so common to temples, cathedrals and mosques. It doubtless, in this case, had the result of softening the general effect of massive columns and walls.

Proceeding through the main hall, another propylon is passed through, and a narrow court, running across the building, is entered; here are standing two obelisks—one said to be the largest ever made, 8 feet square and 92 feet high—while the broken pieces of two others are lying upon the ground; these are of red granite, and were brought a distance of two hundred miles. On them the names of Thothmes I. and Rameses II. are inscribed. This court is surrounded by Osiride pillars or statues—in commemoration of the favorite god Osiris—but these are badly broken, partly by an earthquake and partly by the vandalism of Cambyses and his army. The larger obelisk is of the celebrated Queen Regent Hatasou, who played an important part in the history of the 18th dynasty. It was surmounted by a pyramid of gold, and had corner pieces of gold coming down to the pedestal. It is said but seven months were required to take this monolith from the quarry, cut and carve it, transport it here, and place it where it stands. There were great mechanics and engineers in those days.

Beyond this court, passing east, are the ruined sanctuary and various other chambers, the columns of Osirtasen I., of 3064 B. C., marking the oldest portions of the edifice, and among the oldest ruins of Egypt. Here are also the columnar hall of Thothmes III., the hall of the ancestors, and several other chambers and ruins. I will not weary you by entering into details. Another propylon is on the eastern part of the grounds, another on the north, and still another on the south; the western one is where we entered. The whole is most grand and extensive, surpassing my ability to describe.

The lofty and massive walls of the temple are covered inside and out with bas-relief inscriptions and representations. I will merely mention some of them. On the north wall are the most valuable records of the reign of Sethi in existence. They represent the wars and campaigns of that monarch against the Assyrians, the Armenians, and the desert tribes. In one extraordinary symbolical scene, the king seizes his enemies by the hair of the head, and proceeds to immolate them before the god of Thebes. On the south wall are elaborate representations commemorating the victories of Shishak. On a projecting wall, toward the east, inscribed in hieroglyphics, is the famous poem, describing a feat of arms by Rameses II. in his wars with the Khetas, handed down to posterity. This is a portion of the address of Rameses to Ammon:

Have I not erected to thee great temples?
Have I not sacrificed to thee thirty thousand oxen?
I have brought from Elephanta obelisks to set up to thy name;
I invoke thee, O Father Ammon; I am in the midst of unknown tribes and alone;
For Ammon is better to me than thousands of archers and millions of horsemen;
Ammon will prevail over the enemy,
Ammon-Ra has been at my right hand and my left in the battles,
His mind has inspired my own, and has repeated the downfall of my enemies,
Ammon-Ra, my father, has brought the whole world to my feet.

The following are some of the stanzas in which the god Ammon addresses Thothmes:

I am come; to thee have I given to strike down Syrian princes,
Under thy feet they be throughout the breadth of their country;
Like to the Lord of Light I make them for thy glory,
Blinding their eyes with light, O earthly image of Ammon!
I am come; to thee have I given to strike down Asian princes,
Captive now hast thou led the proud Assyrian chieftians.
Decked in royal robes I made them see thy glory,
In glittering arms and fighting, high in thy lofty chariot.
I am come; to thee have I given to strike down the Western nations,
Cyprus and the Ases have both heard thy name with terror;
Like a strong-horned bull I made them see thy glory,
Strong, with piercing horns, so that none can stand before thee.
I am come; to thee have I given to strike down the Libyan archers,
All the isles of the Greeks submit to the force of thy spirit;
Like a royal lion I made them see thy glory,
Couched by the corpse he has made down in the rocky valley.
I am come; to thee have I given to strike down the ends of the ocean;
In the grasp of thy hand is the circling zone of the waters;
Like the soaring of an eagle have I made them see thy glory,
Whose far-seeing eye there is none can hope to escape from.

A description of all that is on the walls and pillars of this temple would fill a volume, but I will have to pass them by. I will remark, however, that here, as well as in all the other Egyptians temples I have visited, among the symbols and hieroglyphics I see very often the sistrum represented, embracing a combination of the male and female organs of generation. This was used by the Egyptians to represent the power and source of life, creative energy, etc. This symbol is seen in the hands of goddesses and female figures, often in the act of presenting it to a king and favorite. I have seen this symbol here thousands of times. It is a combination of an oval, or ellipse, and a cross.

The great annoyance of visiting the ruins of these temples are the Arab antiquity venders and beggars. When you are absorbed with the grandeur of some wall or column, or when studying a statute or admiring a splendid colonnade, half a dozen of these pests will surround you and importune you to buy their antiquities, or to give them backsheesh, and there is no getting rid of them. If you say no to their antiquities, they will twenty times say, "antique," "good," "cartouche," "very cheap," etc., etc. It is impossible to drive them away. If you succeed by a loud voice and cross visage to repel them, in a minute they will be back again, saying a hundred times, "antique," "cartouche," "very good," "cheap," "you buy?" etc. I did invest in a dozen or so of scarabees, a representation of the Egyptian beetle, which was regarded as a sacred insect, and in some way represents some deity. These were formerly cut in precious stones, like coral, cornelian, and a rare black stone from the Red Sea. These were used as charms, and were often deposited with the mummies in the tombs. A cartouche of the king and other symbols are engraved upon them. These Arab swindlers would have us believe that those they offered us were really "antique," but we were not deceived, being well apprised that they are of modern manufacture. They are made of composition, pressed in a mold and colored. As they are made a correct copy of the ancient, I decided they would answer for me, and took a dozen at a cheap price.

I also invested in a stone figure of a mummy and the hand of a mummy, or what looks to be one. It is a small hand, and I fancied it might be the delicate hand of some beautiful Egyptian princess, who tripped gaily over these plains three thousand years ago; but I fear these Arabs have swindled me, and that the hand is a bogus one, made to imitate the genuine article, and wound with stained bandages to imitate a mummy's hand. I shall hardly investigate the true inwardness of that hand before I return home, and will try to be happy under the delusion that I have the hand of an Egyptian princess of "ye olden time." I purchased before I had seen many, and have since had nearly a hundred hands and feet of the ancient dead offered me, and that is what makes me think I have a counterfeit hand of a princess; but as I paid but a franc for it I am not swindled to a fearful extent.

There are many blind people and cripples here, who appeal directly to your pity. Vigorous young people in apparent good health do not work upon my sympathy to an alarming extent. Some of these irrepressible beggars endeavor to work up my pity to a donating point by telling me that they have neither father or mother. I often tell them that I sympathize with them, for I am in the same unhappy situation, and that therefore they will have to excuse me.

Before returning to Luxor we looked through the smaller temple, dedicated to Osiris, and found the walls and columns thoroughly inscribed, the representations referring to the after world and the judgment of the dead; but it is hardly worth while to discribe its chambers, apartments, and columns.

Reaching the hotel, we settled with our guide, Josef Hassan, who had paid our bills for the three days and found the amount to stand thus:

1st day, 7 donkeys,	francs	14
Guide,	"	5
Boy to carry luncheon,	"	2
Guard of the temple,	"	1
Crossing Nile twice,	"	16
Crossing second stream by ferry,	"	3
To men, carrying to boat,	"	1
Backsheesh to donkey-boys	"	3½
" to water-bearer girls	"	3
Total 1st day francs		48½
2d day, one person less	"	45
3d half day	"	14½
Total for 3 days, francs		108

We have now completed the examination of the temples, tombs, and statues in this part of Egypt, and it seems fitting here to quote the lines of Gerald Massey, which preceded his large two volume quarto work of 1,200 pages, on Egypt, called "The Book of the Beginnings," just published:

Egypt, how I have dwelt with you in dreams,
So long, so intimately, that it seems
As if you had borne me; though I could not know,
It was so many thousand years ago!
And in my gropings darkly underground,
The long-lost memory at last is found
Of Motherhood—you Mother of us all!
And to my fellow-men I must recall
The memory too; that common motherhood
May help to heal the common Brotherhood.
Egypt! It lies there in the far-off past,
Opening with depths profound and growths as vast
As the great valley of the Yosemite.
The birth-place out of darkness into day;
The Shaping Matrix of the human mind,
The Cradle and the Nursery of our kind.
This was the land created from the flood,
The land of Atum, made of the red mud,
Where Num sat in his Teba throned on high,
And saw the deluge once a year go by!
Each brimming with the blessing that it brought,
And by that water-way in Egypt's thought,
The gods descended; but they never hurled
The deluge that should desolate the world.
There the vast hewers of the earthly time,
Built, as if that way they would surely climb
The heavens, and left their labors without name—
Colossal as their carelessness of fame—
Sole likeness of themselves—that heavenward
Forever looks with statuesque regard,
As if some vision of the Eternal, grown
Petrific, was forever fixed in stone!
They watched the moon re-orb, the stars go round,
And drew the circle. Thoughts primordial bound.
The heavens looked into them with living eyes
To kindle starry thoughts in other skies.
For us reflected in the image-scroll,
That night by night the stars for aye unroll.
The royal heads of language bow them down
And lay in Egypt's lap each borrowed crown.
The glory of Greece was but the after-glow
Of her forgotten greatness lying low;
Her hieroglyphics buried dark as night,
Or coal deposits filled with future light,

Are mines of meaning; by their light we see
Through many an overshadowed mystery.
The nursing Nile is living Egypt still,
And as her lowlands with its freshness fill,
And heave with double-breasted bounteousness;
So doth the old hidden source of mind yet bless
The nations; secretly she brought to birth,
And Egypt still enriches all the earth.

Massey, in his new work, takes the ground that Egypt has an older civilization than any other part of the globe, India included, and that from her narrow valley, the language, the literature and science of the world were evolved. He speaks thus:

"Egypt, and not India, is the common cradle of all we have in common, east, west, north, and south, all around the world. The language, beliefs, rites, laws, and customs went out to India, but did not return thence by means of the apocryphal Aryan migrations. The Indian affinity with our Egyptian folk-lore and fairyology is neither first nor final; 'tis but the affinity of a collateral relationship. Egypt supplied the parent source, the inventive mind, the propagating migratory power. In Egypt alone we shall find the roots of the vast tree, whose boughs and branches had extended to a world-wide reach"

There is of course considerable difference of opinion as to which is the older civilization, that of Egypt or India, and whether Egypt was settled by emigrants from India or Central Asia; or whether her ancient races had their origin upon her own soil. This question perhaps can never be positively settled; but this part remains true: while Egypt presents irrefutable proof that they had civilization, literature, cities, and a large population longer ago than the period set for Noah's flood, when all the inhabitants of the earth are said to have been drowned like a parcel of rats; that thousands of years, and perhaps tens of thousands of years, must have been required for man to have emerged from his primitive condition to that elevated plane of civilization and intellectual development which he exhibited five, six and seven thousand years ago, both in Egypt and India, we need not contend as to which had precedence in the existence and the intellectual development of the human race, for both countries present most incontrovertible proofs that they possessed a prolific population long prior to the period claimed by the Hebrew scriptures, and necessarily ten or twenty thousand years ago. When the first specimens of the genus homo made their appearance, can never be positively decided, but that man has lived on the earth twenty-five, fifty, and even a hundred thousand years ago, there are many reasons for believing.

A FANTASY.

At the dinner table at the hotel an invitation was extended to our party from the native acting as United States consul to attend a "fantasy" at his house in the evening to witness some dancing by native girls. We, of course, could do no less than accept. We had been a long time without amusements, and we especially wished to witness something of the kind peculiar to the country. I was misinformed as to the hour of beginning, so that when our guide Josef called to escort me to the consul's residence the performance was already under way. I found that a company of thirty or forty persons had assembled there, half of them being Europeans and Americans, some of whom had been on an excursion steamer on a tour farther up the Nile, and were on their return. Among them were three or four ladies. I found some eight or ten girls in the loose dress of the country were sitting on the floor in the corner of a large room, and a portion of them were playing on some kind of native musical instruments, one of which sounds somewhat like a muffled violin with one or two strings. The music would hardly pass for first-class in Vienna, Paris, or London.

After a while, two of the girls, with marked agility, sprang to their feet—the players still continuing their music—and commenced a kind of walking dance, moving from one end of the room to the other. They whirled slowly by throwing one foot and leg far around the other, keeping a constant turning without the body rising and falling in the turn. Their movements were even and regular, and the rustling of their high-colored silk robes lent richness to the exhibition.

After this gyrating had been continued for ten minutes, they halted, standing some distance from each other, and throwing their bodies partially back they worked their abdomens in a way not easy to describe, and which appeared not of a very modest character. In making this sort of motion they seemed to be able to work a set of muscles not often seen in operation. While holding the upper part of the body and the feet quite still, the abdomen was brought up in a decided manner, and with such emphasis as would seem to cause pain, and this was continued for some time. I hardly knew what to make of this performance. I had heard of amorous dances, exhibiting "love throes," and all that, but as we were in a gentleman's house, and ladies were invited to be present, I could hardly believe this dancing was of that variety; but the character was too strongly marked to admit of much doubt; there could be but one signification.

This feature of the dance was supplemented by one of the girls placing on her head a tall black bottle, like an ale bottle, with a lighted candle in the mouth of it, the bottle serving as a candle-stick. She then repeated much that she had done before, particularly the working of the abdominal or posterior muscles in the way indicated, holding her head so still, though thrown back, that the bottle retained its position. Then she sat upon the floor and rose to her feet repeatedly without the bottle and the candle being disturbed. In doing this she showed great flexibility of the joints, and was able to sit down and rise up at a single motion, and without using her hands, in a far easier manner than I could do myself. Next, after sitting down for the half-dozenth time, she let her body go back to the floor, keeping her head so elevated, however, that the bottle did not move, and the candle continued its burning. This she repeated some three times, and then commenced rolling over and over, the bottle and candle all the time not moving in the slightest. It will be seen that she necessarily must have held her head very still. She rolled two or three times slowly across the floor—a distance of fifteen feet each way—the bottle in the mean time remaining, to all appearance, as fixed as though it had been sitting on the table.

Though this was a new feature in amusements to the Europeans and Americans, it soon lost its charm, and the English ladies present seemed anything but pleased with it. They arose while this performance was still progressing, and left, evidently thinking it was not the proper kind of exhibition they should witness. The men also seemed to think it was improper for them to remain when the ladies could not, and as soon as the act had closed we rose, two or three at a time, and took our departure, realizing that Luxor has a species of amusement that New York has not, and unconscious what we might have seen had we remained longer. I learned that before men only the same dance is sometimes performed in a state of nudity, and I was at a loss to know why the consul had invited us to such a fantasy. An impression has crept over me that all the young ladies of Egypt are not quite as modest as they might be.

One of the persons on the excursion Nile steamer is a Mr. Blake, of the firm of Blake Brothers, Boston. He took dinner with us once at the hotel, and we got somewhat acquainted with him. He is also on a tour around the world.

We have here, as everywhere else for the past eight weeks, chicken for dinner every day. The Frenchman, Monsieur Lefebre, of our party, has made some funny remarks upon our chicken diet. He says when he returns to Paris he will have been absent ninety days, and in that time has eaten one hundred and eighty chickens. He says he will not wish to see a chicken for three years.

A BIRTHDAY BATH.

December 23d.—This is my birthday, and I spent a portion of it at writing my letters to you, to let you know what I am seeing in this far-off part of the world. In the afternoon, as the sun was pouring down brightly like that of June, I thought I would celebrate the day by taking a bath in the Nile. You see, I had never bathed in the Nile on my birthday, and never before been sixty-three years of age. Perhaps I ought to do something unusual on such an occasion as this, and possibly, too, it is my duty to bathe in all the "holy rivers" I meet on my journey around the world. So with these pious thoughts running through my mind, I walked up by the side of the river for nearly a mile, soap and towel in hand, looking for a place where I could safely descend to the water; but not having altogether forgotten my swim in the holy Jordan, and remembering there are still crocodiles in the Nile, I must confess that I viewed with some degree of apprehension the surging, boiling current, making whirlpools as it rushed along, giving proof that the banks were not only very steep and high—quite perpendicular—but that the stream was very deep. I also fancied that the naked farmers working in the fields cast unfriendly eyes at me, and I knew not but that if I should lay my garments off, though they needed them not, they might appropriate them or do me other injury. I cast my eyes over to the west side of the river, and there saw the shore low and gradual, with the appearance of a moderate current. But it was quite a job to get over there, and, whatever my final destiny is to be, I do not quite relish the idea of being chewed up by a crocodile; not but that my meat would taste as sweet to his holiness as that of a Christian, but I cannot someway divest myself of the idea that an unpleasant sensation would for a moment run over a person when he feels the jaws of a crocodile closing upon him. I think I prefer to die of old age. So, with all these thoughts running through my mind, I sort of compromised with myself with regard to the bathing enterprise, and returned down near the steamboat landing, where the bank has been graded down. Here I took off but part of my clothing and took a partial bath. The water, however, recently from the mountain springs of Central Africa, was not as warm as were the waters of the Dead Sea and the river Jordan. This, too, may be the last time I will bathe in any river on my birthday.

THE TEMPLE OF DENDERAH.

On the evening of the 23d, our steamer having returned from Assouan, we were ready to embark on her for Cairo. We would, at least a part of us, have been glad to ascend as high as the first cataract, were it convenient, visiting on our way the ruins of the temple at Esneh, the Speos at Gebel-Silsileh, of some of the bas-reliefs on the walls of which Mariette-Bey speaks as follows: "The work dates the eighteenth dynasty, but was made use of later on by many personages who have left here valuable records of their passage. Our limits will not allow of our attempting to describe all that is interesting in this Speos. We will only refer to the two pictures which are sculptured side by side in the southwest angle. The one on the southern wall represents a goddess nourishing King Horus, still an infant, with her divine milk. . . . This picture is marked by a placid sweetness of expression which excites at once wonder and admiration. Close by, on the western wall, is the other picture, well known under the title of the Triumph of Horus. The king is seated on his throne, borne by twelve officers of his army [why not twelve apostles?]; two other warriors hold over his head a long-handled flabellum."

Here we have the picture of the virgin goddess Isis, nursing the divine son of God Horus, which was executed in stone more than fifteen hundred years before the dawn of Christianity in the world. Cannot even an obtuse mind see here one of the sources whence the Christian fathers borrowed the idea of the birth of a son of God, and his being brought up on divine virgin's milk? It certainly was no difficult task of Irenæus and others in the latter part of the second century to borrow this idea from Egypt and incorporate it into the story of their Jesus. One thing should never be forgotten, that Paul, who was not only the oldest writer of the New Testament, but also the principal founder of Christianity, never had anything to say about Jesus having been begotten by a god, not a word about his having a virgin for a mother, or about his being reared upon virgin's milk? All that was a conception of the second century, and was not made part of the gospel story till the year 181, when the fathers realized the importance of investing their new-fangled god with divine attributes, a divine parentage, and a divine virgin for mother, and they only had to go to India and to Egypt to find the plan for their new story. Peter and Paul never had a word of the kind to say, and the four narratives were wholly unknown till Bishop Irenæus brought them into notice, and gave his very foolish reasons why there should be four gospels and no more. It was not a difficult thing for Irenæus to have heard of the Egyptian trinity, Osiris, Isis, and Horus.

I, at least, would also have been pleased to go up to the first cataract and visit the ruins of the temple at Philæ, 660 miles from the Mediterranean, erected by Nectanebo II. and others after him, but we have seen the greatest and best of the Egyptian temples, and perhaps I am just as well satisfied as though, at greatly increased expense, I searched out every pillar, every wall, and every inscribed stone. Mariette-Bey, in describing the island on which the temple of Philæ is situated, says: "There still lived (A.D. 453) in the 'Holy Island' priestly families who continued to celebrate the time-honored mysteries of Osiris and Isis." No fact in history is better substantiated than the myth of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, the Egyptian trinity, and there was nothing easier than for the early fathers to know of it and borrow the idea. This is far more probable than that Yahweh, of the Jews, in getting up a new religion, a new plan of salvation for the miserable wretches he had created, was under the necessity of pilfering from the pagan mythologies of Egypt, India, and other countries to get up his plan by. A great deal in this world which men have done has been, in after centuries, credited to the gods, and particularly to the Hebrew god.

Before leaving Luxor we telegraphed to Keneh for donkeys to be ready for us upon the arrival of the steamer, the following morning. We had a pleasant ride of forty miles to Keneh, although we did not leave Luxor till morning. We find the current makes not a little difference in the speed. We can travel twice as fast in coming down stream as in ascending against the current. We arrived at Keneh at about 10:30 on the 24th. The temples of Denderah are on the west side of the river, some five or six miles from the landing, in a northwest direction. A row-boat belonging to the steamer took us from the steamer to the west bank, and waited for us till we returned from the temples. The donkeys and donkey-boys were in waiting for us on the bank of the river, but deeming it safer to make the bargain before our ride, we ventured to ask the price of the donkeys, and learned they wanted the modest sum of five francs each. This nearly threw us from our equilibrium. Having hired donkeys at Luxor at two francs a day, we very naturally objected to paying five francs for three hours. In fact we remonstrated stoutly, by shaking our heads resolutely, saying "No! no!" in a very emphatic manner, "No five francs for donkey," "We will walk first." There is nothing better than determination in carrying measures. It was successful in this case. The price of donkeys fell very suddenly. They undertook to

"bull" the market and we wouldn't "bear" it. When the price dropped to two francs per donkey we "closed," and soon were on our way to Denderah, the donkey-boys, as in all other instances, following close at our heels, whipping and talking Arab. This little village opposite Keneh is a great place for manufacturing the earthen jugs and pitchers used everywhere in this country. The factories are a little back from town, and we saw numerous camels loaded with these jugs and pitchers, strung across their backs in crates and large nets made of ropes. The walls of the houses in the village, and the walls between them, are built up of broken jugs laid up with mud.

The ride back to the Libyan mountain, near which the temples are located, was a pleasant one, luxurious fields of wheat, corn, sugar-cane, clover, lentils, and vetches being spread out beautifully before us. The temple of Denderah is the best preserved temple in Egypt; the roof is still intact, which is not the case with any other temple we have visited. This may be accounted for, because its antiquity is not so great as many of the others. It is also a very important temple, and can be studied with great facility. Like all Egyptian temples, it was built in the center of a vast encircling wall of crude bricks, which was so high and so thick that when the two gates were closed through which admission was obtained nothing could be seen or heard of what was taking place inside. Its foundations were laid under Ptolemy XI., its construction was finished under Tiberius, and its decoration under Nero: thus it was finished at the very beginning of the Christian era.

A long passway, walled up on either side, leads to the front of the temple, and upon descending some twenty steps the front or portico is reached, with its twenty-four massive columns. One is sensibly impressed with the grandeur of the place. This hall has been called the "monumental frontage." Open to the light of day and exposed to all external sounds, it has no direct relationship with the temple proper. The columns are six in a row and four courses deep; they are sixty feet high and twenty-four feet in circumference. They have an ornamental square near the top, with a carved face on each of the four sides of the columns. They are covered profusely with inscriptions.

Two small doors are on the sides, and through them the priests passed through and fro, and here the offerings were brought in, which played a very important part in the service of the temple. Through the large portal the king alone had the right to pass. The king presented himself before it clothed in his long robe, wearing sandals on his feet, and leaning upon his staff. Before he could be allowed to penetrate into the temple it was necessary that the gods should recognize him as king of Upper and Lower Egypt. And this ceremony is delineated in the bas-relief representations on the walls. The king is seen coming out of his palace and presenting himself before the gate of the temple. On the right hand side he is recognized as the king of Lower Egypt, and on the left hand side as the king of Upper Egypt. On his arrival Thoth and Horus pour over his head the emblems of purification. The goddesses Ouat'i and Suvan crown him with the double crown. After this Mont, of Thebes, and Toum, of Heliopolis, take the king by the hand and conduct him into the presence of the goddess Hathor. As the king presents himself he holds in his hands a coffer in which are inclosed ingots of gold, silver, and precious stones. In the interior rooms he is again represented as offering to the divinity necklaces, sistra, head-dresses, enriched with precious stones, mirrors, and scepters. In the other chambers, which are the laboratories of the temple, the king offers the sacred oils, essences, and aromatics, which are there prepared and used for perfuming the temple and anointing the statues of the gods.

In the scene of the purification the king is made clean by the flood of water which Thoth and Horus are pouring over him, in form of a double jet, the emblems of life. After being crowned he advances to enjoy the felicity of contemplating the divine majesty. In return the goddess Hathor promises him "annals written for eternity," which means everlasting glory. It is in this porch or front hall that the king prepared himself for the celebrations in the interior apartments.

The second group comprises ten rooms or chambers, which may be considered the temple proper. Here all is closely shut in, all is solid, smooth stone, but everywhere carved in bas-reliefs; all is somber, all is silent. It is impossible for a person not to be struck with the massiveness of the edifice and the endless profusion of inscriptions and pictures with which the whole place is covered—the walls, the columns, the doors, the ceilings, the passages, the staircases, the windows, and every place. The composition of these pictures is much the same. The king presents himself before one of the deities of the temple and recites a prayer; he solicits a favor, which is always granted; this is the great subject portrayed.

The question which arises in the mind of the visitor is, What could have have been the purpose of so many rooms? I will endeavor to answer this question, drawing largely from Mariette-Bey. It was in this group of ten chambers that the priests assembled, and where the preparations for the fetes were carried on. A sort of calendar engraved on the first of these chambers tells what was the nature of these fetes. They consisted mostly in processions, which went round the temple, ascended the terraces, and descended again in order to encompass the circling wall according to the prescribed rites. It was from this first hall that processions started. The other chambers served for the preparation of offerings destined to figure in the ceremonies, and as a place where the sacred emblems, carried in state during the processions, were deposited and carefully preserved. The halls 2 and 3 were annexes to hall 1 and contained altars before which certain prayers were recited as the procession passed. In hall 4 were kept four barks which played a conspicuous part in the processions. When not in use these barks were placed upon large chests, and when required for the uses of the temple staves or poles of wood were adjusted into them, by the means of which they were carried about. In the center of each of these barks was a small edifice always securely closed, wherein lay concealed the mystic emblem of the particular divinity to which the bark was dedicated. By way of additional precaution, a thick white veil was thrown over the structure, which was thus completely hidden from all eyes. This seems to have had about the same amount of secrecy and sancity as the ark described in the Bible, dedicated to Yahwah, and in which he took up his abode. In fact, the Jews had but little religous ceremonies which the Egyptians had not earlier practiced. The chamber 5 is a a laboratory in which were prepared the oils and essences with which the temple and the statues of the gods were to be perfumed. In chamber 6 were collected and consecrated such products of the earth as were to be introduced into the ceremonies. The chambers 7 and 8 served as places of reception, the one for the offerings arriving from Lower Egypt and the other for those from Upper Egypt, and here were also received and consecrated certain offerings of loaves of bread and of libations. The chamber 9 was the treasury of the temple, and this is why each of the pictures with which the walls are lined exhibits the king in the act of consecrating and offering to the divinity Sistra (sexual emblems of life) pictorals, mirrors, utensils of all sorts fashioned with gold and silver and lapis-lazuli. In chamber 10 were deposited the vestments with which they draped the statues of the gods. Coffers scrupulously closed contained these vestments, and each province of Egypt was expected to contribute to the keeping up the sacred stores of this department.

The third group of chambers contain the chapel 11, the court 12, the halls 13, 14, 15, and 16, the two flights of stairs, the one to the north, the other to the south, and lastly the little temple with twelve columns situated on the terraces in what may be termed the second story. The principal fete of the temple—that which is celebrated on the first day of the year, and which has for its object the first appearance of the star Sirius—is of such importance that at Denderah a smaller temple has been dedicated to it, inclosed as it was inside of the larger temple, and it is this smaller one which is composed of the various parts named. Prayers were recited in chapel 14; the various offerings were collected together, as were also the different limbs of the victims slaughtered for the sacrifice. The little chamber 15 was another place of deposit for the many valuable objects which were brought forth in this special fete; in the three chambers 16, 17, and 18, the king consecrated certain offerings. Like the other fetes of the temple, that of the New Year consisted chiefly in processions, the details of which are represented on the walls of both the flights of stairs. The king marches at the head; thirteen priests carrying standard poles crowned with the emblems of the different divinities follow him. Thus constructed, the procession ascended the northern staircase, stopped on the terrace at the hypæthral temple, the twelve columns of which are dedicated each to a particular month of the year, and descended by the southern staircase.

The fourth group of rooms comprises the corridor 19, the chambers 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30. This part of the edifice is more particularly reserved to the myth, and here was to be found the the nucleus of the whole, a niche situated in chamber 26. Here the king alone could penetrate; here, hidden from all eyes, was the mysterious emblem of the temple, a large sistrum of gold (sexual symbol, again, of life and creative power). The chambers themselves were not set apart for any distinct purpose, as were the others, although in them were preserved various objects connected with the religious rites; but they served more especially for the recital of prayers. In chamber 20 it is Isis who is invoked; 21 is consecrated to Osiris. Here Osiris is supposed to be recalled from death to life, which was symbolized in this chamber by changing the vestments that covered the statue of the god; the chamber 22 was sacred to Osiris-Onnophris. Here the god restores youth to his body, imparts fresh vigor to his limbs, and forthwith becomes the vanquisher of his enemies, represented by a crocodile, which the god, armed with a pike, "drives backward." In chamber 23 the work of resurrection is completed, and the god appears under the form of Hor-sam-ta-ui. In chambers 24 and 25 it is Hathor who is worshiped, taken in her attributes of genetrix, out of which the sun daily takes his renewed birth. (Here is another portrayal of the ancient idea of the son of God from a divine virgin) The chamber 26 is the axis of the temple, and the principal divinity is adored under the most comprehensive titles. Lastly, in the chamber 27, 28, 29, and 30 a special worship is paid to Pascht, considered as the fire that vivifies; to Horus, considered as the light which has conquered darkness, and to the terrestrial Hathor.

Such is the temple of Denderah, which, unlike Christian churches, was not a place where the saints met together to unite in prayer. There were in this temple no dwellings for the priests, nor any places for initiation, no traces of oracles or divination; nor is there anything to indicate that with the exception of the king and the priests any person was ever permitted to enter here. The temple was a sacred depository, a place of preparation and consecration. Within its walls certain fetes were celebrated and processions organized, and the sacred vessels carefully stored away. If inside all was dark and somber—and nothing whatever indicates the uses of torches or other artificial lights—that darkness was intended to intensify the mystery of the ceremonies, while at the same time it secured the only mode known of preserving the precious objects and the sacred vestments from the ravages of insects, from flies, from penetrating dust, and from the scorching sun.

As to the principal fetes of which this temple was once the center and the starting-point, they consisted chiefly in processions which were carried on outside in the sunshine, as far as the extreme boundary of the great encircling walls of brick. In short, the temple was not entirely contained within its stone walls, the true limits being rather the outer brick wall. In the temple itself the gods were housed and draped and prepared for the fetes; it was in fact a sort of sacristy where none but the king and priests might enter. But within the outer wall long processions were organized, and if the general public were not admitted it may at least be believed that some of the initiated were privileged to take part in the processions. Mariette-Bey remarks that the numerous Coptic and Arab dwellings which have invaded the whole circumference of the temple, and even within the outer walls, no longer permit a full realization of what this temple might have been when it arose stately and isolated, the center of a vast area, shut in at the four corners of the heaven by high and somber walls of crude brick.

It may be well to explain more at length the pictures in one of the chambers alluded to.

First Picture.—The king offers to the Goddess Hathor the vase which serves in hieroglyphics to designate the word heart. In token of her satisfaction the goddess promises to the king all sorts of happiness and joy.

Second Picture.—Hathor and Horus are standing up at one end of the picture. At the other end the king makes an offering of the two sistra. "Mayest thou be loved by women," replies Hathor, alluding to the sistrum. "Mayest thou find favor with their lords." Horus on his side responds to the offering of the other sistrum: "May Egypt conduct herself as thou wouldst have her. Mayest thou tread under foot all foreign countries."

Third Picture.—The king offers incense and a libation to Osiris-Onnophris and to Isis: "To fill their divine nostriis with the perfumes of incense, and to refresh their hearts with the waters of the renovated Nile." In return Osiris grants the king a favorable inundation, while Isis vouchsafes to him a long dominion over Arabia and the other countries which produce incense.

Fourth Picture.—The king offers two vases full of wine to Hathor and to a god who seems to be Horus. Hathor promises to him those regions which produce the best grapes. Horus promises him wine to satiety.

Fifth Picture.—At the same time he offers her flowers, then addresses himself in the following terms to Hathor: "I bring the bouquets of flowers of all kinds, that thou mayest adorn thy head with their colors." In her answer the goddess promises the king that under his reign the land shall be merry with the most brilliant verdure.

Sixth Picture.—An offering of the hieroglyph, which expresses fields, is made to Hathor and to her son Hor-sam-ta-ui. The god Ahi, the duplicate of the person of the king, considered as the third person of the triad, stands before Hathor. The gifts bestowed upon this king consist of corn in immense quantities and of cereals of all kinds.

Seventh Picture.—The king and the queen offer the two sistra to Isis and Ahi to solicit the favor of these two divinities. Isis grants to the king the love of his subjects.

Eighth Picture.—The king is in the presence of Isis and Hor-sam-ta-ui. He makes a general offering of food, flowers, food, and bread. Isis replies: "I give thee everything in the heavens, all that the earth produces, and everything that the Nile can bring." Hor-sam-ta-ui replies: "I give thee all that emanates from the rays of the sun, to fill thy dwelling with victuals."

Catholicism Against the United States.

The recent "Pastoral Letter" of the Catholic council held last month at Cincinnati is the authoritativ declaration of the Catholic church regarding its attitude toward the country, and the country's government, in which it has squatted itself like a noisome toad. Liberals and all who love freedom must recollect that it is a statement of doctrins by the leaders of a church that has a record as black as midnight; a church that has strangled every thought it could; a church that has put a barrier of sword and flame in the path of progress; a church that has always proclaimed for despotism and against freedom; a church that will never for a moment admit that it could be or do wrong; a church that pretends to hold the God-committed keys of heaven and hell; a church which has overthrown governments and trampled upon the rights of every people that hav allowed it to obtain a foothold among them; a church whose blind following in this country has increased in a hundred years from twenty-five thousand to seven millions, whose sectarian institutions in the last twenty years hav more than doubled, whose stealings from the state in the same time hav more than trebled; a church that is receiving bigoted, ignorant slaves from Europe at the rate of several hundred thousand a year; a church that bids fair in a decade or two to control this country unless forever separated by law from the state and driven from the public treasury as a highway robber. And remembering this, they can but regard it as a declaration of war by an enemy who knows no mercy and no law but its own intolerant will.

In opening the council it was observed that of the prelates who composed its last council only one was present, Archbishop Purcell. All the rest were dead. But the pious council forgot to state that the one who still lingered, living on borrowed time, according to biblical authority that man's allotted time is three score years and ten, was the colossal churchly thief of the century, who took the funds committed to his care by his thousands of dupes and used them to build houses in which ignorance occupied the pew and knavery knelt at the altar. The council forgot to tell how the confidence of slaves was met by the cunning of ecclesiastical law, which refuses to refund a penny to the beggared populace who clamored at the church's door. The council forget to tell that when a committee of Purcell's paupers applied for relief they were turned away with the cold assurance that nothing would be done; that if the courts decreed the sale of the houses the church would buy them in; that Purcell had solicited money in New York for that purpose, and not to pay the debt to them, and they must trust to the passing of the plate for reimbursement. It forgot also to say that when the paupers said they would complain to the pope, who had $47,000,000 in his coffers, and who but ten years ago was presented by Purcell with a million dollars, they were told that the pope had nothing to do with them, that he took all he could and kept all he got. All these things were somehow overlooked by the reverend and pious assembly, or perhaps they did not refer to them for fear of wounding the sensitiv feelings of Mr. Purcell, who sat among them "rich in the merits of eighty-two years of life and forty-eight of episcopal labor" and pious knavery, by which thousands of humble citizens hav lost their all in a salvation lottery, conducted for the benefit of the manipulator of the wheel. The council in its wisdom did not tell the world that honesty is not conferred with the miter, and that the exhortations of the priest are but a garment of words which conceal the pretending rascal and the pious robber.

These are a few things the council did not put in its "pastoral letter." Its sin of omission was great, but its sins of commission were even greater.

It talks about human freedom as though a Catholic could comprehend it—as though in all the years of blood and fire through which the church has waded there ever was a free Catholic—one who dared to stand up straight and say his soul was his own. If ever there was such who was not hounded by the church, history has forgotten to record his name. The doctrin that all men are created free and equal is scouted by this council as pernicious, and calculated to work injury to the church. Under this cry religion is assailed. God alone, it says, is free, and the church is the interpreter of his revelation and men hav no right to reject it.

There is the doctrin of the Catholic laid down plain. Men hav no right to reject the church, to doubt its words or question its acts. Every thought not licensed by the church must be suppressed, every doubt strangled at its birth. Every priestly lie must be believed and every miracle accounted a new fact in science. Not a whisper must go out on the winds of skepticism. The voice of the church is the voice of God and men hav no right to reject it. All the traditions of the church, all the vagaries of the apostles, all the myths on the saints, all the acts of the pope, all the lies of the priests, must be swallowed as the doings and words of God.

These are strange doctrins to teach free men.

Nor are all men equal, says the council. It is ordained by God that some shall rule and some shall be ruled. Those who are appointed to rule hav rights that subjects hav not. Bishops and priests are appointed to rule; if to rule, then they are above those whom they rule. The cry of equality is the cry of the idle and the weak.

These are strange words to hear in a republic.

The council then goes on to assail a newspaper run by a Catholic, and Catholic in its teachings, but which differs from the church in some things. The animus of the denunciation is apparent in the remark that "the editors pretend to be Catholic, but with unbridled license assail priest or bishop who differs with them." The Irish World is singled out as the paper which breeds defiance of authority, which means it is not the subservient tool of the church, but exercises the right to differ with the pope and his satellites who composed the council. The long and short of the denunciation is that no paper has a right to differ with the church, and that any paper doing it is a heretic and will be damned, its writers excommunicated, and its editor anathematized. Such insolence is not unexpected on the part of the church. The world knew that was its doctrin, but the church must be conscious of great strength to so boldly proclaim it to the American people.

As to secret societies, the council commands that Catholics shall not join them unless they are run in the interests of the church, and any Catholic who disobeys this order shall be deprived of "Christian burial," which to a church man is a terrible threat. To him it means an endless hell, an eternity of excruciating misery. It is very strange that one man should believe that another man can damm him for all time, simply for obeying his own reason and doing what he considers right without consulting a priest or asking his leave.

Music, unless written by some one in the pay of the church, is also condemmed.

With unparalleled impudence the council has practically declared that all men and women not married by the church are living in adultery. Such a statement, if made by an individual foreigner, would be deservedly met by a slap across the mouth; but this scarlet harlot, with the brazenness of her kind, boldly says it, and the people hear her without a murmur. The bishops would not dare say it as individuals; it is only when they speak as the peculiar and only agents of God that they can insult a nation with impunity.

But the crowning insult, and most dangerous utterance, is that power to govern does not come from the people but from God, and only from God through the Roman Catholic church. That the Liberals can see just how infamous and subversiv of democratic-republican institutions the teachings of this church are, we quote what the council says:

> With the popular doctrin that all men are equal, there is also steadily growing the doctrin that "all power is from the people, and that they who exercise authority in the state do not exercise it as their own, but as intrusted to them by the people, and upon this condition, that it may be recalled by the will of that same people by whom it was confided to them." This is not Catholic doctrin, nor is it the doctrin of the scriptures which teach, "By me kings reign, by me princes rule, and the mighty decree justice." "Giv ear, you that rule people, for power is given to you by God, and strength by the most high." Let every soul be subject to the higher power; for there is no power but from God and those that are ordained of God."
> While on the one hand the Catholic doctrin thus distinctly teaches that all power comes from God, we must not be understood as teaching that the people are not permitted a voice in the form of government under which they shall liv; on the contrary we teach with the sovereign pontiff, Leo XIII., now gloriously reigning, "that they who are to be set over the republic may, in certain cases, be chosen by the will and decision of the people without any opposition or repugnance to Catholic doctrin. By this choice the ruler is designated, but rights of government are not conferred, and power is not given, but it is determined by whom it is to be wielded, There is no question here of the forms of government, for here is no reason why the rule of one or several should not be approved by the church if only it is just and tends toward the common good. Accordingly, justice being observed, people are not forbidden to provide themselvs with that kind of government which is most suitable to their genius or the institutions and customs of their ancestors."
> There is also a growing disposition among a class of Catholics to teach that in some things the priest receives his power from the people. There is also a disposition to draw lines and to confine the priest within limits that neither God nor religion can permit. The priest is not appointed by the people, nor does he receive his power from the people. He receives his power from God, and the people are commanded to seek the law from his lips, "for the priest's lips should keep knowledge." "He that hears you hears me," says Christ, speaking of his priests, and "he that despises you despises me." "Go teach" are words that leave no doubt as to the right of priests to teach, or the duty of the people to listen.
> Because the people supply the means for the support of religion they frequently assume that they, and they only, are to manage the temporalities of the church. Frequently even under the plea of assisting in the management of the temporalities, the laity also assume to dictate to the priest in spirituals, the more when he teaches the law of God on matters appertaining to government, or the duties of subjects to rulers. The assumption of this class of men is that in matters of state the priest must be silent, forgetting that governments and states, and the relation of citizen to citizen, must be founded on the law of God, and that the priest is guardian, and under the direction of the church, the interpreter of the law of God, and that consequently in all matters of civil life appertaining to faith and morals the priest has a right to speak, and the people are required to listen.
> This will no doubt be a doctrin offensiv to modern Liberalism, that seeks to eliminate God from society, and to teach that all power comes from the people. But because a doctrin is unpopular it does not prove it untrue. Truth is often very unpopular. Christ nor his doctrin was popular. Governments and states and peoples are alike subject to the law of God equally as the humblest. Governments hav no more right to do wrong than individuals. "All power comes from God" and the church is the witness and guardian of revelation, as well the interpreter thereof. From her the world must learn the law of God, and the law of man must ever be subordinated to the law of God. It is untrue to assert "that all power comes from the people." "All power comes from God," by whom "princes rule and the mighty decree justice."
> Guided by these doctrins, Catholics can easily see that though they may be associated with the clergy in the management of temporalities of the church, yet they must never forget the reverence and respectful obedience due to their pastors, nor the loving and mutual co-operation due them in all the works of religion. Let, therefore, the laity heartily co-operate with the clergy, being ever mindful that in unity there is strength, and in love and harmony there is peace and union with God.

This, in plain language, divested of all superfluous verbiage and ecclesiastical clap-trap, means that

All power comes from God; that

The Catholic church is the only authorized agent of God; consequently,

All power must come from the church.

And as the will of man must ever be subordinated to the will of God, so must the will of the people ever be subordinated to the will of the church.

And also as the pope, cardinals, bishops, and priests are the only ones who can speak with authority of God's purposes and plans, and are God's attorneys in fact, all governments and peoples must do and think exactly as the priests say, under penalty of eternal damnation.

This is the doctrin of the church which is gaining such headway in this country. It needs no argument to show that if unchecked by reason it will end by making this country a second Italy, degraded by faith and debased by superstition, until all vestige of manhood and womanhood shall be lost. The nation must either rise above the church or be sunk by it. Which shall it be?

A Valuable Book.

As will be seen by reference to our advertising columns, we hav just issued for Col. John R. Kelso, of Modesto, Cal., his new book entitled "Deity Analyzed and the Devil's Defense." It consists of two distinct works published, for convenience' sake, in one volume. "Deity Analyzed" is an argument in six lectures directed against the folly called the Christian religion and its so-called revelation, the Jewish scriptures. The first three lectures are devoted to a consideration of the god Jehovah as "Creator;" lecture four treats of that mythical personage as a "Supreme Ruler;" and the fifth and sixth lectures are upon the "Messiah or Savior."

"Deity Analyzed," if we except the Atheistical portion of it, is in a direct line with Paine's "Age of Reason;" and it is doubtful if any one since that author has treated the subject of the inconsistencies of the Bible in a manner as able as the colonel; while the latter has the additional advantage of the light which a century of criticism and inquiry has thrown upon his subject.

For one feature of this book the author cannot receive too much praise, and it cannot be too earnestly recommended to the attention of other writers; that feature is accuracy. Some authors, in making citations from scripture, habitually quote from memory, generally getting the substance right, it is true, but still distorting the text and perhaps crediting it to some portion of the Bible in which, upon investigation, it will be found not to appear. It is among the most humiliating experiences of life for an ardent worker in the cause to base an argument upon the assertion of a writer who is reckless about his authorities, and then find, when challenged by some browbeating clergyman to substantiate his claim, that, although building upon a rock, he is totally unprepared to state where that rock is located. It is worse than the blind leading the blind; it is the careless misleading the ignorant. The result is that the champion of truth is discomfited, and one error is thus made to support another.

No such charge as the foregoing can be laid at the door of Col. Kelso. He is accuracy itself. He builds no argument on the creeds of sects or the theories of individuals, but takes the Bible as he finds it; and in all conscience there is enough atrocity and balderdash in that ancient book to satisfy the proclivities of the most critically inclined.

In his preface Col. Kelso says: "Of all that humanity is capable of suffering there can be no agony more fearful, more unutterable in its intensity, than is that of total religious despair—a full belief that, without intending to do so, we hav incurred the inappeasable wrath of God, and that we are irrevocably doomed to writhe and scream in the undying flames of hell ages without end." He then goes on, to the best of his ability, to uproot this pernicious belief; and we can vouch for the fact that he does it thoroughly and in a most masterly manner.

As for the second part of the volume, the "Devil's Defense," written in verse, it has to be read before it can be estimated at its true worth. The colonel says that he does not profess to be a poet, but some may regard this modesty as uncalled for. Men hav won fame as poets in whose lines can be pointed out many passages far below the standard of the "Devil's Defense." At the same time, where poetry aboundeth, truth doth much more abound.

The writer advances boldly in the direction pursuing which others hav halted half way on account of the plain speaking in which further progress would involve them. The vein of humor, however, which runs through this poem displaces with a smile the look of terror which the reader might assume at the colonel's audacity in handling holy subjects, were it entirely wanting in levity.

Col. Ingersoll's Reply to Talmage.

As early as Friday seats were at a premium for the lecture, and when the colonel appeared Sunday night the largest audience ever in the Academy of Music greeted him with long applause. For nearly three hours he kept them spellbound with admiration. The evening was devoted to answering the charges of the Brooklyn Presbyterian divine, and next Sunday afternoon at 2, the colonel announced, he would hav a matinée, and answer his explanations.

Mr. Ingersoll said:

Only a few years ago the pulpit was almost supreme. The palace was in the shadow of the cathedral, and the power behind every throne was a priest. Man was held in physical slavery by kings and in a mental prison by the church. He was allowed to hold no opinions as to where he came from, nor as to where he was going. It was sufficient for him to do the labor and believe; the kings would do the governing and the priests the thinking—and, my God, what thinking! If the world had obeyed the priests we would all be idiots to-night. The eagle of intellect would hav given way to the blind bat of faith. The arguments of the church were the rack, the fagot, the thumbscrew in this world, and hell in the next. Only a few years ago no man could express an honest thought unless he agreed with the church. The church has been a perpetual beggar. It never plowed, it never sowed, it never spun, yet Solomon in all his glory was not so arrayed. Thanks to modern thought, the brain of the nineteenth century, to Voltaire, to Paine, to Hume, to all the free men, that beggar, the church, is no longer upon horseback; and it fills me with joy to state that even the walking is not now good. Only a little while ago a priest was thought more than human. Nobody dared contradict the minister. Now there are other learned professions. There are doctors, lawyers, writers, books, newspapers, and the priest has hundreds of rivals.

The priest grew jealous, hateful; he was always thankful for an epidemic or a pestilence, so that people would turn to him in their despair. In our country all the men of intellect were in the pulpit once. Now there are so many avenues to distinction that the men of brain, of heart, of rich, red blood hav left the pulpit and gone to useful things. I do not say all. There are still some men of mind in the pulpit, but they are nearer Infidels than any others. Where do we get our ministers? A young man, without constitution enough to be wicked, without health enough to enjoy the things of this world, naturally fixes his gaze on high. He is educated, sent to a university, where he is taught that it is criminal to think. Stuffed with a creed, he comes out a shepherd. Most of them are intellectual shreds and patches, mental ravelings, selvage. Every pulpit is a pillory in which stands a convict; every member of the church stands over him with a club, called a creed. He is an intellectual slave, and dare not preach his honest thought. There are thousands of good men in the pulpit, honest men. I am simply describing the average shepherd; they tell me "they've been called," that Almighty God selected them. He looked all over the world and said, "Now, there's a man I want!" And what selections! Shakspere was not called. Yet he has done more for this world than all the ministers who hav ever lived in it. Beethoven, he was not called. Raphael was not called. He was all an accident. All the inventors, discoverers, poets—God never called one of them; he turned his attention to popes, cardinals, priests, exhorters, and what selections he has made! It's astonishing.

In the United States a great many ministers hav been good enough to take me for a text Among others the Rev. Mr. Talmage, of Brooklyn. I hav nothing to say about his reputation. It has nothing to do with the question. Some ministers think he has more gesticulation than grace. Some call him a pious pantaloon, a Christian clown; but such remarks, I think, are born of jealousy and envy. He is the only Presbyterian minister in the United States who can draw an audience. He stands at the head of the denomination, and as such I answer him. He's a strange man. I believe he's honest, or intellectual pride would prevent his saying the things he does. He believes in a literal resurrection of the dead; that at the last trump we shall see countless bones flying through air to find their fellows. He has made some charges against me, and he has denied some of my statements. He has produced what he calls arguments, and I am going to answer some of the charges. Next Sunday afternoon, at two o'clock, in this place, I shall hav a matinee, and answer his arguments.

He says I am the champion blasphemer. What is blasphemy? To contradict a priest? to hav a mind of your own? Whoever takes a step in advance is a blasphemer. Blasphemy is what a last year's leaf says to a this year's bud. To deny that Mohammed is the prophet of God is not blasphemy in New York. It is in Constantinople. It is a question, then, largely of geography. It depends on where you are. The missionary who laughs at a wooden God is a blasphemer. In a Catholic country whoever says Mary is not the mother of God is a blasphemer. In a Protestant country to say she is the mother of God is blasphemy. Everything has been blasphemy. My doctrin is this: He is a blasphemer who refuses to tell his honest thought; who is not true to himself; who enslaves his fellowman; who charges that God was once in favor of slavery. If there is any God, that man is a blasphemer. They're afraid we'll injure God. How? Is infinit goodness and mercy to become livid with wrath because a finite being expresses an opinion? I cannot help the infinit That man only is the good man who helps his fellow-man. I know men who would do anything for God, who doesn't need it, but nothing for men, who do need it. Why should God be so particular about my believing his book? It's no more his work than the stars or gravitation. Yet I may declare that the earth is flat, and he'll not damn me for that. But if I make a mistake about that book I'm gone. I can blaspheme the multiplication table and deny the power of the wedge—in fact, the less I know the better my chance will be. I say that book is not inspired, and there is no infinitly good God who will damn one human soul. At the judgment, if I am mistaken I will own up. I am here, I do not know where I came from nor where I am going—I'll be honest about it. I am on a ship, and not on speaking terms with the captain, but I propose to hav a happy voyage, and the best way is to do what you can to make your fellow-passengers happy. If we run into a good port I'll be as happy an angel as you'll meet that day.

Blasphemy is the cry of a defeated priest—the black flag of theology; it shows where argument stops and slander and persecution begin. I am told by Mr. Talmage that whoever contradicts this word is a fool, a howling wolf, one of the assassins of God. I presume the gentleman is honest. Take Mr. Talmage, now, he is a good man; Mr. Humboldt, he was another good man. What Humboldt knew and what Talmage don't know would make a library.

The next charge is that I hav said the universe was made of nothing, according to the Bible. False in one thing, false in all, he says. Think of that rule. Let us apply that to him. If the world was created, what was it made of? and who made that? If the Lord created it, what did he make it of? Nothing. That's all he had. No sides, no top, nothing. Yet God had lived there forever. What did he think about? What did he do? Nothing. Nothing had ever happened. All at once he made something. What did he make it of? Mr. Talmage explains. He says if I knew anything I would know that God made this world out of his omnipotence. He might just af well hav made it out of his memory. What is omnipotence? Is it a raw material? The weakest man in the world can lift as much nothing as God. Yet he made this world out of his omnipotence. It is so stated by a doctor of divinity, and I should think such divinity would need a doctor! I don't believe this. I believe this universe has existed throughout all eternity—everything. All that is is God. I do not giv to that universe a personality that wants man to get his knees in the dust and his fingers in holy water; that wants somebody to ring a bell or eat a wafer I am a part of this universe, and I believe that all there is is all the God there is. I may be mistaken; I don't know. I just giv my best opinion. If there's any heaven, I'll giv it there. But there'll be no discussions in heaven. Hell is the only place where mental improvement will be possible.

I hav said, it is charged, that the Bible says the world was made in six days. He says I don't understand Hebrew. The Bible says the world was made in six days. God didn't work nights—evening and morning were the first day. God rested on the seventh day and sanctified it. That, they say, didn't mean days; it meant good whiles. He made the world in six good whiles. Adam was made, I think, along about Saturday. If the account is correct, it's only six thousand years since man made his appearance. We know that to be false. A few years ago a gentleman who was going to California in the cars met a minister. They came to the place called the Sink of the Humboldt, the most desolate place in the world. Just imagin perdition with the fire out. The traveler asked the minister whether God made the earth in six days, and the minister said he did. Then don't you think, said he, he could hav put in another day's work to great advantage right here?

I am charged, too, with saying that the sun was not made till the fourth day, whereas, according to the Bible, vegetation began on the third day, before there was any light. But Mr. Talmage says there was light without the sun. They got tight, he says, from the crystallization of rocks. A nice thing to raise a crop of corn by. There may hav been volcanoes, he says. How'd you like to farm it, and depend on volcanic glare to raise a crop? That's what they call religious science. God won't damn a man for things like that. What else? The aurora borealis! A great cucumber country! It's strange he never thought of glow-worms! Imagin it! a Presbytorian divine gravely saying vegetation could grow by the light of the crystallization of rocks—by the light of volcanoes in other worlds, probably now extinct.

He says of me, too, in his pulpit, that I was in favor of the circulation of immoral literature. Let me tell you the truth. Several gentlemen, so called, were trying to exclude from the mails books called Infidel. I said the law should be modified. It is impossible for anybody to reach the depth of one who will print or circulate obscene books. One of my objections to the Bible is that it contains obscene stories. Any book, couched in decent language, should hav the liberty of the United States mails. Where books are immoral and obscene, I say, burn them, and hav always said it. I am in favor of disseminating free, clean literature, and that, too, without the interference of any agent, who was to judge whether it was antagonistic to orthodox interests. As to immoral literature, no man has a greater loathing for it than I. But the difference between the two is boundless; one is an angel of light, the other a slimy, loathsome, crawling serpent. Mr. Talmage said what he knew to be untrue. He said it out of hatred, and because he cannot answer the arguments I hav urged. I believe in pure books and pure literature. But when a God writes there is no excuse for him. In Shakspere we say obscene things are impure; we do not say they are inspired.

That I hav falsified the records in the Bible showing the period of Jewish slavery, is another of the charges against me. That slavery extended over a period of two hundred and fifteen years; and he proceeded to substantiate this statement by going through a long and somewhat complicated genealogical table. If I made any misstatement I was misled by the New Testament. Mr. Talmage may settle it with St. Paul. If you can depend on what my friend Paul says, the Jews, in two hundred and fifteen years increased from seventy persons till they had 600,000 men of war. I know it isn't so, and so does any man who knows anything. For such an increase as this each woman must hav borne something over fifty-seven children, and every child hav lived.

The next charge is that I hav laughed at holy things. Holy things! The priest always says, "Now don't laugh; look solemn; this is no laughing matter." There's nothing a priest hates like mirthfulness. He despises a smile. I read in the Bible that God gave a recipe to Aaron for making hairoil, and said if anybody made any like it kill him. Well, I don't believe it. The penalty for infringing on that patent was death. Do you believe an infinit God gave a recipe for hairoil? Is it possible for absurdity to go beyond that? That's what they call a holy thing. And water for baptism! Do you believe God will look for this water mark on the soul?

The next charge is that I misquote the scriptures. That's because I don't know Hebrew. God knew I wouldn't know Hebrew. Why didn't he write to me in English? If he wishes to hold a gentleman responsible why doesn't he address him in his nativ tongue? Why write his word in such a way that hundreds of thousands make their living explaining it? If I'd only understood Hebrew I would hav known God didn't make Eve out of a rib. He made her out of Adam's side. How did he get it out? Well, I suppose he cut it out with a kind of a splinter of his omnipotence! Then our mother was made from a rib. When you considered the material used it was the most successful job ever done. There's even a serpent in the Bible that knows a language. It won't do. Sin, how did it come into the world? Where did the serpent come from? He was wicked. Adam's sin did not make him bad. Then there was sin in the world before Adam. There's no sense in it—not a particle. Then Talmage touches me upon the flood. His flood didn't come to America because America wasn't discovered then. He says it was a partial flood. Then why did they hav to take any birds into the ark. How did Noah get the animals in the ark? Talmage says it was through the instinct to get out of the rain. According to the Bible they went in before the rain began. Dr. Scott says the angels helped carry them in. Imagin an angel with an animal under each wing. It must hav rained eight hundred feet a day for forty days. Why does Talmage try to explain a miracle? If you explain it, it ceases to be a miracle. The beauty of a miracle is it cannot be explained. The moment the church begins to explain the church is gone. All it's got to do is to swear it's so. The ark landed on Ararat, which is 17,000 feet high. There was only one window, twenty-two inches square. Talmage says the window ran clear around the ark, The Bible doesn't say so. That's Brooklyn; that's not Bible.

If the Bible account is true, the ark must hav struck bottom on the top of a mountain. Would any God of mercy and kindness people a world, and then drown them all? A God cruel enough to drown his own children ought not to hav the impudence to tell me how to bring up mine. Why did he save eight of the same kind of people to take a fresh start? Why didn't he make a fresh lot, kill his snake, and giv his children a fair show? It won't do.

Talmage says the Bible does not favor polygamy and slavery. There was room enough on the table of stone for saying man should hav only one wife and no slaves. If not God might hav written it on the other side. David and Solomon, according to Talmage, were pursued by the wrath of God, but they had a pretty good time of it. Most anybody would be willing to be pursued that way. There is not a word in the Old Testament against slavery or polygamy. Frederick Douglass, a slave in Maryland, is the greatest man that state has ever produced. He was enslaved by Christians. Why did God pay so much attention to blasphemers and so little to slaveholders and robbers? I am opposed to any God that was ever in favor of slavery. The Bible upholds polygamy, and that's the reason I don't uphold the Bible. The most glorious temple ever erected is the home—that's my church.

I hav misquoted the story of Jonah, Talmage says. When somebody had been guilty of blasphemy the winds rose; they tried to get Jonah ashore, but couldn't do it. The sea waxed. He was swallowed by a whale. The people of Nineveh wrapped all their cattle up in sackcloth, and if anything would hav pleased God I should think that would. Jonah sat under a gourd, and God made a worm out of some omnipotence he had left over, and set it at work on the gourd. Talmage don't think Jonah was in the whale's belly—he staid in his mouth. Well, judging from the doctor's photograph, that explanation would be quite natural to him. He says he might hav been in the whale's stomach, and avoided the action of the gastric juice by walking up and down. Imagin Jonah, sitting on a back tooth, leaning against the upper jaw, wiping the perspiration off his forehead, and longingly looking through the open mouth for signs of land! But that is scripture, and you've got to believe it or be damned. Let me say his brother preachers will not thank Talmage for his explanations. I don't believe it, and if I am to be damned for it I'll accept it cheerfully.

They say I was defeated for governor of Illinois because I was an Infidel, and that I am an Infidel because I was defeated. That's what I call reasoning in a circle. Now I'll tell you. I was a candidate before a nominating convention, and was waited upon by a committee who asked me whether I was an Infidel, and I said I was! I was defeated. I preserved my manhood and lost an office. If everybody were as frank as I was, some men now in office would be private citizens. I would rather be what I am than hold any office in the world and be a slimy hypocrit.

Next they say I dishonored my parents, because I do not believe what they believed. My father at one time believed the Bible to be the inspired word of God. He was an honorable man, and he told me to read the Bible for myself and be honest. He lived long enough to believe that the Old Testament was not the word of God. He had not in his life as much happiness as I hav in one year. I hope my children will dishonor me by being nearer right than I am. If I hav made a mistake I want my children to correct it. My mother died when I was two years old. Were she living to-night, or if she does liv, she would say, "Be absolutely true to yourself and preserve your manhood." If Talmage had been born in Constantinople he would hav been a dervish. He is what he is because he can't help it. His head is just that shape. I am taking away the hope and consolation of the world, he says. His consolation is that ninety-nine out of every hundred are going to hell. His church was founded by John Calvin, a murderer. Better hav no heaven than a hell. I would rather God would commit suicide this minute than that a single soul should go to hell. I want no Presbyterian consolation, I want no foreordination, no consolation, no damnation.

Col. Ingersoll concluded with a few remarks about the Bible women, saying that women to-day are as true to the gallows as Mary Magdalene was to the cross. Wherever there are women there are heroins. Shakspere's women are vastly superior to the Bible women. "I am accused of putting out the light-houses on the shores of the other world. The Christians are trimming invisible wicks and pouring in allegorical oil. The Christian is willing wife, children, parents shall burn if only he can sing and hav a harp. Mr. Talmage can see countless millions burn in hell without decreasing the length of his orthodox smile."

What the Anti-Monopolists Propose to Do.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In answer to your letter I would say that there is much inquiry about the objects and purposes of the conference to be held at Albany on the 26th inst., on the invitation of the National Anti-Monopoly League. Some of these objects are so apparent that we take no risk in stating them.

There is now pending before the American people the most important question that has arisen since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. It involves the future existence of the republic, and its decision will also determin whether a government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall or shall not perish from the earth.

Shall corporations control the people, or shall the people control the corporations they hav created? Shall a few score of corporation aristocrats, gorged with the riches of which they hav despoiled others, make our laws, select our judges, regulate our taxes, name the prices which shall be paid for every man's labor, for the food he eats, the fuel he burns, and the clothes he wears, or shall the people govern and protect themselvs? These are the vital pending issues, to be decided by the votes of the people of the United States.

Every voter, especially every laboring man, has a direct interest in these questions. So has every farmer and every citizen. The aristocracy of wealth was never known, in any government, to cease its aggressions until its power for evil was destroyed. Left to its natural growth it goes on until it raises the prices of everything but labor, and the many grow poor while the few grow rich. The past year has witnessed new aggressions by corporations upon the rights of the people so colossal that men are almost stupefied by their impudence. Witness the monopoly of the Telegraph—the Elevated Railroad transactions for which the language has yet no name—the attempt to steal the water front of Hudson county, New Jersey. But the past year has also witnessed a diffusion of intelligence among the people on this subject which is equally marvelous. With this intelligence has come the strong and steady growth of a determination to stay these aggressions, and to bring their authors under constitutional control. Judges of our highest courts use ever proper occasion to declare the plain right of the people to limit the charges of public corporations. Corporation efforts to control legislatures hav failed for the first time in many years. In every state in the Union there is a growing public opinion that old political parties hav outlived their usefulness because they hav failed to grapple with this great question and that monopoly influence controls their leaders, that the right of the people to control public corporations is the right which all honest voters must unite in maintaining, and that the question of corporation control is the one great vital political question of the day.

The final judgment of the American people is always right. They were never known to make a wrong or an unjust decision. They decided that there should not be taxation without representation. that no foreign power should impress American citizens, that slavery should no longer exist! They are ready to decide that a corporation aristocracy shall no longer control this country. It is as certain that the people will bring corporations under proper control as that our country has a future before it—as certain as it was when the first gun was fired against Fort Sumpter that the people had doomed the slave oligarchy to destruction.

The conference at Albany is to be a conference of the people—of that type and class of the people that reversed an enormous Democratic majority in the Fifth and an equally large Republican majority in the Eighteenth Senatorial Districts. It is hoped there will not be a delegate there who wishes to be a candidate for office. But every voter who is ready to throw off the shackles of party—to cast dead issues aside—to declare that the time has come for a union of the people to protect themselvs against the aggressions of all monopolies—who is ready to cast his vote for candidates who will protect the people's rights, and who will keep their promises, will find a cordial welcome at this conference. It is to be a conference of the people, to protect the interests of the people, and to establish the government of our fathers upon firm foundations against the most powerful enemy which has ever risen against it. It will take steps to perfect anti-monopoly organization, and giv notice to existing parties that candidates must be nominated whose record will be a guarantee that further aggressions upon the people's rights will not be tolerated. failing in which, the Anti-Monopolists will place in nomination candidates for whom a lover of his country can consistently vote.

The responses to invitations to attend the conference hav already been received in sufficient numbers to insure a good representation of delegates of high character from all parts of the Empire state.

L. E. Chittenden,
President National Anti-Monopoly League.

What is the Cause of the Heat in the Interior of the Earth?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: As your journal has become renowned for its fearless utterances in behalf of truth, and dares, on every occasion, to assail error and criticise the reasons for settled beliefs, although they may hav become respectable from age and receive the support of the learned, the rich, and the masses, perhaps you will not disregard a suggestion relativ to the cause of the heat in the interior of the earth, upon the ground that it may prove interesting to some of your thousands of readers (every one of whom is a thinker or he would not be a reader of The Truth Seeker) and co-workers.

The theory at present generally taught seems to be that "the earth has passed through a stage of igneous fluidity," and further back in time was devolved from a primal unit that embraced the sun and every planet, satellite etc., within our solar system;

That when it leaped forth into space from the integral mass of flame, upon a separate career, a cooling process set in, which has gone forward with the measureless ages, until the whole became incrusted to a depth which adapted it to the existence of vegetable and animal life;

That this cooling process is still going on and the crust becoming thicker and thicker. Thus the heat within the earth is accounted for.

It will be observed the theory that the earth was once an intensely heated mass is also made the foundation upon which to base a seemingly plausible theory to account for the earth itself. Hence it has proved very convenient, whether true or not.

These are questions which science grapples, but which, up to the present time, she has been unable to say are solved.

The creation question, however, was solved among believers in the Bible, until within a few years ago, and before science disturbed their ignorance; and, but for the industry and courage of scientific men, the clergy would still be teaching as true the account of creation given in the book of Genesis.

In this connection, perhaps it would not be out of place to call attention to the conclusions of that eminent scholar, James D. Dana, in his Manual of Geology—title, Cosmogony—which, by the way, is for use in schools. After giving the theory of science as to the history of creation and the origin of the earth, he undertakes to show that it does not conflict with the Bible account; and of all exhibitions of distortion, of logical deductions from scientific research, to perpetuate an unreasonable, antiquated, and silly story, simply because it is found in the Bible, this of his is the "boss."

He must hav spent months in exhaustiv labor and prayer, in inventing this ingenious nonsense; for I submit to the judgment of any candid reader that it is nothing else and is contrary to the natural conclusion to which his mind must hav gravitated, if unbiased by orthodoxy. It is astonishing that any one, even a minister—say nothing of one so deeply learned in geological science as Mr. Dana—could hav the effrontery to offer such glaring inconsistences to the public to be read, let alone to be taught to confiding, unreasoning children. But it is another proof of the lengths to which Christian bigotry will go, and another reminder to the friends of mental freedom that "vigilance is the price of liberty."

Now, in regard to the heat within the earth, I do not say the theory advanced by scientific men is not true, because I am as unable to disprove it as they are to prove it, but simply suggest that, even though that actually be the source of such heat, there is a law of Nature, well known and understood, and every day being exemplified in all the blacksmith shops in the land, which is sufficient of itself to produce that heat, even were there no other adequate cause.

The law I hav reference to is that compression produces heat

A familiar experiment in illustration of this law is, as stated by Prof. Wells, the rendering of iron hot by striking it with a hammer.

Now, is it possible for so large a mass of matter as the earth to exist, without evolving heat, beyond a certain degree of compression? I submit that it is not, and that the heat in the interior of the earth is the inevitable consequence of piling so much matter into one mass. It is a fact well settled by experiment (to a certain depth) that the heat below the surface of the earth increases regularly in proportion to the distance we descend, being about 1° Fahrenheit for every 50 or 60 feet Now, the principle of attraction of gravitation being true, it would seem that it must be equally true that, in proportion to the distance we descend, compression must increase in exactly the same ratio; and as heat surely follows from compression, it as surely increases in intensity as compression increases, and in like ratio; hence the phenomenon of increasing heat as we go down into the interior of the earth. If these are facts, then a moulten world was not necessary to get the heat within it. It would be there anyway, because it could not be otherwise; and it will always remain there just as it is and always was, without increase or diminution, as long as there is a law of attraction of gravitation to bind the atoms which compose the earth together.

Science Baffled.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It is bad enough to hav the truth assailed, but it is still worse to let the assailer go scot-free; hence we ask for a short space in answer to Samuel P. Putnam, on his article, "The Inevitable Conflict," in your issue of April 1st.

We heartily agree with Mr. Putnam on the God question, but when he speaks of Spiritualism as he does it proves that he has not investigated it much; hence does not understand the "Spiritual philosophy." He says, "In the universal experience of the race there has not been any manifestation of mind outside of an organized body." Bless your soul, Bro. Putnam, the Spiritual philosophy does not teach that mind, intellect, or soul—one and the same thing—is flying about loose, and talking without organs of speech, or shaking hands without hands to shake with, or walking without legs to walk with, or conveying intelligence without brains, or manifesting without an organization to manifest through. It is true Spiritualists foolishly speak of "disembodied man," but I think I am safe in saying in behalf of Spiritualists that they do not mean that the soul is bodiless, but rather that it is clothed in a finer body. We will dwell in a finer organization in the next sphere of life, which is too subtle to take cognizance of with the eyes we hav in this gross physical body, but our finer bodies, commonly called spiritual bodies, will be as physical, as tangible, in the next sphere of life to each other as our grosser bodies are here. In fact, we will hav bodies in the next sphere, fac similes of the ones we hav here, and as readily recognize each other there as here. Never say again, Bro. Putnam, that Spiritualism teaches that the mind, or soul, is unorganized, without a body, simply because the law of dissolution separates it from the grosser clay.

Again he says, "But when the mind leaves the body there is not a particle of proof that it takes lodgment in another." Ah! now, my Materialistic brother, what are you doing? How ridiculous the above assertion makes you appear! You Materialists proudly assert that you want facts, great on science, giv us facts, etc. Now, as you propose to deal in facts, I shall very politely request you to giv an out-and-out and full-fledged demonstration of the above assertion. An assertion don't amount to much with me, a Spiritualist. You say, "There is not a particle of proof that the mind finds lodgment in another body." Now, brother. keep cool and prove this. I am after you now; you say Spiritualists believe without proof. Now come on with your science and prove that the mind don't exist in another body. Come, disprove Spiritualism, will you, like a man? Now you must see you are up a stump, having made an assertion you can in no wise prove—an assertion about something you know nothing about. You say, "So far as science is concerned, it vanishes from the domain of knowledge." Sir, there are scores, yea, hundreds, to-day who see those who once inhabited the grosser bodies clothed in a finer body. My wife sees them, hears them talk and walk, fully recognizing some and not others. Can you believe honest, truthful, living witnesses? Because you, Bro. Putnam, and I can't see them is no evidence that others don't. There is not a gill of logic in reasoning thus. I will leave the matter of clairvoyance by making the following statement: The person who does not know, or who has not had the best of evidence, that clairvoyance is true is, indeed, greatly behind the age he livs in in that respect. The facts of clairvoyance are so palpable that it is not worthy of discussion.

He further says, "I do not think that any well-disciplined mind cares to believe in immortality." I am now compelled to question Bro. Putnam's sanity. I very much doubt whether there has been a person in the past, or whether there is one to-day, but has or has had relativs or friends. Bro. Putnam may be like King Melchisedec (Hebrews vii), hence has no affectional ties, but, like the pig in his wallow, cares not whether he or others will exist hereafter or whether they will meet or not. "Well-disciplined mind," indeed! To disbelieve in immortality, or not to hav a desire to continue life, then, is evidence of a wel'-disciplined, well-balanced, highly-cultured, high-toned, loving mind, is it? I envy not the man who can say at the tomb of his sweet little child of three summers, I care not to hav you liv; I desire not to meet you; you are but a faded flower, cut off, and that forever. Such icy coldness! Away with such icy thoughts; they chill my blood and freeze the affections. Bro. Putnam, the writer has seen buried the grosser physical bodies of those near and dear, and has had unmistakable evidence of their continued existence, and of their being near, hovering over me, assisting, buoying me up as I journey on the path of life, and I am sure that when I cross the river called death they will meet me upon the boundary of another world, conduct me to my spirit home, and journey with me through the "spheres," and that we, not only we, but all humanity, will reach a state of development by which we will be able to bask in the sunshine of peace, happiness, and "platonic love." Bro. Putnam, go to investigating the Spiritual philosophy, the philosophy of all philosophies, and perchance you may let your voice mingle with the voice of some dear one gone before. You may hear a voice say to you, "Liv more and more spiritual, so that when you are done with earth you can come where we are," and then you may learn whether there is any disciplin or refinement in spirit communion.

The Sunday Law Question.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Is it consistent with the principles of Liberals, advocating the progress and enlightenment of the masses, to so strenuously oppose the legislation of a law securing to the people one day in the week free from labor and devoted to recreation and enlightenment?

The objection that a law compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest conflicts with the religious views of the Jews and Seven-day Adventists is rather a poor one. For it is apparent that one day's rest in the week is required by working men, and that a large, a very large, portion of the people desire Sunday as that day. Why should a few fanatical Jews and shouting Adventists deprive the people of their rest? If the people desire any other day the Liberals ought not to object to it devoted to education and recreation, and the closing of whisky dens and their cursed traffic.

If the Christians, after they hav gained a day of rest, undertake to close the libraries and the theaters, and prevent excursions and compel us to attend church, then we can object to and fight them. As long as they are right, go with them, but when they are wrong we can say No. But if they show the working man a chance to elevate, educate, and improve himself, and liv on a higher and a nobler plane of existence, let us say Amen. Alfred Denton Cridge.

[Mr. Cridge should remember that the design of the church is not to furnish the working-man a day of rest, but, by closing all avenues to anything like amusement, to force him to attend what they call "divine worship;" and also that the closing of libraries and theaters is the primary, not secondary, object of the Sunday law, and therefore it cannot hav the indorsement of consistent Liberals.—Ed. T. S.

Can You Trust a Christian?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In the proceedings, as reported, of the New England Southern Methodist Conference, opened in Providence, R. I., April 5, 1882, in the branch of the Woman's Missionary Society, Mrs. L. S. Bainbridge, a returned missionary, is made to say, "As women are the most ardent worshipers, they must be converted to Christianity, as the Bible and Christianity are not admitted to the schools. To meet this restriction the women of America need to provide for education in the Christian doctrins of the women of Japan."

Yes, while "the Bible and Christianity are not admitted to to the schools," this Christian woman recommends to her Christian sisters in America to educate these Japan women in Christian doctrins out of this very prohibited Bible. O shame, where is thy blush! Strategetically thrust upon the Japanese, through their women, a religion which they hav stipulated against receiving as a part of the education of their schools, thereby betraying the trust reposed in the honor of the Christian Methodist! Every trick and subterfuge resorted to by a blackmailer or detectiv to allure and secure their victim openly practiced and publicly boasted of in a Methodist conference, and that too by a woman, a missionary woman, glorying in her own shame!

In the same conference the Rev. A. J. Church, D.D., of Providence. declared that "Christianity was the great civilizer of the world. Where the Bible is there are found inventions, machinery, progress, liberty, charity, and general human development. He maintained why such an ancient country as China has never made more advances in civilization is because she has not had the Bible." He might hav added, a Guiteau pouring over his Bible in his cell; a Pocasset Freeman, assassinator of his own little daughter; a Rev. Ephraim K. Avery, Methodist elder, seducer and murderer of Sarah Maria Cornell, his own parishioner (not so far from Providence as to hav been forgotten); a Rev. Winslow, a Pond, Stickney, Hathaway, Chase (no farther from Providence than Boston, Worcester, and Fall River); a Gilman, Baldwin, Palmer, Lane, and some five hundred other clergymen, Sunday-school superintendents, and prominent laymen, not omitting the Rev. W. F. Whitcher, who was expelled for lying and drunkenness from this same Methodist Episcopal church, and by this same conference the day after this statement was made (oh!), all of whom within a few years hav been under a cloud for murder, arson, adultery, fornication, forgery, perjury, embezzlement, and such like little trifling offenses; who were civilized and developed with the Bible, not without it, as were the wicked Chinamen and other heathen.

Let these Christians pause and reflect on the crimes, persecutions, and inquisitorial murders of the present and past Bible worshipers, and hang their heads for very shame.

No, we cannot trust Christians as historians. We cannot trust their pulpit and press assertions. We cannot trust them as legislators. We cannot trust them as bankers, as presidents, and officers of the various business corporations. We cannot trust them as citizens, husbands, fathers; as mothers, wives, as missionary women and men, any farther than we can the unregenerate and unsanctified, as experience proves.

Rev. J. W. Hamilton, D.D., of Boston, said that "if Congress had been permitted to carry out its scheme of exclusion, the act would hav been a fatal blow to missionary work in China." What a pity!

This sentiment was echoed and re-echoed by the New York

East conference at Waterbury, Conn., and resolutions tendering thanks to President Arthur for vetoing the Chinese bill, also asking the government that the large missionary interests of the Methodist church in China may not be imperiled, as it is feared they would be if the bill became a law, and petitioning Congress in its further action not to permit anything to be done that shall endanger their interest, were passed unanimously by a standing vote."

Yes, national honor, political jurisprudence, and the salvation of the country must be sacrificed, if needs be, rather than than imperil a system of proselytism to a faith, at the best, not calculated to bring peace and prosperity to individual or nation. Congress had better take this fearful warning into serious consideration, and if, after prayerful deliberation, they find that the missions in China will be imperiled by passing the bill over the President's veto, abandon it at once, though the whole country be overrun by Chinamen and we all go to rack and ruin. Verily, the assurance of these Christians is only exceeded by their ignorance. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Another Christian Lie.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Some Christians seem to hav a hereditary mania for lying about dead Infidels. As they cannot answer their arguments, they resort to what thousands of sky-pilots hav thought was the next best thing, slander and abuse, not to say positiv lying. An instance or this sort occurred at Bunker Hill in the pulpit. Rev. Jacob Flemming, while pretending to relate a conversation with Mrs. Shutts, a Spiritualist lady, and a prominent member of the North Hannibal club, and whose life and character are absolutely without blemish, and who died recently, said that after having talked with her and when about to leave, she said: "Good-bye, I don't suppose we shall ever meet again. You will be so far in advance and above me that I will never see you more." Now the fact is (and we hav good witnesses) that he, the Rev. Elder Flemming, ascribed the very words to her that he (the elder) said himself. And sister Shutts replied, "Now, elder, don't you get so good that you will be so far above me that I can never see you again," which was said only to ridicule the elder's superstition. But it's only an ordinary occurrence of clerical hellishness to pass stories from one to the other to be repeated when and where the facts cannot be known. The best part of it is, sister Shutts called the president of our club to her bedside and most cheerfully made arrangements for her funeral service, telling him what to say for her, "not willing to giv," as she said, "the Christians a chance to lie about her after she was dead."

MORAL.—Never believe a word that a Christian says about conversation with a dead Infidel. A. H. WALKER.

Notes of a Knockabout.

Going through Kansas on the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fee I was very much pleased with the trim and neat farms and villages. The western portion did not look so well, as the country is not settled up and the conditions are not favorable in regard to soil, water, and climate.

The Kansas Prohibition law, from what I could learn and see, is only partially enforced, as all along the railroad liquor was easily obtained by paying well for it. However, while in Kansas, I was unable to see a drunken man, but as soon as we entered Colorado I saw plenty of them.

At Trinidad I stopped a day to examin the geological formation. The ladies with us were amused to see the adobe (mud, unbaked brick) houses and peculiar shiftless-looking Mexicans Ratoon. N. M., is just out of Colorado by some noble and grand mountains. It is a typical New Mexican American town. Saloons and stores, with plenty of gambling hells, compose the greater part of the town. From Ratoon the railroad goes over one of those vast valleys, and the distant mountains look only a mile or two through the clear and dry air. Overcoats are no longer required, and ice-water is appreciated.

Tuskegan and Albuquerque are two similar and enterprising cities with all the modern improvements except electric lights. Saloons and gambling hells abound, and many tender-foots get blistered in these holes. Of course churches are there to encourage the thing along by attempting to bind people so tight that they break away and go to the other extreme.

At the Rio Grande we stopped at the old Indian town of Yestlette. The Indians there cultivate little plots of grapes, corn, etc., and are quite honest—in their way. If a crop is growing, according to their moral code, it is wiser to take it, and take it they do whenever they can. But when it is garnered, not a grain or an ounce will be touched if left by its owner in the most exposed condition. These Indians are quite intelligent, and are as industrious as could be expected.

Demiug, the new railroad town of New Mexico at the junction of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fee with the Southern Pacific, is a miserable place. It has a good depot, but only a few saloons and stores, with the usual amount of bummers, gamblers, prospectors, and dead beats. Situated on a dry plain valley, with no surrounding country, it can never be but a junction as it is.

These New Mexico valleys are covered with a very fine grass called gra-mer, that is excellent for sheep, and if water could be obtained would be very good sheep ranches.

Tucson, Ari., had not changed much since 1877 except around the depot, and in having the houses built a little better. A Protestant church has been built, and the Palace hotel has had a burnt brick instead of an adobe front put to it. Here we saw the gigantic cactus that grows like a fluted column, with no branches or leaves, except one or two stumpy arms, to the hight of sixty feet.

From Tucson to Yuma was a desert. Yuma is made up of sand, and sand is everywhere. The houses are of adobe, and the town has one very wide street and several little alleys. The Indians shocked the modesty of some of the ladies by going without any clothing for the legs, and they displayed their calves and thighs painted in a most esthetic manner that would hav pleased Oscar Wilde.

From Yuma to San Bernadino or Colton was a fearful desert that created a bad impression to many of California.

Near Los Palmus we saw some mud springs where the mud boils up like thick mush, and every few days explodes with great violence. The gas smelt very much like sulphur.

I stopped at Colton to look at my old home at Riverside. This town is called the Eden of California, and to see the orange and lemon trees, loaded with their golden fruit, one would suppose so. The people here hav large vinyards and orchards and liv in almost a perpetual summer and a continuous harvest. Water is very scarce, and growing scarcer, and is charged for at an enormous rate. Nothing can be raised without water, and as a consequence a tax of from $3.50 to $5 per annum is tieved. The people are very religious, and Infidels or Freethinkers are in a hopeless minority.

Through central California we soon go, and at last we come to the garden city of Oakland, and toward evening get into San Francisco. San Francisco is like other cities, so what is the use of describing it? These cable street cars are the only peculiar thing I hav noticed so far, and the great number of the heathen Chinese. That cable street cars run by underground cables, up hill and down, just as well, if not better, than horse-cars do on level roads, and the price is the same. Freethinkers here are alive and working, and the Pacific Slope is not behind in the march of time or the progress of liberty.

KNOCKABOUT.

Editor of the New York "Times'" "Delusiv" Criticism on Col. Ingersoll's Lecture.

The editor of the New York Times of March 28th, in criticizing "Mr. Ingersoll's motivs" in his lecture "What Shall We Do to Be Saved?" wherein he attacks, very rationally, the Christian religion as a delusion—drawn from old biblical myths as more worthy of this more enlightened age; that editor seems to lose sight of the prominent fact that civilization has advanced in spite of the Christian religion, its irrational dogmas and persecutions, as being wholly due to the general advance of our race, by the spreading influence of commerce and inventions, and thus in increasing man's comforts and the facilities for international communication.

That editor's unphilosophical conclusion that though "we grant the Christian religion is a delusion, it is a beneficent delusion," is about the most delusiv pretext to teach and maintain a falsehood, which an intelligent editor should not descend to. As if falsehood is better than truth, and so is more likely to advance morality, by thus stultifying intelligence. Where, then, is that editor's consistency in advocating puplic schools to promote education, when he knows that education is the great detector of falsehoods and shams; such as he tacitly admits for the Christian religion? "Let us grant that the Christian religion is an entire delusion, is it not beyond any question a beneficent delusion?" Better giv up such irreverent humbugs and aid in spreading intelligence by schools and the press.

My philosophy, as published in books and papers, givs a rational substitute for biblical humbugs, by showing, from known scientific facts, that the phenomena of the universe is an intelligent and beneficent creation, and that all finite minds are immortal entities—which the editor of the Times will not publish, and cannot refute my proofs; but rather prefers Christian "delusions as beneficent."

That editor, like hundreds of thousands, hugs biblical "delusions" from mistaken policy, rather than risk the open confession of their self-evident untruths about God, devil, nature, and that trinity mythology, which he often alludes to in adverse quotations. Those quotations are commendably liberal in directing public attention to their palpable absurdities, as merely crude human fancies, which we are not bound to respect.

How Many Rooms in the New Jerusalem?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Between old Melchisedec, D. M. Bennett, and the devil (printer's), enormous errors appear in the calculations on the New Jerusalem, as found in chapter xxxix, verses 31 and 32, of the "Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh." The time to elapse before all the rooms would be occupied is stated in verse 32 at 41,080 years, whereas, taking the same dimensions and subtracting the dead people for 5000 years, as did Melchisedec, I find that, at three billions per century, the time to elapse before all the rooms would be occupied is more than seventy-one and a half million centuries, or 7,153,815,466 years.

Now will you kindly permit me to recommend a revised version of these two verses, in which I shall take sixteen feet six inches as the length, breadth, and hight of each room, so that the number of cubic rods in the city will exactly equal the number of rooms? This calculation givs round numbers, easily handled, and can be tested by any reader in a couple of minutes. I will now giv my revised version of verses 31 and 32:

"31. It is a matter of rejoicing that the New Jerusalem is so large and capable of accommodating such a great number of people." In order to gain some idea of its great size, let the reader test the correctness of the following calculation: 12,000 furlongs equal 480,000 rods, the length of one edge of the cube; 480,000 cubes gives 110,592,000 billion cubic rods, or rooms 16 feet 6 inches long, wide, and high. Now, suppose each room to be the future home of a happy pair of humans, male and female; these will furnish habitations for 220,592,000 billions of earth's inhabitants, "which, would indeed constitute a good sized colony."

"32. On the basis that for six thousand years the earth has had a population of 1,000,000,000, and that this number has been renewed three times every century, the number who hav lived in the world is 180 billions." Subtracting all these dead people, we have still left 220,591,850 billions to liv and die and go to the new Jerusalem before all the rooms would be occupied. Divide this by three billions, and we get 73,530,606 2-3 centuries, or 7,353,060,666 years, as the time to roll away before the homes could all be taken. This great stretch of time is so far beyond comprehension that we may throw in half of the entire space of the great city for streets, and parks, and pleasure-grounds, and rivers, and lakes, and meadows, and orchards, and vinyards, and camp-meeting grounds, and shade trees; and still the time to elapse before the rooms would be filled is beyond the grasp of the mind of man. Donating half the city to the foregoing patriotic purposes, there is still room for every man, woman, and child ever born since the creation of the world, or to be born during the next 36,784,940 centuries; and all without sending a single one to hell. "If this is not a cheerful prospect where is one to be found? There seems at all events to be no necessity for sending poor souls to hell for want of room in the new Jerusalem."

Furthermore the gates are always open (Rev. xxi, 25). Twelve of 'em! Big ones! and old Peter could hardly guard all twelve of 'em at once personally. Then he would not likely be armed with any dangerous weapon, for the swords shall be beaten into plowshares and the spears into pruning-hooks. J. F. BECK.

[Mr. Beck may be right, but we advise our readers to work out the problem for themselvs before accepting his result as the correct one.—ED. T. S.]

An Orphan's Home.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It affords me pleasure to be able to say to you, and through you to your thousands of good, true, high-minded, and noble readers who hav the love of man shed abroad in their hearts, with all manner of gods, devils, hells, priests, preachers, and churches banished from their affections, fears, and respect, that the fiat has gone forth that there is to be an orphan's home for Liberals founded here in the town of Liberal, Barton county, Mo., and as a beginning our most worthy, generous, and big-hearted friend, A. Minski, of Superior, Neb., givs us one thousand dollars in cash. I giv one thousand dollars in land and cash, and others are promising us aid. We hav one of the prettiest cites you can imagin for our orphan's home, and I hope we will be able to build a house that will reflect honor on the Liberals of the world. We would be glad to receive donations, suggestions, or anything else that would be of interest or aid to us. We would be glad for our architects to send us drawings and plans for the building. We will become incorporated about the 20th of April. G. H. WALSER.

Book Notice.

DEITY ANALYZED AND THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

This book is one more valuable contribution to Liberal literature. It analyzes the creator, as well as all other kinds of gods, and sweeps them away into nothingness. The deities are killed stone dead over and over again—so totally used up that not even the usual "grease spot" is left. Botanists, when they analyze a flower, carefully take off calyx, petals, stamens, and pistils, and then dissect the seed vessel. But the different parts are all lying scattered here and there to show the flower was once an entity; but Kelso analyzes the deity so thoroughly that only a blank void of empty nothingness is revealed, showing that there never was anything at all there—not even the shadow of a shade.

He shows up the inconsistency, absurdity, and impossibility of there ever having been such a god as the Bible tells us of—a god who had a body and was subject to human passions, wants and appetites, who was the source of evil, and who broke his own promises, and encouraged lying and deception in others; who even aided his children in committing robbery, murder, slavery, concubinage, and polygamy, and "who was accustomed to pardon sins in return for roast beef and human sacrifices."

The devil makes one of the best pleas of self-defense that is on record. True, he becomes a little obscene when he talks of the adulteries of Hosea, Abraham, Jacob, Judah, Lot, the holy virgin, and the Lord, and others of like ilk, but as it is pious gospel stuff probably St. Anthony will overlook the indiscretion and read the racy tales with the same unctuous gusto that he does the ones contained in his noted collection of like gems of naughtiness.

The book kills off all the sanctity of the old Bible legends, and is well worth its price. ELMINA.

Two Things with Which I Am Well Pleased—Yea, Three.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There are three things with which I am much pleased, namely: First, Mr. Bennett's faithful and supremely able labors abroad, given from his pen in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Second, the grand fact that there are able men, such as T. B. Wakeman, Geo. N. Hill, and others, devising a new astronomical scientific manhood calender era which leaves out "our Lord" and religious superstition. And third, Mr. Editor Protempore, I am highly pleased with the able manner in which you hav conducted THE TRUTH SEEKER during Mr. Bennett's absence. Your editorials hav been well timed, able, and vigorous. The way you handled that soft young man of Ohio who got submerged by the girls, music, and magnetism of the Methodists was just fun. DR. ANDREWS.

M. Monteil's Catechism.

From the Contemporary Review.

Q. What is God? A. God is an expression.

Q. What is the exact value of this expression? A. The exact value of the word is "nature."

Q. What is nature? A. The totality of all we know to exist in the infinit universe.

Q. Do you believe in a supreme being? A. I only believe what my reason permits me to believe, and my reason refuses to admit the principle of the government of nature by any being whatever.

Q. The learned, then, hav not found out God? A. No; they are all agreed in denying his existence.

Q. If there is no God, who, then, created the heaven and the earth? A. Neither the heaven, nor infinity, nor the earth has been created.

Q. There is no first cause, then? A. No; for all that we can not prove scientifically has no existence, and denies itself until proof of the contrary.

Q. How is it, then, that there are gods? A. Because man has invented them.

Q. What is the soul? A. Nothing.

Q. Is it not a thing, then, existent in nature?. A. No.

Q. What is generally understood by the word "soul?" A. Thought, independent of matter.

Q. Can such independence exist? A. No; since everything belongs to the material order.

Q. The soul, then, does not return to God, who is all? A. No; for God is formed of that which exists, and the soul does not exist.

Q. What is man? A. Man is one of the most favored products of the earth. In consequence of his material conformation he possesses a stronger dose of intelligence than any other animal.

Q. The materiality of the soul, then, involving its negation, there is no future life? A. No; as the soul no longer constitutes for us an independent and imperishable individuality, there is no future life, unless we continue to liv by our works.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for which send the Round-the-World books to Henry Leach, this place. Am in hopes of procuring a few more names.

Respectfully, C. K. SNYDER.

LOWELL, MASS., April 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is my "V," which, if it is too late to send the editor off. or yet to bring him back, may still be in season to welcome him home. Please send the books to my address. DANA HILT.

ROSE, N. Y., April 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is ten dollars—five for the Round-the-World fund and the rest as ordered. Success to you and the cause for which you are doing such effectiv service. Yours, S. J. HOPPING.

ELGIN, ILL., April 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Still they come—that is, the "V's." Here are two of them for your book of travels to be sent to J. P. Corry and O. E. Daniels, both of this town. This makes four I hav ordered. If I can do more I will. Hoping you and yours prosperity, I am

Yours fraternally, J. W. ARCHIBALD.

[We return our thanks to friend Archibald for his friendly labors, and trust we may continue to merit his good offices.—ED. T. S.]

CENTRAL CITY, COL., April 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I believe I am putting in an appearance at the eleventh hour. Endeavoring to pav my honest debts and keep my head above water left me penniless, but sink or swim, I am going to subscribe for the captain's trip around this four-cornered globe. I hav circumnavigated this flat surface (so called by early Christian fathers) three times. I want Mr. Bennett to explain to us western heathen how he kept going easterly from New York and at the same time, traveling east on a flat surface, arrived at his old starting-place, which I trust he will safely arrive at. May he liv for years and be supported by all friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Their name is legion. Inclosed is $5. JOHN JORDAN.

DELPHI, IND., April 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $10—$5 for the books to help Bro. Bennett home, $2.25 to hav them bound in leather, and $3 for my Bible, which expires on the 23d inst. I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER for ten dollars a year. It points out so many passages of scripture that make the scales fall from my eyes, which the preachers never read on the pulpit. Our city has about three thousand inhabitants, and mixed up with all kinds of so-called Christians. Half of them will agree with you, but they say you must believe the Bible or you will go to hell, and that is a place I never saw, nor any one else.

I feel so interested in his Round-the-World trip that I can hardly wait for the next number. He throws more light and knowledge in the brains of mankind than in all the holy books combined together. My best wishes for his safe return.

Yours truly, JOHN G. KESSLER.

TUNNEL, IOWA, April 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to announce that I am receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER now very regular, and also some of the copies which were missed. And for all the delays and lay-overs through the carelessness of deficient postmasters, it seems to withstand the cuffs and buffs wonderfully. No doubt that if it had been the Christian Union, the Christian Advocate, or one hundred of Talmage's sermons that I had subscribed for, they of course would not require for the county to be inserted upon the wrapper; only the name in full of the person, or perhaps the initials would be only necessary to carry it through all safe. But, Mr. Editor, you must not think thuswise of our bold TRUTH SEEKER, because instead of having stationed generals and sympathizers all along the route, it has just as many enemies as the Christian Union, etc. has friends and enemies. So be careful that THE TRUTH SEEKER is securely wrapped with the wrapper so that the vision of the old, owlish Christian eye shall be obstructed from seeing the word Truth, as this is the part they absolutely abhor and don't want that it should be seen, so that whenever they find it they cast it aside or send it astray. But this is the most which they can do; as it is but for a short period they can hide the truth; it must came out in defiance of their old night book, and shine on the bright, the beautiful, and the grand works of nature. Inclosed please find $6—five for Round-the-World, and other as described. Hoping that our martyr and much respected D. M. Bennett will be landed home with health and safety, loaded down with facts and truths that will act like torpedoes that will blow up and cave in everything left of superstitious orthodoxy.

Yours in success, ROBT. FLEMING.

GRAND ISLAND, April 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar, for which send on your paper for another four months. I regret that circumstances prevent me sending more at present, but I must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER, even if I deny myself some other necessary. I would gladly contribute my mite to the Round-the-World fund were it in my power to do so. Not from any vain desire to appear conspicuous, but I think it a duty we all owe to our fellow-beings to help to raise this Christian midnight darkness that now envelops us. We are told "Christ reprimanded the Jews for loving darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil." But in this, the nineteenth century, his followers not only refuse to see the light themselvs, but deny others the right to use the intellectual lamps nature has lit for them. They tell us "God created us," but deny us the use of our brains, which must hav originated from the same source our bodies did, or will they argue "the devil gave us our brains?" Now if the devil gave us our brains, how can God hold us responsible for the right use of those brains furnished us by the devil? On the other hand, if God givs us our brains, what right has puny man to dictate to us whether we may think or not think? What are such men but arrogant knaves? presumptuous intruders upon the rights of man? Who can believe God creates human beings and then engages the devil to stuff their heads full of errors in order to giv priests a job to convert them again to right thinking, and to allow the devil to get such an advantage over him as to rake in ninety-nine per cent of the human family for purposes of agonizing torture in a lake of burning brimstone? I don't believe anything in human form (however wicked) could delight in such horror or take pleasure in seeing thousands of millions of tons of human bodies melting eternally in one molten mass of burning liquid. Oh, what ignorance, what superstitious nonsense! How brutalizing and degrading to mankind is a cold, selfish, unfeeling, inhuman, hard-hearted, inconsistent, erroneous, fiendish, hoggish, and blood-thirsty religion!

Everywhere that Christianity predominates, the humble, industrious classes are made the serfs of Christian gamblers and usurpers, who roll in luxury upon the misery of their fellow-beings. Christianity enslaves both body and mind, especially when applied to the industrial classes. The useful citizen is always the mudsill of the non-useful usurper in idleness, and for one to hav too much brains is accounted to him as a great crime. Yours for emancipation,

WALTER SIMONDS.

PRESTON, IOWA., Apil 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am aware that I am in arrears for my paper since January 1st, but I hav been away from home all winter, and been most of the time at Mr. A. J. Brown's and Mr. A. D. Ferris's, at Pipestone City, Minn. Both are cousins of mine, and both take that champion of truth, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Though I was away from home I enjoyed perusing its learned and pleasing pages nearly every week, and we all enjoyed very much the interesting letters of our champion of Freethought, Mr. D. M. Bennett.

Inclosed you will find three dollars for my paper for the year 1882, which you are so justly entitled to. Here is health, happiness, and a safe return to him.

Fraternally yours, JOHN DURANT.

TERRELL, TEX., April 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find three dollars to pay my subscription for the present year. I would willingly send five more for the books of travel, but am poor like many other Freethinkers. There are other books published by Mr. Bennett which I would like to hav, but will be compelled to wait till a more convenient season.

There are a few here that hav opinions of their own, but many more that let the clergy think for them. This town contains about fifteen hundred inhabitants, and supports nine churches. Oh, that an Ingersoll, an Underwood, or a Bell would come over into Macedonia and help us! There is a wide field for some good Freethought lecturer in this part of Texas. I hav done what I could, and hav opened the eyes of several to a sense of their condition of following false gods and of supporting nuisances called clergymen. But I am only a mechanic, and reply only when some Christian attacks me or makes some lying remarks in reference to one of our leading Infidels. This is a country where Christian laws are very strict, but Christian morals very loose. Every man here that is an evil-disposed or wicked person, even if he is a Christ believer, is called an Infidel, and they cannot be brought to see it in any other light. I hav taken your paper from the first number, and shall so continue as long as I am able to pay for it. I read it and then send it out on a missionary tour, and in this way it is doing good. I hav lately had several calls for papers to read, yet these same persons are afraid to hav the paper come to them through the post-office for fear of hurting their business. Such is life! JOHN C. MILLER.

MOUNT FOREST, CANADA, April 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find seventy-five cents, for which please send me "The Godly Women of the Bible."

Accept my great esteem for you for the way you used up that Barnesville "ladies' man." I could not help exclaiming, "Well done, Macdonald!"

I am sorry to hav to send you word of the death of one of your old subscribers, Mr. Joseph Pilcher. He died in Winchester, Va., on the 2d inst., and was brought up here and buried on the 6th. He has been a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER from near its commencement and was one of the oldest Liberals in this part of the country. His end was peace. He was between seventy and eighty years of age, and was very fresh and activ until a few weeks ago, when he removed to Virginia for the good of his health, but died there. Yours,

WILLIAM LEWIS.

NANKIN, MICH., March 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: This communication is inscribed by way of encouragement to the many Spiritual and Liberal organization now struggling for existence without chart or compass to direct them. What has been accomplished by the Spiritual and Liberal organization of Northern Michigan may be accomplished at other places by like commendable effort.

A few energetic spirits determined to hav a hall where right principles might be promulgated without a possibility of infringing upon others' fancied rights. Accordingly a meeting was called, and after deliberation a building committee was appointed, whose duty it was to solicit subscriptions and to take charge of the whole matter. About two day's labor collected subscriptions sufficient to warrant the committee that it would be safe to proceed. A site was kindly donated by the president of the Association, Mr. H. W. Tuttle, whose premises lay adjacent to the beautiful village of Newbury, Wayne county, Mich., with its twenty residences, two variety stores, Nankin post-office, and two churches. A site midway between the churches was determined upon, so that the worshipers of the blind God might look without their enshrined pulpits and behold a temple erected to the universal brotherhood of man. In their blind superstition prayer was offered to their gods to interfere in their behalf, and it was publicly proclaimed that should the work be attempted it would never more than get the frame up, but they counted without their host. One noble and energetic member of the committee, O. D. Chapman, kept the ball rolling, and without any regard to their sneers, prayers, or gods the work progressed. The committee had taken the precaution to solicit work on the structure from quite a number of those who reside within a radius of three or four miles of the site chosen.

All being in readiness, on the first day of December last the first blow was struck. One carpenter was employed to oversee the work, when men with teams and tools came pouring in, and any day might be heard from ten to twenty hands belting away with vigor and determination sublime. In three days the timber and lumber were on the ground, and by the ready hands of our workmen everything was in readiness for the raising on the fourth day. The young people present on this day were encouraged to lend a helping hand by the promis that in four weeks the hall would be in readiness for a New Year's sociable and dance. On Friday evening preceding the first of January the last blow was struck, complete outside and in, with with wall papered, stove in position, and a beautiful six-lighted chandelier, with patent burners, hung in the center hall, seated mostly with chairs sufficient to accommodate between three and four hundred. About eighty were present on this occasion to enjoy the festivities, and all went merry as a marriage bell. At the close of the sociable it was announced by the secretary that in two weeks (January 13th) two dedicatory addresses would be delivered, to conclude with a social dance in the evening. On the Sunday preceding the lectures the choir met at the hall to practice. Friday came, and with it as intelligent and attentiv an audience as ever graced any hall.

Mrs. L. A. Pearsoll, of Disco, Mich., delivered the opening address, which was replete with practical suggestions for the advancement of our race, followed by J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw, Mich., in an able address on the "Dethronement of the Gods and the Enthronement of Mankind." The reputation of the speaker is too extensivly known to require further comments, and the length of this report precludes the possibility of a synopsis of the lectures.

The building committee presented their report at this meeting, which was accepted, and the association formally took possession and assumed the indebtedness, but before the close of the exercises of the day every dollar was pledged or paid.

Those delighted with the terpsichorean art tarried for the evening's entertainment, and fifty numbers were sold, and all were highly pleased.

At the close of this entertainment it was announced by the secretary that on the following Sunday J. H. Burnham would speak at 11 A. M., and deliver a scientific lecture in the evening of the same day. Also in two weeks a meeting would be held in this hall to celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, the oration to be delivered by Mr. E. A. Chapman, of Lowell, Mich., and a poem read by Mrs. Chapman, of the same place, to conclude with a social hop in the evening. We hav been thus explicit in setting forth our plan and mode of procedure, hoping that some of our sister organizations, many of which hav better surroundings, might be inclined to go and do likewise. Those who had only vituperation to heap upon our efforts, looking for the interposition of their gods, now pass by on the other side with visages elongated and are fast sinking away into bulldog sullenness, hoping, no doubt, to discover some misstep whereby they may pounce upon and devour us. But now in the most friendly manner we extend the right hand of fellowship, and wish them to come and join with us, and we will do what we can to free their minds from that ignorance and superstition of past ages which is now tyrannizing over them. For plans and specifications, write to O. D. Chapman, secretary of the Association, who will cheerfully answer all inquiries.

Yours truly, EMMETT SMITH.

BISBEE, A. T., March 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: There is a poor show for Christianity here. We are about all Liberals. I think I can get some more subscribers soon. I havn't made the acquaintance of everybody yet, but am making good progress. Mr. Evans, a new subscriber, whose name and money I send you, would request you to advertise for a brother for him, Benjamin Evans, a nativ of Burrington, near Ludlow, Shropshire, England. When last heard from was in Detroit, Mich. Any information will be received with thanks.

There are no church bells tolling here on Sunday. The miners work Sundays as well as every other day. Bisbee has about five hundred inhabitants. It is situated in the Mull Mountains, healthy, and with good water.

Hoping Mr. Bennett will return safe and sound, I remain Your friend and well-wisher,

GEORGE LOCKESBY.

BAGGS, WYOMING, April 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $10 to pay for extra binding on my books—balance to go to Mr. J. Hacker, of Berlin, New Jersey, for his personal use. I saw a friend had proposed through THE TRUTH SEEKER for friends to come forward and help the old gentleman. I suppose others hav sent in response before. Mine, I hope, will help him as though sooner sent. I hav the promise of two or three subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER I hope to get soon. I would be lost without our dear old Investigator and TRUTH SEEKER. I am very much attached to both papers. Sincerely, GEORGE BAGGS.

OMAHA, NEB., April 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The following conversation really occurred between your correspondent and a gentleman who has the reputation of being a wise, intelligent, and very learned man:

Q. Who made God? A. God always was and always will be.

Q. I don't believe it; who and what is God? A. An omnipotent spirit, who can never die, and never had birth.

Q. Who gave him his omnipotence? A. No one; he always was omnipotent.

Q. How do you know he can never die and never had birth? A. Because the Bible tells us so.

Q. But supposing the Bible is false? A. But it is not false.

Q. Well, but suppose it is false? A. Oh, but you can't suppose the truth to be false.

Q. How do you know it is the truth? A. Because I know.

Q. Who told you? Did God himself? A. No, he did not.

Q. Then you don't know; you only think so? A. Yes, I do know it's the truth.

Q. Will you believe me if I convince you you are wrong? A. No, I won't; you can't stuff any Ingersoll trash down my throat.

Q. Do you believe in a hell? A. Yes.

Q. Where bad people will burn forever and ever. A. Yes.

Q. Could you put a son of yours into a roaring furnace of fire to burn forever and ever, and know that his tortures would never cease, even if he were the most heartless, hardened villain that ever lived? A. Well, no; but that is different.

Q. Oh, you could not be bad enough to do that, and yet your God, who is so good, can and does do it every day without feeling a bit of remorse for his horrible crimes. Quite an exemplary God you hav, really! A. Sir, you astound me with such sacrilegious talk! Good-day; I won't listen to your profane questions any longer. You will die some day, and then you will find out there is a God, and a hell also. Look out you don't go there.

"I hope I do meet him," I muttered; "if he's as you represent him to be I'll hav the pleasure of giving him a good thrashing." JOS. LACHAPELLE.

DURAND, ILL., April 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: At our last Liberal League meeting the inclosed letter was received from Solomon Fisher, who you will at once perceive is an old veteran. The League voted it be sent you for publication, as your paper has the largest circulation among them of any Freethought journal.

I send you the original copy, and you can exercise your own judgment on publishing it entire or not.

Yours truly, A. S. BLAKE, Sec.

"ROCK GROVE, ILL., March 30, 1882.

"A. S. BLAKE, Dear Sir: Please receive my heartfelt thanks for the cordial invitation of the Durand and Davis Liberal League, and yourself, for inviting me to your meetings. Gladly would I meet you, as I know by experience that skeptics and unbelievers are always intelligent and whole-souled fellows. But my useful days are spent. I hav reached my three score and ten, and am fully played out physically. It is seldom I leave the house. In fine summer days I sometimes venture out to our village (Rock Grove) in order to get a whack at the preachers and leaders of Christianity, but as I hav followed that kind of business in a private way all my life, they are so shy they won't say as much as devil, hell, or blood, in my hearing. I am told that they in a guarded way let drive at me when they get behind their 'coward's castles,' but are very careful to not make it personal or direct. Poor fellows! they know they are on the down grade of an inclined plain, where not even a bush offers its service to giv them a momentary check.

"Well, we old fellows hav had a hard time of it to get the ball rolling. It was pitch darkness at first, but light at last began to gleam. Fifty years ago it seemed a mere cow-path in a dense forest, but now it's a railroad of the first quality. I hope the young and middle-aged will keep the ball moving with constantly accelerating speed, till every vestige of superstition is banished from this otherwise beautiful world. Fraternally yours, SOLOMON FISHER."

TUSTIN, MICH., April 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please giv the readers of your paper a short sketch on how nunneries are conducted? How are nuns supported, etc.? I will be pleased to correspond with Liberals that contemplate seeking homes in Northern Michigan. Here we hav a very healthy climate, a new country, hence land is cheap, though the government land is all taken here in this county. I am not a land-dealer, nor in any way connected with any monopoly for the sale of land, but wish to aid those what I can in seeking homes in a new country. Inclosed please find fifty cents to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to C. M. Lathrop. He has long since escaped from the clutch of superstition. Although he is poor in purse he is rich in honor, manhood, and scientific knowledge, respected by all who know him. SIMON B. ROOT.

READING, PA., April 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" came duly to hand in good condition. I am very much pleased with it, and think it is the best book of travels for fact, truth, and reliability that ever came out for such a price. I thank friend Bennett and all that gave a helping hand to produce it. H. W. HOLLENBUSH.

TOWN CREEK, ALA., April 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of March 25th I notice a subscriber asks the question where certain scripture could be found, viz., where a man should slay his brother, the son of his mother, his wife, etc., in case they made a proposition to serve any other gods. You stated that it could be found in Numbers xiii, 6. I was reading Ingersoll's reply to Judge Black to one of my orthodox neighbors, and came to the place where he made reference to that same scripture. My Christian friend denied there being any such scripture, so I referred to your paper and then to the thirteenth chapter of Numbers, but failed to find it. [It was a typographical error, corrected in the issue following the one in which it appeared.—ED.] I confess that I was stumped, though I didn't let my neighbor discover it. I knew I had read the scripture myself, so I decided that it must be in Deuteronomy, and sure enough, thirteenth chapter, and sixth verse. My friend who denied the existence of the above-named scripture is a son of one of the ablest Baptist preachers in northern Alabama. He is clerk in a Baptist church, and is said to be well versed in scripture, also a good historian, and in addition to all that he is a justice of the peace.

I noticed in January last a paragraph in Pomeroy's Great West speaking in complimentary terms of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and stating also that D. M. Bennett was then in the Holy Land, and that an interesting letter could be read from him every week by subscribing for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Consequently I subscribed. I had read Marvin's travels through that mythic country, and I wanted to read Bennett's. I am well pleased. I confess I used to giv myself a great deal of trouble about the mystery of godliness. It was something I never could understand. Your paper is the first Infidel writing that I ever saw. It givs me more pleasure and good solid comfort than any paper I can read. I imagin that I hav experienced some as good religious emotions since I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER as a great many Christians seemingly do at church.

Speaking of Ingersoll's reply to Judge Black, I borrowed the work from a steward in the Methodist church. He said the Christian Advocate published Black's side, but didn't giv Ingersoll's, so he was determined to see the other. I here inclose one dollar, for which please send books as per order. Lest I weary you, I will desist. W. J. BEENE.

BOSTON, April 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I received the Round-the-World book in good condition, and I am very much pleased with the same. It occurred to me, however, that seventeen cents' worth of stamps for mailing one book must be a great expense to you where you hav to mail so many; therefore please accept fifty cents' worth of stamps inclosed. Yours truly,

J. SCHUH.

LOWELL, MICH., April 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please correct as follows in THE TRUTH SEEKER:

In H. L. Green's notice of Miss Juliette Bowen's feat of climbing the church steeple and hurrahing for Ingersoll he should hav stated that people desiring her photo should address her instead of me, inclosing twenty-five cents. Her address is Lowell, Mich.

E. A. CHAPMAN.

SHELBURNE FALLS, MASS., Feb. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4, which giv me credit for. I suppose Bro. Bennett is in that land where Christ was born and worked at the carpenter's trade; turned the grindstone for Joseph, and lived some thirty years and then was crucified between two thieves by a little handful of Jews. I hope Mr. Bennett arrives home safe. S. N. MAXAM.

The Statute Against Blasphemy.

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ., Dear Sir: I desire to call your attention to sections 255, 256, 257, and 258 of the Penal Code which goes into effect May 1st, next.

The present statute provides: "Every person who shall profanely curse or swear shall," etc. (7 ed. R. S., vol. 3, p. 1973.)

I hav drawn an act and sent it to our senator, Judge Nelson, who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to repeal these sections of the Penal Code.

Judge Nelson has promised me to introduce the bill.

I inclose my reasons, which I hav also sent to Albany.

If you or any other members of the bar are disposed to take any activ measures to accomplish the repeal of these sections, I should be pleased to co-operate with you.

Very truly, J. L. WILLIAMS.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y., April 10, 1882.

Sections 255, 256, 257, and 258 of chapter 1, title x, laws of 1881, chapter 676, known as the Penal Code, should be repealed.

REASONS.

I.—There are more than a million citizens of this state who do not recognize Jesus Christ as a God or as a divine personage, and many more who neither recognize or hav any distinct idea as to who or what the Holy Ghost is.

II.—As to these citizens it would be as unjust to name in the statute, with others, Confucius, Mohammed, Buddha, or any dead reformer or philosopher as the subject of "blasphemy," as Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost.

III.—The repeal of these sections will not interfere with the power of courts to punish for contempt as now provided by law.

IV.—The sections which should be repealed do not protect persons in their religous opinions or practices, but on the contrary they undertake to establish and set up, contrary to the theory of our secular government, as gods and divine personages, beings believed to be imaginary by millions of our most intelligent citizens.

V.—Divine personages, whatever number there may be, require no protection from finite men.

VI.—There is no public sentiment by which enactments against blasphemy can be enforced.

Book Notice.

THE OCCULT WORLD. By A. P. Sinnett. Colby & Rich. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Mr. Sinnett's volume is highly interesting, and it tells enough about the occult philosophy to make one wish to know a great deal more. While taking care to explain that occultism must not be confounded with Spiritualism, he does not by any means disdain the "revelations" accomplished by the latter. He believes in the existence of a set of men known as "The Brothers," in India and Thibet, who enjoy the miraculous results of the labors of their ancestors during thousands of years and who hav a greater and more wondrous control over the laws of nature than is exhibited by the proudest inventions to be found in Europe and America. He believes that letters, roses, and jewels and other ponderable matter may be instantaneously transmitted through space by being disintegrated at the beginning of the passage and integrated again as they reach the end. He does not claim that he ever saw this done or that he ever had any demonstration of its having been done; but, having perfect faith in Mme. Blavatsky, and Mme. Blavatsky having assured him that such was the case with letters of his that he had placed in her keeping, he regards this as evidence quite unquestionable.

Such books as Mr. Sinnett's will be read with about the same degree of interest as that with which one peruses a clever novel. Few sane people will hav any belief in the truth of his remarkable statements, and the fact that the "Brothers" keep secret the mysterious knowledge, the spread of which would benefit mankind, will always encourage a prejudice against them. It will be high time for them and their proselytes to sneer at the achievements of the foremost men of science in Europe and America, when they hav accomplished one-hundredth part of the good of these noble pioneers who publish their discoveries to the world. Still "The Occult World" is entertaining reading, and not the less so because of Mr. Sinnett's eager credulity.—Telegram.

Fruition.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

In memory of Mrs. L. M. Nicholson, of Vinennes, Ind., who lived, worked, and died in the iberal Faith.

We know not what the fruit may be;
The future hides itself away,
And our short life is but the seed
Whose bloom is in some ampler day;
The present is not all we hav,
Its barren soil contains a gem
Unseen, whose luster yet will shine
Upon the soul's far diadem.

Ah, thou hast labored in the dark,
And few the reapers by thy side;
The golden harvest was not seen.
Men fed on husks in blinded pride;
Thou saw'st the glory far away,
And dreamed and toiled as fortune blest,
Yet the wide world went rolling by,
Seeking, yet knowing not the best.

Was it a failure, life, to thee,
Because thy work is yet uncrowned?
Because there seems no end to this
But thy pale form within the ground?
Shall we with hopeless tears bedew
The sod that covers thy true breast,
Shall we believe that ended here
Is all the grandeur of thy quest?

From the dark bosom of the flood
The lily blooms with heart of fire,
So ever and forever still
From hight to hight will worth aspire;
It cannot die, through darksome hours,
It onward glows to fervent bloom,
From chambers of the night it leaps
And the long hidden fires illume.

Our work is not the test of life,
So far as outwardly expressed;
The measure is the thought within,
The glowing purpose of the breast.
Through that we touch the endless life,
Of all the stars and all the years,
And from the bosom of the grave
The harvest of our life appears.

No failure! the fruition sweet,
Was in thy life and in thy task;
There was a glory none can speak,
Which death shall evermore unmask;
The crown was with thee, though unseen,
In faithful service, day by day;
The seed is planted, and from hence,
Thy rose shall flower to perfect ray.

The Fear of Poverty.

BY R. D. CHAPMAN.

It's the fear of poverty that haunts us through life,
Not demons from hell, as the priesthood say;
For man against man creates all the strife,
To keep poverty's curse, not devils, away.

It's the fear of poverty that worries the strong,
Till life's manly vigor begins to decay,
Endeavoring to grasp what to others belongs,
To drive poverty—that savage—away.

It's the fear of poverty that withholds us from sharing
Our scanty lot with a fellow-man,
For this beast at us forever is staring,
Though plenty and peace may be in the land.

It's the fear of poverty that makes some men rave
In the death-reeking walls of the maniac's cell,
Whilst others seek rest in a suicide's grave,
And bid the fierce beast an eternal farewell.

It's the fear of poverty that makes some revive
From the shock of the death of relation or friend,
For now 'tis vouchsafed for them all to survive,
As he willed them in dying a yearly stipend.

Must poverty's fear continue forever,
A terror to cowards, a foe to the bold,
Making life but a long unavailing endeavor,
Disappointing the youthful and cursing the old?

Lecture Notes.

Circumstances hav transpired to bring me again to the "city of sin," which I hav found occasion to pass through a number of times this winter, on my way to the different fields of labor wherein I hav been engaged. On the first of January I reached Burlington, Iowa, and began work there, announcement of which was made at the time in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Six Sunday evening lectures resulted in the organization of a League, which, well officered, proposes to keep alive the interest awakened in Liberalism, and to co-operate, as best it may, with the National Liberal League. If, at the close of the year, it does not hav money enough in its treaury to engage B. F. Underwood to giv a course of lectures under its auspices, it hopes at least to increase the circulation of such genuinly Liberal papers as the Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Liberty, and Man, and possibly to organize a Liberal reading-room. Its treasurer, Cornelia Boecklin, whose guest I was during my stay, has, with her husband, Werner Boecklin, for many years devoted extra time, money, and energy to the propagandism of Infidelity. Their elegant home, filled with flowers, books, music, and plenty of cheer, has been the center from which has radiated, continually, an influence making for liberty, not only in religion, but in industry and the social life. Both Mr. and Mrs. Boecklin are ardent labor reformers, whose money and influence is devoted to the righteous cause of the people. Their Liberalism is of a very practical kind, as shown by the fact that you find on their table, always, the Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Physiologist, Liberty, Man, Chicago Express, Infidel Pulpit, and any number of newspapers. Our Infidel friends elsewhere would do well to thus generously patronize the Liberal press. Tho young son, Master Werner, is a model lad, brought up as a Liberal lad should go, unbiased by Sunday-schools of fashions, ruddy, bright-eyed, polite, helpful—a lad from whom the Liberal world may yet hear.

I hav dwelt thus long upon the characteristics of these friends of Freetnought, because it seems so desirable that health, harmony, and independence should combine in every Liberal home to make it suggestiv of a "heaven on earth" sometime and somewhere. There are numbers of Infidels in Burlington, whose names deserve honorable mention. Theo. Guelich, a German Freethinker, and prominent citizen, assured the League of his warm interest in the work, by a substantial token; Wm. Ellery, Seth Eggleston, Max Stempel, Mr. Meader, C. Winzer, and many others gave activ and financial support. Though they number but sixteen charter members, they look hopefully to the future, and it is safe to say that the Burlington League is not dead.

Closing my lectures at Burlington in February, I passed through Chicago on my way to Durand, Ill. I remained in the city one Sunday, and attended the meeting of the Chicago League, which one year before (after the memorable struggle at that Congress, when liberty was again on trial for her life) I had organized under anything but auspicious circumstances. There had been forty charter members, but when I entered the pleasant hall where the League now holds its meetings, every seat and all the standing room was occupied, and I was told that the League numbers over one hundred members, and that every lecture is attended by eager and enthusiastic listeners. Mr. W. F. Peck was the speaker of that evening, and his subject "Evolution;" and as he compared the Christian story of creation with the facts of evolution, and as eloquence, sarcasm, and wit drove home the points with telling effect, the audience burst into hearty and prolonged applause, and I came to the conclusion that, if that League was dead, it certainly produced very lively spiritual manifestations.

The criticisms which followed the lecture indicated that if the members did not belong to the Philosophical Society, their democratic intellects were capable of polished and vigorous expression.

I hav no doubt that the zeal and activity of the Chicago League this year is largely due to the masterly exposition of League principles made by our honored president, T. B. Wakeman, in the closing congressional address. Few who listened to it could hav failed to be animated by the noble spirit of him whose "intellectual aristocracy" manifests itself not in denunciation of and opposition to the rights of the people, but in magnificent defense of them, in the face of most shameful misrepresentation and abuse.

Leaving Chicago, I hastened on to Durand, where I was to giv a course of lectures for the purpose of organizing a League. The weather seemed gotten up especially to prevent the Freethinkers of the country from attending the meeting, nevertheless they came from long distances, and though the first meeting was not large, yet the audience kept on increasing until the court-house, in which the lectures were given, was filled with earnest and approving listeners. The neighboring town of Davis sent out a delegation, at last inviting me to visit and speak for them, which I did on three consecutiv evenings. I was told, while there, that Mr. Underwood spoke in that town some twelve years ago to large and interested audiences. But the churches hav kept right on, and the Freethinkers, being unorganized, hav been rather inactiv, a few only engaged in a sort of guerrilla warfare.

Taking in the situation at Durand and Davis, I laid before them the necessity for organization, and in response to my invitation that they unite upon the League platform, twenty-nine names were signed, and a League charter at once procured.

There are many activ, earnest, and intelligent Freethinkers in that vicinity. John Steres, O. F. Hoyt and wife, Andrew Blake, O. H. Jacobs, A. B. Bates, Sophia Bates, E. R. Evans, and David Campbell, of Durand; Thos. Hayes, Elijah Clark, and Samuel Davis, of Davis, and many others deserve especial mention.

They propose to read Man, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Investigator; to make effort to hav others read them; to hav Liberal festivals, and, as often as they can afford to do so, to employ some Liberal lecturer not afflicted with that moral mildew called the "concensus of the competent;" to bury their departed according to Liberal principles (as per example of our Elgin League), and in every way, and by every means demonstrate that, while many "pure" and "proper" Infidels may report the dissolution of the National League auxiliaries, and load the members with reproach, that League, like others, is not dead. More live Liberal items anon.

Yours for the defense of truth and liberty,
MRS. H. S. LAKE.

How a Spiritualist Vanquished a Materialist.

THE ENEMY'S GUNS TURNED ON HIM.

"Friend Storey, the Materialists hav the true scientific view of death. Here it is, boiled down, and you ought to see it. Thought is the product of the brain. You take food, which, passing through the blood, givs the brain power to think. You stop taking food and you die. The brain produces no more thought, and you cease to exist as a person. There is no personal life after death, and you Spiritualists are deluded."

"Friend White, you do state it sharply and I agree with you in the premises. Let us see if you may not agree with me in drawing a different conclusion. I hav lately been reading the discoveries of Prof. Michael Faraday, the eminent English chemist, and they hav impressed me much. He agrees with you that thought is the product of an organism, that is, of a brain made of matter; but the brain he speaks of he says is inside the brain you mean. He says that matter too refined for you and me to see can be held in an organized form provided the form can first be builded inside the physical body we see. To illustrate: a boy is born. That boy is an organism, beginning on earth. He continues to old age here. By food, exercise, etc., he builds up a refined body (made of the refined matter which comes from his food, drink, etc.,) inside the body we see, and when he has made this inside refined material body complete he withdraws it from the coarser one which we bury, while he livs on, thinking with his refined brain just as he thought with it before death."

"Do you mean to say that Faraday states that the boy thinks with his inner brain while in the earth body?"

"Yes. He thinks with the inside brain, and uses the outside one to convey his thoughts in language to people. So you see Faraday agrees with you that thought is the product of the brain."

"Yes, I see your point. He refers to the inside brain, and I refer to the outside brain, the one the doctors analyze after death."

"Yes, that is it, and I cannot see how you can put aside his position, as you must admit that the universe contains an immense amount of matter which is invisible."

"I admit that, for oxygen and hydrogen gases are invisible, yet they are matter."

"Yes, and there may be much other matter more refined than these gases. As all atoms are indestructible and are capable of entering into combinations with each other they may combine to form an organism too refined to be visible to us and support it indefinitly."

"Well, this is a new view of immortality. If organisms can be continued in the invisible state of matter then thought may be produced after death. I must see these books."

"You can get them of D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York, for thirty cents. Send for the Faraday pamphlets, Nos. 1, 2, 3."

"I shall do so at once. You hav opened a new world of thought to me."

BLISS'S
Electro-Magnetic Planchette,

A wonderful and mysterious little instrument that combines electricity and animal magnetism in assisting Spirit intelligence to communicate through it with mortals. It has been in the market a little over two years, and during that time thousands of skeptical persons, yes, downright Materialists, hav been convinced that this Planchette has been MOVED BY A POWER independent of themselvs while their hands hav been placed passivly upon it.

WHAT BLISS'S ELECTRO-MAGNETIC PLANCHETTE WILL DO.

It will answer either mental or spoken questions; giv communications from departed friends; tell correctly past, present, and future events; warn persons of coming danger; tells you who are your friends and enemies; develop writing and other phases of mediumship; will write for Materialists (if they possess the least mediumistic power) as readily as it will for mediums or believers in Spiritualism, etc.

It is a great source of amusement, as well as instruction, in the family during long winter evenings, and a desirable companion at the summer resort. It is not only the best, but it is the cheapest Planchette in the market.

SKEPTICS, TRY IT, and you will never be sorry, for you cannot fail to be convinced that death does not end all; but, on the contrary, spirits survive the death of the body and can communicate with mortals.

THE ADVANTAGES CLAIMED OVER OTHER PLANCHETTES.

First. A paste-board top in place of oiled, stained, or varnished wood.
Second. Five miniature batteries upon the top of each Planchette, upon which the fingers rest.
Third. Each Planchette is separately magnetized and assigned a band of developing spirits.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.
2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.
3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.
4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.
5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.
6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.
7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.
8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. V geli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Most of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultation by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, ni system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

Gems of Thought.

WHO noble ends by nobler means attains,
Or failing, smiles in exile or in chains,
Like good Aurelius, let him reign, or bleed
Like Socrates, that man is blest indeed.—Pope.

I AM not without hopes. O judges, that it is a favorable circumstance for me that I am condemned to die, for one of these two things must necessarily happen, either that death will deprive me entirely of all sense, or else that by dying I shall go from hence into some other place; wherefore, if all sense is utterly extinguished, and if death is like that sleep which is sometimes so undisturbed as to be even without the vision of dreams—in that case, O ye good gods! what gain is it to die! or what length of days can be imagined which would be preferable to such a night? And if the constant course of future time is to resemble that night, who is happier that I am. But if on the other hand, etc., etc.—Socrates's Speech after Condemnation.

THERE is peril in the habit of doing good; I do not mean merely in the case of hypocrisy; but I hav noticed that when a man feels that he is serving his fellow-men, he sometimes takes great liberties in the process. It was of this style of philanthrophists that old Count Gurowski spoke when he cautioned a young lady of my acquaintance, above all things, against marrying one of that class. "Marry thief!" he said, "marry murderer! but marry philanthrope—never!"—T. W. Higginson.

IF Christians would teach Infidels to be just to Christianity, they should themselves be just to Infielity. It can do truth no service to blink the fact, known to all who hav the most ordinary acquaintance with literary history, that a large portion of the noblest and most valuable moral teaching has been the work, not only of men who did not know, but of men who knew and rejected the Christian faith.—Mill's Liberty.

M. A. ANTONINUS compares the wise and human soul to a spring of pure, sweet water, which, though the passer-by may curse it, continues to offer him a draught to assuage his thirst; and, even if he cast into it mire and filth, hastens to reject it, and flows on pure and undisturbed. This recalls the equally beautiful image in the oriental scripture of the sandal-tree, which, in the moment when it falls before the woodman's stroke, givs its fragrance to the ax which smites it with death. —Samuel Longfellow.

IT has been often remarked that there is a great difference between theologic and scientific controversy. Theologians are proverbially vituperativ [remember the writer is himself a distinguished clergyman of no mean church], because it is a question of veracity; the truth of their views, their moral perceptions, their intellectual acumen. There exists no test but argument on which they can fall back. If argument fails, all fails. But the man of science stands calmly on the facts of the universe. He is based upon reality. All the opposition and controversy in the world cannot alter facts, nor prevent the facts from being manifested at last. He can be calm, because he is a witness for the truth.—Fred. W. Robertson.

THE initiation of all wise and noble things comes, and must come, from individuals; generally, at first, from some individual. The honor and glory of the average man is that he is capable of following that initiation; that he can respond internally to wise and noble things, and be led to them with his eyes open.—Mill's Liberty.

THE desire for a life that will not cease is no more evidence that we shall hav it than the desire for boundless wealth is evidence that we shall possess that. The wish for a continuance of this life beyond the grave is no more evidence of its ultimate realization than the Indian's desire for his bow and arrow, his dog, his pony, and his scalping-knife, after death, is evidence that he will hav them then.—B. F. Underwood.

IN all leading nations of the world the Christian is to-day in the majority; he is on the popular side; the sword is in his hand; wealth and earthly opportunity are with him; respectability and fashion giv him their indorsement. It is not the man who confesses himself a Christian, but the man who confesses that he is an Infidel to Christian belief, who is likely to-day to lose position and honor, and to fall under the social ban, and has to bear the cross of popular odium for his confession. Even the mobs are Christian to-day, and in their frenzied profanity swear by the name of the holy Nazarene.—N. G. Potter.

OUR current hypothesis about Mohammed, that he was a scheming impostor, a falsehood incarnate, that his religion is a mere mass of quackery and fatuity, begins to be really now untenable to any one. The lies which well-meaning zeal has heaped upon this man are disgraceful to ourselves only When Pocoche inquired of Grotius where the proof was of that story of the pigeon, trained to pick peas from Mohammed's ear, and pass for an angel dictating to him, Grotius answered that there was no proof.—Carlyle.

THE Tannese, when put to much inconvenience by the dust falling from a certain volcano, "were in the habit of praying to their gods for a change of wind." Certain other South Sea Islanders used to pray to their gods to avert the supposed calamity of a lunar eclips. "As the eclips passes off, they think it is all owing to their prayers," a mode of reasoning which presents an exact parallel to that employed by many Christians.—Viscount Amberley.

VOLTAIRE tells us "the Socinians affirm that the Christians passed three entire ages in forming by degrees the apotheosis of Jesus, and that they only raised this astonishing edifice by the example of the pagans who had deified mortals," and that "at the end of the sixteenth century there were more than 300 species of Christianity," and all these were, of course, born of legends, fables, and myths of the virgin-born sons of God.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

THE POET AND THE REPORTER —A STORY OF THE SANCTUM.

"Would it be too much trouble for one of you gentlemen to tell me where I can find the literary editor?" said a nice young man, as he entered the editorial rooms.

"No trouble at all to tell you where he is," replied the trotting-horse reporter; "the main difficulty would be in your getting there to interview him. The literary editor is at present breasting the sun-kissed billows of the limpid waves—at least that's where he said he was going. He is a yachter."

"A what?" asked the young man at the door.

"A yachter—sails around in a boat, and talks about shivering his timbers, and belaying his tarry toplights, and all such things as that. Always refers to his overcoat pocket as a 'mizzen hatch.' The literary editor would make Marryat and Mayne Reid think they were born in Iowa, and had never been nearer the sea than Keokuk."

"What is it you call him?" again asked the man at the door.

"A yachter."

"You probably mean a yachtman," suggested the visitor.

"Probably I do," was the reply, in a somewhat disappointed tone of voice. "A man can't make a peep around here but what some duck picks him up on the pronunciation of a word."

"I wish to see the literary editor in regard to a poem which I would like to see in next week's paper," said the young man.

"Did you write this poem yourself!" asked the horse reporter.

"Yes, sir." was the reply.

"I thought so," continued the admirer of Iroquois. "I thought there gleamed within your starry eye that weird, haunting look that enables us to drop on a poet the minute he shows up. What is your poem about?"

"Atalanta."

"I don't think that's much of a subject," said the authority on overhead checks. "Atlanta is only a second-class town, anyhow. Why didn't you wind up your muse for a few stanzas about Chicago, or Deadwood, or some place where things are lively?"

"I rather think you misapprehend me," said the poet. "My little effort does not relate to Atlanta, Ga., but to a person in classical history."

"Oh, you mean Atalanta, do you, instead of Atlanta?" replied the horse reporter. "How thoughtless of me to make such a mistake. I suppose you know all about Attie, and the big steeple-chase she was in?"

"Well, said the poet, in a hesitating manner, "of course I am familiar with the classics, but it has never come under my observation that Atalanta was ever the heroin of any such episode as the one to which you allude."

"Didn't know she was on the turf, and won the liveliest race ever run in Arcadia?"

"No, sir, I did not," replied the poet.

"Then you are not so sweetly fly as I took you to be," said the horse reporter, "and I will giv you a few pointers on Grecian history, and sweep away with the dimpled hand of knowledge the cobwebs of ignorance that obscure the horizon of your powerful mind. Atalanta was the daughter of Iasos, a high-rolling old Greek. When he wished her to marry she consented on condition that her suitor should run a race with her—a kind of weight-forage handicap. One fellow finally beat her. His name was Meilanion, and he was a regular masher. Venus just went loony about him, and had given him three apples from the garden of Hesperides. So when Meilanion started in the race with Atalanta he just whooped himself until he reached the quarter pole, and then he dropped one of the apples. Atalanta stopped to look at the beautiful fruit, and Meilanion got a long lead. He played this game at the half and three-quarter mile poles, and then scooted down the home-stretch at his best lick. Atalanta gave him a good race, but he finally beat her half a length in 2:24 1-4, and then she married him. That's a correct summary of the race, sonny, and you can bet on it," and the horse reporter smiled affably.

"No doubt you are right," said the poet, "and I must say that I am surprised at the knowledge displayed by one whose hair is so short. Do you think it will be possible to print my poem?"

"I guess likely," was the reply. "Just read it to us till we see how it goes."

The poet fished a piece of paper from his pocket, and read as follows:

There's a bit of broken blue in the sky,
A web of gray o'er the purple lake;
A gleam of silver along the strand
Where the long waves break.

A dove swoops down from the upper air—
Snowy pinions and scarlet feet;
There's a breath of spring in the orchard aisles,
Balmy and sweet.

This is Atalanta, that comes this way,
Bare white ankle and ripe red mouth,
Blown on the budding April winds
Up from the South.

"Well," said the equine journalist, "it would be hard to throw a stone down the street and not hit a man who could write slush like that. Our nine-dollar-a-week bard could do it with one had tied behind him."

"I should like to see him try," said the poet.

Turning to a young man who sat at a desk near by, the horse reporter requested him to "imitate that stuff." The young man wrote for a few minutes, and submitted the following:

There's a soggy crust on the custard pie—
The pie that our Myrtle tried to make;
A streak of yellow across the top
Of the tough sponge-cake.

A girl sweops up from the kitchen hot—
Large red elbows and larger feet;
She's the girl whose custard pies and cake
People can eat.

This is our Myrtle that comes this way—
Sealskin jacket and cartwheel hat;
She is a daisy to put on style,
Don't forget that.

"There," said the horse reporter, "now you see ——"

But the poet was gone.—Chicago Tribune.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey aronnd the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

Marriage AND Parentage

AND THE

SANITARY AND PHYSIOLOGICAL LAWS.

FOR THE

Production of Children of Finer Health and Greater Ability.

BY A PHYSICIAN AND SANITARIAN.

"The virtues of men and women as well as their vices may descend to their children."

"There is nothing Utopian in hoping for the time to come when men and women will consult a wise sanitarian before entering into the marriage relation."

The Southern Clinic, a journal of medicin and surgery, says: "We took up this book with prejudice, but soon saw the author was a physcian, and a good one too; a sound physiologist, an instructiv writer, and a man of high moral sense;" and adds, "A race of vigorous, beautiful, sweet-tempered people would be the result of the observance of its principles."

The Home Journal, Boston, says: "We earnestly commend it to all. Its influence can be only beneficial. The author has a thorough mastery of his subject.

Demorest's Family Fashion Magazine says: "It contains enough sensible hints to set up a family."

The Alpha, edited by Dr. Winslow, says: "We like the book thoroughly." And adds: "Send for it, fathers and mothers, for your own good and for the sake of your children, who are to fill your places when you are called up higher."

The Buffalo Express says: "Whoever buys this book will find it a paying investment."

The Scientific American says: "Books on this subject are usually written by 'cranks,' but this is radically different; it is scientific, sober, clean, and worthy of conscientious consideration by every possible parent, and particularly by the young."

Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, writes: "I hav read all of your works, and feel I must study this one. Your contributions to sanitary and social science hav all been imbued with the spirit of sound conservatism and earnest conscientiousness, all too rare among reformers. Whoever gods over this book will find himself on sacred ground. It is the most valuable of your many valuable books."

Prof. N. S. Townsend, of Ohio University, writes: "I am greatly pleased with this work. I hav loaned it to some of my pupils, who express delight with it. I hope every thoughtful young man and woman will read it."

Two Highlanders found themselvs unable to get into harbor in their boat, the waves driving it out to sea so persistently that Donald, after obstinately battling with the elements, cried out to Duncan in a dialect which we will not attempt fully to represent, "Go doon on your knees, mon, and offer a bit prayer." But before Duncan was on his knees the boat's keel grated on the beach, whereupon Donald shouted, "Stop praying, we've come ashore by our own exertions, and I'll no' be beholden to anybody."

IN the early days of the reign of Louis XVI., it was the etiquet for any person passing by the throne to bow almost to prostration, even though it were vacant. Yet, only a few years afterward, that same throne was no more revered than any other structure of wood and velvet. Never again, in any country, will thrones possess the odor of sanctity. The most despotic of Christian thrones is that of Russia, and one corner of that rests on rebels, who anxiously watch for the moment when they may topple it over.

A GERMAN comic paper, which ventured some fun about Prince Bismarck, has just had its circulation stopped for two years, at the end of which time it will presumably either be dead, or else furnish an extraordinary example of suspended animation; and meanwhile, that luckless editor who was put in jail three months for libeling the same august functionary has been sentenced to an extra week for taking in vain the name of Mr. Gambetta. The distinction between three months for Bismarck and a week for Gambetta is instructiv. But journalism in Germany is prosecuted under difficulties.

IF the statements now made by the railroad men in Florida are true, Bishop Payne will probably not get the $10,000 which he wants in consideration of having been put off a train. He claims to hav been riding on a first-class ticket, and to hav been put off of the train. The men on the road say that he was riding on an excursion rate ticket with a party of persons belonging to the African Methodist church, and that he wanted to go into a different car from the one which was assigned to them. He is highly esteemed as bishop of the African Methodist church, but there is some reason to believe that he has made a mistake in saying that he was ejected from the car because he was a colored man. Some of the railroad people insist that he left the train of his own accord.

THE Church Union says: "Never fancy that a little alcohol can do no harm, though much may; for the alcohol diffused through a gallon of beer or cider is just as poisonous as though it were condensed into a bottle of whisky or a flask of brandy. Young men, as you love your God, your country, your families, and yourselvs be entreated neither to make nor sell, diffuse nor imbibe, any kind of alcoholic beverage." And on the next page, in a column editorial notice of a grocery: "Quite a reputation has been gained for the excellent qualities of his teas and coffees, which are acknowledged to be the best obtainable on the east side. The same applies to his wines and liquors, comprising all the favorit brands. His claret wines are regarded by competent authority as equal to the finest in the market; these are his own importation, and are carefully bottled for family use." The Church Union evidently makes no attempt to be consistent.

THE old Good Friday custom of flogging an effigy of Judas Iscariot was, after a laps of two years, duly celebrated in the London docks on April 7th by the crews of three Portuguese and Maltese vessels. The effigy of the traitor, hewn out of a block of timber, was carried by chosen members of the crews round the quarterdeck and hanged from the yardarm, and each man chanted his vituperation as he lashed the figure with knotted ropes. The scourging over, Judas was cut down, thrown upon the deck, spat upon, cursed, and kicked to the galley fire, where he was burned into a charred mass, and then hurled into the water, after which the sailors went in procession to church. Isn't this rather ungrateful to Judas? What would hav become of the atonement scheme without him?

ONE of the effects of the trial of the tedious case of Mr. Hinman against Bishop Hare has been to show the low condition of religion among the Indians of the Niobrara diocese. It appears that these people are willing to circulate any scandals, no matter how baseless or unclean, and that they even take pleasure in so doing. These are not the heathen and ungodly Indians, but those who hav made profession of religion. The fact that there is a good deal of the pharisee in the spiritual make-up of some of these aborigines is shown by the remark one of them made when giving his testimony. Being asked what sort of a person a certain squaw was who had testified, he said: "She isn't a regular Christian at all; she's only a Presbyterian." The pharisee who said this belonged to the Episcopal household of faith, which he considered the only "regular" one. It is possible that the whole of this wearisome and disgusting case may hav to be tried over again, as Bishop Hare has appealed from the verdict of the jury which gave Brother Hinman $10,000, with which to make good his damaged reputation. It is a pity that such a trial cannot take place in the most rugged part of the mountainous wilds of Dakota rather than among a civilized community.

THERE is a certain cobbler in the village, who, although a worthy fellow, entertains unorthodox opinions, and with whom the clerk is therefore always at variance; and the latter givs me this curious account of his failing to obtain from the son of Crispin our Easter dues: "I am come for your Easter offering, Mr. Last," observed the ecclesiastic official, looking over the half-door behind which the little cobbler sits busily at work. "And what is an Easter offering, and why should I giv it?" inquired the skeptic. "Well, never you mind about that; only giv it, that's all." "Won't you stop and hav a bit of bacon with me, Mr. Clerk, for I am just going to hav my dinner?" "No, thank yer; I want yer Easter offering." "Well, then, take a drop o' summat warm; I've got some ale yonder upon the hob." The clerk could not help looking wistful, but he replied stoutly, as before, that he only wanted the Easter offering. "At least you will take a pipe?" insisted the cobbler; "here is tobacco and a box of lucifers." The clerk absolutely shook his head. "Very well," observed the cobbler, with a chuckle. "I've tried ye with a meat-offering, with a drink-offering, and with a burnt-offering, and now ye will hav no other sort of offering from me, I promis ye." And he kept his word.—English Rector.

THE reporters of the Boston Advertiser took a census of the church attendance of that city on a recent Sunday. They found a total of 124,909 people in the two hundred and fifty churches. The population of Boston is now somewhere toward 400,000, it having been 362,535 in 1880. Making allowances for the persons who may hav been counted twice, the enumeration having been made at the different services, it is safe to estimate that about one-quarter of the people of Boston were at church that day. That is a proportion much larger than would be found in our New York churches on a single Sunday. It is doubtful if the church attendance here number more than a fifth of the actual population of the city; and perhaps the proportion is not as large as that. The four hundred or more churches of New York provide sittings for about three hundred thousand people; but about two-fifths of the seats in the Protestant houses of worship are unoccupied on the average. The Catholic worshipers of New York are about equal to the whole of those of the various denominations of Protestanism. A complete and accurate census very likely would show them to be more numerous. The enumeration made in Boston showed that of the 124,909 people found in the churches, as a whole, about fifty thousand were in those of the Roman Catholic faith. And yet only a portion of the Catholic worshipers were counted, for in only one or two instances were the attendants on early mass counted. At that service, of course, the churches are crowded. The Advertiser's conclusion is that the number of persons who entered the Roman Catholic churches for the purpose of worship that day fell only a few thousand below the gross attendance at all the other churches combined. And that is in Boston, the historical center of Puritanism. Church-going has unquestionably declined among Protestants both here and there. A large part of them are of a very uncertain religous faith, and the younger generation are less disposed than their fathers to regard attendance upon church as a duty, or as a profitable or an agreeable employment of time on Sunday. Once, remaining away from church subjected individuals and families to uncomfortable criticism in New England. They were regarded with suspicion, and suffered in social reputation in many ways. Now, however, even in little New Englaud towns, people stay away from church regularly without attracting much comment by their conduct. The communities hav grown accustomed to such displays of indifference to preaching and absence from church. The greatest attendance among the Protestants of Boston was in the Congregationalist and Baptist churches, which contained about 30,000 people, nearly equally divided between the two. The Episcopalians came next, with over twelve thousand. This communion has grown rapidly in Boston, and throughout New England, indeed, of late years, though formerly it found there very stony ground. Now the most popular Protestant preacher of Boston is an Episcopalian, the Rev. Phillips Brooks. The Methodist worshipers, white and colored, were nearly as numerous as the Episcopalians. The Presbyterians had only 3,800; and the Unitarians, whose churches were formerly the most fashionable in Boston, where the doctrins of Channing took their deepest root, numbered less than ten thousand; were fewer than the Episcopalians, by nearly three thousand. A great change has therefore come over Boston within this generation, so far as its religous predilections and observances are concerned. Roman Catholicism has made an enormous advance. Congregationalism has not gained proportionately with the growth of that city in population, but has fallen back. The Baptists and Methodists hav perhaps become comparativly stronger, or at least hav held their own. The Unitarians hav declined, many of them having passed on to Agnosticism, religious indifferentism, and utter Infidelity, and others having gone over into the Episcopal church. These significant changes in ecclesiastical relations and in religous sympathies and opinions are not confined to Boston. They are taking place throughout New England. The increase of the foreign-born population is rapidly building up the Roman Catholic communion. Congregationalism is losing vitality. Unitarianism is passing away as a distinctiv denomination. Episcopalianism is gaining. The Baptists and the Methodists are appealing to the more fervid religious feeling of the ordinary run of Protestants in the communities. Infidelity is rampant.—Sun.

THE funeral of Charles Darwin took place on Wednesday last. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Canon Liddon, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, said in his Sunday's sermon that the dead scientist's teachings do not conflict with the "fundamental truths of religion." The canon seemed to lose sight of the fact that if Darwin's theory is true that mankind sprung from some animal of a lower order, he cannot be the descendant of Adam. This theory is the disputed point, and always must be, between science and theology.

Egypt.—Continued.

A few words should be said of what are called the crypts of the temples—narrow rooms full of pictures and sculptures, and which are only accessible through a small narrow opening through the solid partition walls near the floor. Mariette-Bey thinks it must have been the intention of the architect that these crypts should be the secret hiding-places for the rich statues of the divinities in gold, silver, and lapis-lazuli and in wood; also the rich sistra, jeweled collars, and emblems of all kinds, only to be removed therefrom on fete days and occasions of great processions. Numerous inscriptions and representations cover the walls, many of which have hardly been deciphered. In these rooms the light of day has not entered for two thousand years, and here our candles stirred up numerous bats which, annoyed at our intrusion, flew about in a state of considerable disturbance. I thought the temples of the old mythical gods a very fit place, perhaps, for the bats and owls of the present day. The gods of Egypt were probably as respectable as the gods of any country, but these secret places make fit abodes for the foul birds which prefer darkness to light. The terraces or upper rooms are also very interesting. The little temple of twelve columns has been mentioned. There are six other chambers, and these are divided into two groups of three—one group on the north, the other on the south. The two groups together form a temple dedicated to Orisis.

According to the invariable traditions, both of the monuments and of the classical writers, Osiris was always regarded as the universal god of the Egyptians. Egypt was divided into forty-two provinces or nomes, and each of these forty-two nomes possessed a local Osiris, so that, correctly speaking, Egypt recognized forty-two manifestations or modifications of Osiris. The deity of the small temple in the second story is the Osiris of the nome of Denderah, worshiped under the name of Osiris-An.

The small temple was divided into north and south groups on account of the local deities of the same name, which the Osiris of Denderah admitted by his side as secondary divinities. On the northern side were the Osiris of the northern nomes, while the Osiris of the southern provinces had access to the southern chambers. This may explain the object of the construction. Osiris, particularly the Osiris of Denderah, was there worshiped, but in thus becoming a local divinity the Osiris of Denderah had lost none of the qualities of the principal Osiris, and what is seen on the walls of the little temple refers chiefly to the Osiris of national tradition, that is, the Osiris who came down upon earth as the benefactor and savior of mankind, who was put to death for their benefit, after which he rose again from the dead. Sir J. Gardner Wilkinson, in his work on ancient Egypt, has this quotation in reference to the Egyptian savior and redeemer Osiris. In the octavo edition, London 1854, page 331, he says: "The peculiar character of Osiris, his coming on the earth for the benefit of mankind, with the titles of 'manifestor of good and truth,' his being put to death by the malice of the evil one, his burial and resurrection, and his becoming the judge of the dead, are the most interesting features of the Egyptian religion. This was the great mystery, and this myth and his worship were of the earliest times, and universal in Egypt." That is the strongest possible evidence that this whole doctrine of the atoning death of a god, of a redeemer and savior sent to the earth for the salvation of the human race, which the Christians parade with so much ostentation, and upon which their system is founded, is simply an old Egyptian fable, invented more than fifteen hundred years before such a system of religion as Christianity had ever been heard of. Let me ask here, what divinity could there hav been in revising an old pagan myth which had been sleeping more than a thousand years, and giving it the name of a new revelation?

On the roof of one of the upper chambers is an elaborate representation of creation. In one of the upper rooms was formerly the home of the planisphere or zodiac, which is now in Paris. Traces of the removal are to be seen. There are also many astronomical representations. In another place are seen long processions of the gods conveying in vases the members of Osiris which each town possesses. In another place the forty-two funeral biers of Osiris are represented.

Then come the twelve hours of the day, with a notice of the prayers to be said every hour; and also the twelve hours of the night, the whole being divided in the same manner as the temple itself, into Upper and Lower Egypt. The fetes consist of processions, in which priests from all parts of the country take part. A calendar sets forth all the details, and also gives recipes for the preparation of the oils, the perfumes, and the essences to be used. Short notices furnish also the calendar of these same fetes for the Osiris of the other nomes.

Considered with reference to the dogma which it represents, the temple of Denderah bears the stamp of a philosophical spirit of much interest. One of the principal divinities of the temple is Hathor, the Aphrodite or Venus of the Greek and Roman system. In her principal character Hathor is the pupil of the sun's eye, and thus the Egyptians made Hathor the goddess of beauty, the seat of which they placed chiefly in the eyes. Then came her other titles, "the goddess of the lovely face," "the beautiful goddess," "the goddess of love." At the same time Hathor is represented as the personification of the general harmony of the world, which exists and endures only through the harmonious co-operation of all its parts. Thus she is the divine mother who causes all vegetation to germinate, and who makes the corn to grow, who gives life to mortals, who carries fecundity and abundance into all parts of the world, love being productive only in such measure as it is harmonious. Again, one of the characters under which the inscriptions of the temple most frequently represent Hathor is that which connects her with every idea of youthfulness, of expansion, and of resurrection; this is exemplified even in the subjects chosen for the decoration of the frieze, and of the sub-basement, when flowers in blossom, stems of plants crossing each other and intertwining scarabæi alternating with the phœnix, shadow forth at every step the eternal beauty of nature. It is even as a symbol of these ideas of a constant renovation that Hathor is so frequently designated the goddess Sothis (Sirius). Hathor thus becomes the star which determines and governs the periodical return of the year (the Egyptian year commencing on July 21st, the day when Sothis and the sun appear simultaneously in the morning horizon), which announces the rising of the river; she is the star whose appearance at the eastern horizon at the same moment as the rising sun foretells the renewal of nature. Hathor, then, like the Aphrodite and Venus of the Greeks and Romans, is something more than the goddess of beauty; the Hathor of the Egyptians is the type of that universal harmony which is necessary to the well-being and to the life of the world; what they desired to personify in her was the ideal of all that is beautiful.

Perhaps if the temple at Denderah were of Pharaonic origin, and consequently free from all Grecian influence, the inscriptions would carry us no farther. But from the arrangements of certain pictures, invariably placed opposite each entrance door, and where the king himself is represented as offering to the divinity a statue of truth, Hathor is evidently intended to personify, not only the goddess of all that is beautiful, but also the goddess of all that is true. Truth is represented by a little statue of a female seated in a basket, her head crowned with a waving feather. The king holds the basket in his outstretched hand, and presents it to the goddess who stands before him. According to custom, inscriptions accompany these representations. In front of the king are the words he is supposed to pronounce; in front of the goddess is the answer which she is supposed to make to the king's speech. In all the chambers, with the exception of the sanctuary, the speech is meaningless enough on either side. "I offer thee truth," says the king; "I raise her toward thee, O Hathor, sovereign lady of the heavens." The goddess replies, "May truth be with thee; mayest thou live by her and by her means triumph over thine enemies" (i. e., "May falsehood be vanquished by truth"). In the sanctuary the triviality of these texts disappears, and in entering the chambers the king exclaims; "I offer to thee truth, O goddess of Denderah, for truth is thine own work, for thou art truth itself!" The philosophical character of Hathor is thus more and more portrayed.

A third attribute of Hathor, no less characteristic than the two former, is clearly manifested by the care that has been taken to assign her to an especial place in the temple of the terraces. Here she is no longer the same Hathor as seen below; she is transformed into Isis; she becomes the goddess who attaches herself to Osiris, who accompanies him from chamber to chamber, and who is present at his resurrection. Osiris, according to the tradition handed down by Plutarch, is the principle of good. "Osiris," says Plutarch, "takes pleasure in doing good, and his name amongst many other meanings is said to express activity and beneficence." Again Plutarch represents Isis and Osiris sometimes governing the kingdom of good, sometimes presiding over the intellect, the principle of all good. "Isis," says Plutarch, "possesses an innate love of good principles." Moreover, without going so far as the terraces for an illustration, the interior of this temple impresses the beholder with the same idea when among the nine emblems of the temple the foremost rank has been ascribed to the sistrum. "The sistrum," says Plutarch, "symbolizes that men should always be active and busy, and that they must be constantly stimulated and roused out of the state of languor and enervation into which they are too prone to fall. It is said the sound of this instrument puts Typhon to flight." Death vanquished to the benefit of life; evil suppressed by the benefit of good; falsehood dissipated by truth; this, then, is the symbol of which the sistrum is the genuine type, and by this one sees that to the same ideas of universal harmony of the beautiful and the true, so injuriously applied in the interior of the temple, is here added the idea of good. Dr. Inman clearly shows that the sistrum is of phallic origin and was originally designed to represent the creative and generative power in nature, being a combination of both the male and female organs. The symbol is met with thousands of times in the principal temples of Egypt.

Mariette-Bey thinks it is clear that the temple of Denderah presents a certain arrangement which no doubt would never be displayed by a temple of Pharaonic origin, and that it is this which betrays the influence of the times in which it was erected. Evidently the Platonic schools of thought then flourishing at Alexandria extended their influence as far as Denderah, and the entire decoration of the temple is composed with a view to summing up synthetically, under the imagery of local divinities and their attributes, the three fundamental parts of that philosophy—the beautiful, the true, and the good.

The outer walls of the temple are as fully engraved and inscribed as the inner portions. On the rear walls are two portraits of Cleopatra and her son Cæsar, which, however, have been somewhat defaced. There are also two other small temples near the large one just described—one dedicated to Isis, the other to Osiris. I think they are more ancient than the main temple. They are also full of inscriptions, but being short of time and in a hurry to return to the boat we spent not much time in them.

In another hour we had reached the river, had settled with the donkey-boys, were on the way to our steamer, and in a short time were again steaming down the Nile, still charmed with the beautiful scenery and the majestic palms all along the river banks. The steamer did not land so we could visit the temples—two in number—and the tombs of Abydos, the ancient Thinis of Egypt, where, it is held, the Egyptian monarchy was cradled. Here is a temple of Sethi and the temple of Rameses, also the tomb of Osiris and the Necropolis. The sculpturing on the first temple is said to be very fine. The tombs belong principally to the sixth dynasty, 3700 B.C.; to the twelfth dynasty, 3000 B.C; and to the thirteenth dynasty, 2800 B.C.—all from 1,000 to 1,800 years before the time of Abraham, and while the sons of Noah were still living. If such a people lived at that time in Egypt, able to build such tombs and such temples while Shem and his brothers were still living, it is wholly improbable that the Egyptians, who had then been thousands of years in existence, had any connection whatever with the descendants of Noah's three sons. There is no evidence that Noah's flood reached Egypt, or that the people of that country, who had already founded an empire and built cities, knew anything of it. It will be well for the Bible revisers, when they are fixing up the divine word so it will bear examination, to place the flood a thousand years earlier, so that it could be possible for the ancient Egyptians to be the descendants of Noah; though if they should do that it would not yet be true that the Egyptians were descendants of either of the sons of Noah. They are, unquestionably, of much older stock.

December 26th.—We arrived at Asioot at 4 P.M. yesterday, and at 9 P.M. took the train for Cairo. We arrived at Boulak at 7 this morning, which is the station for Cairo, and Bridges and myself took donkeys for the city, three miles distant. The ride was a grotesque one, the highway being filled with donkeys, horses, camels, etc., the last being in considerable numbers. In some places the road was so crowded we could hardly get along. The donkey-boys carried our satchels and kept up the whole distance. We returned to Shepheard's Hotel, and spent a portion of the day in writing.

PILGRIMAGES TO MECCA.

Cairo is one of the principal points from which caravans of pilgrims are made up which make a pilgrimage to Mecca, the holy city of the Moslems. Before the departure of the bands, which sometimes amount to nearly a thousand, several days are spent in hilarity like the holding of a fair, but, alas! there is always a considerable number who die on the pilgrimage, and whose bones are left to whiten on the desert. It makes no difference, however, how many die, the pilgrimages must be kept up. All of the faithful are expected to make a pilgrimage to Mecca once in their lives, and to accomplish this the earnings of years are carefully saved up. The return of the pilgrims is a wonderful event and must be duly celebrated. Those who have been to Mecca are regarded as holy and worthy of deference. Of course the sheik becomes holier than the common herd, and most extravagant honor is shown him. Hundreds of people throw themselves on their faces in the highway, packed closely together, and over these prostrate bodies the sheik rides his horse, walking upon the bodies of the devout worshipers. Some are injured by the horse's feet, but it is thought that such must have been guilty of some sin. They are at once removed, and it is supposed the sheik will immediately restore them to a healthy condition.

This is something like the bands of dervishes who assemble in the mosque at the citadel to go through the wild and almost insane ceremonies of dancing, whirling, etc. A weight is allowed to drop upon their heads, sometimes mashing them almost to a jelly; but this is also probably taken as an indication that they are not as perfect as they should be; they, too, are at once removed, and it is claimed, that the hand of the sheik will restore them. They, of course, are seen no more, and it is said of them that they are giving thanks to Allah for his great goodness. It is hard to say whether the devotees of Christianity or of Islam show the more simplicity or idiocy in the belief in miracles and in the power of the saints and priests to perform cures.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

Cairo is the headquarters for Christian missions for Egypt, and the American board is fully represented here. A large sum of money has been expended in erecting buildings for missions and schools. More money by far has been collected for the purpose than the buildings cost, the pious missionaries, of course, taking a large residue to themselves. They are very careful not to use the money up too rapidly to complete the buildings in hand, so as still to have the completion of the buildings the excuse for more begging. On a certain occasion the missionaries were asked why they did not use the money already collected and complete the buildings. The reply was that it was not desirable to complete the buildings too soon; they wished to keep them in an an unfinished state for still a good while, for when the buildings were finished the donations would cease, and there would no longer be anything to beg for.

LEAVING CAIRO.

On Wednesday, Dec. 28th, we departed by rail from Cairo, traveling over the same road as when we came to Cairo, as far as Ismalia, from which place we took a branch road to Suez (with a view of there taking steamer for Bombay), which passes over a sandy waste near the Suez canal. Along the delta of the Nile we took our farewell view of the verdure and the growing crops which look so beautiful. We saw many fields of wheat several inches high, many fields of vetches and lentils, many fields of clover nearly knee-high, the mode of pasturing which is to tie the buffalo, the cow, or the camel, as the case may be, with a rope thirty feet in length or less, letting them eat the clover down closely to the ground as far as the rope will reach, when they are given a fresh patch. In this way the whole of the clover is eaten, and none trampled down and wasted. There are no fences in Egypt; there is nothing to make fences of. Roots or a ridge of earth answer as land-marks. Twenty-five per cent of the land is said to be owned in small parcels by individuals; twenty-five per cent belongs to the government, or to the khedive, who in the aggregate derives a heavy revenue from it, and the balance belongs to rich land holders, men with titles, etc. The tenure, as near as I can learn, is a bad one, and the rents of the land are so heavy as to be very onerous upon the poor tillers.

Egypt, upon the whole, is rather prosperous, though the people are enormously taxed. The last khedive before the present one was very extravagant and corrupt. He built a large number of expensive palaces with the money wrung from the people, and at the close of his political career was able to retire to Italy with a princely fortune of about $2,000,000, where he is now living in great luxury. The present khedive is said to be a better man, and has the credit of being amiable in manners, and rather economical in his tastes and expenditures. England and France have secured a strong claim upon the resources of Egypt, and it is probable that at some not far distant day they may find come convenient excuse for gobbling up the entire country. England, of course, would do so at once if France and other nations were not in the way.

The wages of the laboring classes in Egypt are low; as a rule the laborers on the land are interested in the crops that are produced, but the others work for very small pay. I heard that men in Upper Egypt work for the sum of a franc per day, and even for less, while women are content at half price. There cannot be a general state of prosperity and happiness when such low wages rule for labor.

COMING TROUBLE.

I learn that many have serious apprehensions that the time is not far away when the Moslem inhabitants of Egypt will rise and attempt to suppress the Frank or European element which is gaining ground in the country. I talked with an intelligent Polander—a correspondent of two or three European papers, and who has spent two or three years in the country, the greater part of the time far up the Nile. He understands the languages of the natives, and is able to read their papers. He is confident that there is a growing state of unrest on the part of the Arabs and Moslems generally, which has been increased since the war between France and Tunis, and a strong feeling is implanted in their minds that the Franks are gradually encroaching upon them and crowding them to the wall. They are talking among themselves of the necessity of rising against their oppressors—their habitual enemies—and driving them from their country. This may come in one, two, or three years, but come it pretty surely will. I find this opinion is shared by other good judges; no less a person than the Englishman who is at the head of the Finance Department of Egypt expresses the same opinion. That will be a bloody day when it comes, and many Europeans will doubtless be massacred, but it will only give the European nations a good excuse to visit severe punishment upon the Moslems, and probably five of them to one of the Christians will be made to bite the dust, and the Turks and all the Moslems will be driven out of Europe, and possibly Egypt. The Christians and Moslems are not yet done taking each other's lives.

EGYPT COMPARED WITH PALESTINE.

I have now been over a considerable space of the land of Egypt, the land which was densely populated among the first countries on the globe—perhaps the mother of civilization, one of the main sources of the religions of the world, the source of the art of the world—a country where the manufacture of glass was known three thousand years before it was known in Europe, where the art of embalming was better known than anywhere else in the world, where the artists could paint skilfully before the same was done in any other country; the land where three thousand years ago the science of medicine was nearly as well understood as now, with all the intricate apparatus in use among modern surgeons; which had several arts which have been completely lost from the world; a country which had a good system of common schools before any other country in the world; a country which had a good system of jurisprudence; a country whose system of religion taught the effects of good and bad deeds, of future rewards and punishments, two thousand years before the Hebrews taught anything of the kind; a country in which the god of the Hebrews never took the slightest interest, only to do what he could to injure it, but still a country infinitely greater and better than the Land of Yahweh, made up of hills and sterile rock. What a difference is now to be seen in comparing the two countries! Palestine possesses little that bears record of an intelligent race of people who once lived there, nothing of any splendid architecture, nothing of works of art, nothing that is beautiful, though a god claimed to be superior to all other gods presided over it many hundred years, and gave nearly his entire attention to it. But in this land of Egypt, which was nearly always under the ban of the God of Israel; which had not the benefit of a regular orthodox god; which was compelled to get along the best way it could with nothing but pagan gods; how much the traveler finds to interest him! Though hundreds of tons of the richest antiquities have been taken to enrich the museums of Europe, yet there are the pyramids of the long past, the tombs of the ancient kings, and the numerous grand temples, obelisks, and statues of a former race of people, to-day standing firmly on the bases on which they were planted three, four, five, six, and seven thousand years ago; while in the newer country of Palestine, with the Jewish God and his Son to do for the country all that their partiality might suggest, nothing of the old is to be seen. No ruins of temples, no works of art, no remains of splendid architecture, not even one stone lying upon another that was so placed by the Hebrews; nothing that shows that they possessed as much civilization, as much art, as much love of the beautiful, as the nations that were around them. Palestine is a naked, sterile waste, with little to attract the eye, or to impress upon the mind that it contains an inherent and native interest aside from the stories of it contained in the Jewish scriptures. With all that God has done for Palestine, little remains that is beautiful and interesting, or that one can care for; but with all that God failed to do for Egypt, though the land never received divine aid or divine love, it is still filled with its ruins of past ages, which teach most valuable lessons, and are of high interest and value. Yes, Egypt is to-day, as it always has been, far greater than Palestine.

And now, standing upon this ground, I find proofs which satisfy my own mind that the claim that the children of Israel dwelt for from two to four centuries in this land of Egypt, and that here they increased from seventy persons to become some three millions of people, not well sustained. In all the records of sculptured temples, tombs, obelisks, and monuments, in all the writings upon papyrus, and the histories which were preserved, there is not a word to be found, and never has been, that such a people of brick-makers ever lived among them. The amount of brick which such a people should have been able to manufacture are not to be found, nor are the works in existence which they should have constructed; no record that a member of this slave race became the virtual ruler of the land, being second in power; that under his wise and dream-reading ability the products of seven fruitful years were garnered up to save the nation and prevent its starvation in the succeeding seven years of famine, when nothing grew that sustained life. This nation, which excelled all other nations in the world in its records, which noted down minutely every considerable event which took place, has not an inscription, nor the mark of a stylus on papyrus, that the land for years had a wise Jewish ruler, under whose farseeing and benign rule the nation was saved; that a handful of slaves, who first came from God's own country to avert the starvation which otherwise would have overwhelmed them, became a nation, amounting to millions, able to turn out six hundred thousand fighting men at one time; who, in escaping from the land of their servitude, passed down to the Red Sea, which kindly opened its vast deep, standing up a high wall on either side, leaving a dry roadway in the center, over which the three millions of men, women, and children were able to walk without even wetting the soles of their feet, while the great army of Egypt, with their magnificent king at their head, in pursuing them, were all utterly destroyed, not a man being left to tell the tale.

To me it seems utterly impossible that such loss of king and army could have taken place in such a country of records as Egypt—a country which a thousand years earlier was rich in its minute recapitulation of events—and not a line, not a word, ever be said about it. I cannot believe that the wonderful and impossible plagues which, in the story of Moses, are said to have taken place in Egypt under the magical power of Moses—the frogs, the lice, the locusts, the storms of hail and fire, the turning of the Nile into blood, the killing of the animal creation, the death of the first-born of human and animal life throughout the land—could occur and not a word be said about them. The thing is unnatural and preposterous. Can a sensible person believe that such wonderful events could take place in such a country as Egypt, full of intelligence, full of the faculty and disposition for recording history, and not a word be written or inscribed about it all? Can it be believed that a country which wrote the history of its many monarchs could let one of them, and his vast army of many hundred thousand mounted men, be drowned in the Red Sea, and not a scratch be made in commemoration of the great event? I cannot believe it. I have for many years doubted it, but since I have been upon the ground, seen the land where the children are said to have carried on the brick-making business for generations, but leaving no works to mark what they had done; seeing how full the land is with historical accounts, engraved upon stone and written upon papyrus, I can regard the improbable story only as a fable.

If such a series of wonderful events took place as Genesis describes as having occurred in Egypt, I cannot otherwise than believe that the still existing and permanent records of Egypt would have some account of them. This land has records of events of far less importance, which took place a thousand years earlier, and why not of these if they occurred? Is it at all likely that a people so given to making records should wholly omit to notice such remarkable national occurrences, and not even a tradition be left among the people in reference to it? Again, if the Hebrews had passed two or four centuries in Egypt, they were to all intents and purposes Egyptians, speaking the Egyptian language, being familiar with Egyptian names, places, and habits, and it would have been the most natural thing in the world for them to use the Egyptian language, use the names of Egyptian places, and say and do at least something to show that they were acquainted with Egyptian literature, Egyptian geography, and Egyptian habits and customs. But nothing of this kind is found to have been the case with the Hebrews; they never made any use of Egyptian language, names, or individuals. How natural it would have been for a people who had lived for seven generations in a land, when leaving it, to perpetuate their remembrance of that land by using its names, and giving them to the places they built up in their new homes. How natural it was for the emigrants from England, Germany, and other countries, when they made their homes in the new world, America, to perpetuate the memory of the father and mother land by keeping up the names of those lands, and continuing the customs which they practiced there. Nothing in the world is more natural than this, but nothing of this kind is to be seen of the Hebrews after they left the land of Egypt. They never, so far as we can learn, used an Egyptian word, an Egyptian letter, an Egyptian custom—nothing that was Egyptian. This could not have been the case had they spent two hundred and fifty years in Egypt.

It is my opinion that the Semitic race known as Jews spent more than forty years in the desert; that, in fact, they were the sons of the desert, the same as the Bedouins are to-day, and that when in an almost savage state they possessed themselves of the Land of Canaan, and in subsequent generations, in writing up their early history, this fable about their residence in Egypt was manufactured out of whole cloth, and that nothing of the kind ever took place, as their growing up in Egypt from a paltry seventy persons to be three millions; that God then wished them to leave the country, but to prevent it, repeatedly hardened the heart of Pharaoh, making it necessary to perform unheard-of miracles, and to cause an endless amount of suffering and death. In my candid belief all this is fiction, and nothing of the kind occurred. In the histories of those days, fable was mixed with fact to such extent that it is to this day almost impossible to separate the fable from the fact. In this part of the story of the Hebrews, the fable undoubtedly obtained greatly the advantage of the fact, and figured most conspicuously in the story. It was common in those days for nations to descend from the gods, and it is not at all a monstrous supposition that the Hebrews, for some reason, wished to have it appear that they had descended from Egypt, and that in the interval of forty years between the time they left Egypt and the period when they reached the land of Canaan, the old people who left Egypt had passed away, and a new race had come into existence.

In comparing Palestine with Egypt, and admitting the rapidity with which the Hebrew races increased in the latter country, it strikes me that instead of Yahweh's putting himself to the trouble of changing the Nile into blood, sending frogs, locusts, lice, etc., over the land, killing off all vegetation and animal life, the killing of all the first-born of the land, killing many of the animals two and three times over; instead of having to open the Red Sea to let the people pass over, and then to send manna daily for forty years to keep the people alive in the desert to get them up in good fighting condition to despoil the Canaanites of their homes and possessions, it would have been better for the Israelites to have remained two or three more generations in the Nile country, until such time might arrive when, with the rapidity with which they increased, they could have become so numerous as to easily be able to overpower the Egyptians by driving them into the Red Sea or otherwise, with one of Yahweh's miracles, to utterly exterminate them as to enable them to become masters of the country and be able to take full control of it and set up business on their own account. In this way the business could easily have been managed, and not a tenth part of the miracles would have been necessary, and the Hebrews would have had a country infinitely richer and better than the rocky hills of Palestine—a country which to-day is, and always has been, a thousand times more valuable than Palestine. If I had been on hand at that time, and Yahweh had asked my opinion, it seems to me my advice to him would have been to let his chosen people remain where they were for the forty years he purposed to keep them in the desert, and by that time, with a little of his miraculous killing power, they would fully be able to take Egypt and have a far better home than they possibly could find in arid, sterile, rocky Palestine, and where, it seems, he could at least have made his enterprise as successful as among the rocks of his chosen country. From my standpoint, it seems he made a great mistake in taking his dear people from Egypt at all, admitting for the moment that they ever dwelt there, which I do not believe was ever the case. But there are so many proofs of his want of foresight and his deficiency of good judgment in nearly all that pertained to that heavenly adventure of his, that one cannot but pity him and wish that he had not undertaken a contract beyond his ability to execute; for really it must be confessed that a more disastrous failure has never been made in all the records of the races of men. Yahweh undertook to make a great country of his chosen land, and to make a great people of his Semitic race, which he selected from all the races of the earth, promising to them those piles of rocks for an everlasting possession, and giving them his word over and over again that they should become many millions of times more numerous than they were or ever will be, only to meet with disaster after disaster, failure after failure, until his grand project ended in total disgrace, so that his dearly-beloved people were utterly driven from those piles of rock and compelled to seek homes in all the strange parts of the earth; and his own dear land, which was to be the home and inheritance of his chosen people forever, passed out of his hands entirely and into the possession of the followers of his rival, Allah. Yes, a more complete failure has not been known in the world; but there is one consolation left him. Even if he lost his country and lost his chosen people, it was in a secluded nook among the white hills and rocks of Nazareth, down deep in a cavern far away from mortal vision, that he had that interesting interview with that sweet Jewish maiden, and that there the act of overshadowing was performed, the result of which was his his dear son Jesus, whom he kindly managed to have put to a cruel and ignominious death to appease his own disturbed feelings, and to make amends to a limited extent for the serious blunder he made in creating man as he did, with such tastes and propensities that must inevitably cause him to take the road for an eternal residence in the lake of fire which this beneficent being had kindly prepared from all eternity for the poor helpless creatures he had created. Was it not a grand thing in him that he thus begat in that dark cavern a dearly-beloved son to thus make amends for the father's mistake or short-sightedness, and with good luck thus be able to rescue five per cent of the race of man from the terrible fate which awaits them in that awful gulf of fire and brimstone? There may be some so irreverent as to think it would have been far better for Yahweh to have remained totally inactive in his place of abode a few millions of miles beyond nowhere for a few more ages at least, and not have brought this miserable race into existence at all, only to sin, to suffer, and to burn, but people who indulge in such irrational thoughts are undoubted sons of Belial and are not able to perceive the beauties of an all-wise Providence who shapes and plans all things in matchless and infinite love and wisdom. Let it be hoped that that interview in the cavern at Nazareth, with all that grew out of it, may make full amends for all the other mistakes and disasters that occurred. Even gods should have some pleasures to make amends for all the trials, perplexities, and disappointments to which they are disposed as the sparks are to fly upward.

WHERE THE ISRAELITES CROSSED.

In nearing Suez the mountain ranges on each side of the water to the south, between Baal-Zephon and Piha-heroth, come nearly together, making a comparatively narrow valley between, at the upper end of which is the very extreme end of the Gulf of Suez, and which extends over fifty miles to the south before the Red Sea properly begins. Now, if the exodus of the Israelites really took place—if, as claimed, they came from the neighborhood of Memphis and Cairo—it is far more probable that they directed their course to the upper end of the Gulf of Suez than that they should steer fifty miles or one hundred miles further south to the Red Sea, where the mountains on either side to be crossed are much higher, and where the crossing itself must be more difficult. At the upper end of the gulf is a sandy waste which at high tide used to be covered with water and at the ebbing of the tide became dry ground. So if there is any truth at all in the story of the exodus, it is highly probable that this was the place of crossing, where it could be easily done without the intervention of a miracle; the Israelites crossing safely when the time was out, pursued by the hosts of Egyptians, who might have reached the place at the time the water was returning, which would have caused them some disturbance. If a few were drowned, and the pursuit thus proved unsuccessful, it would have been quite sufficient for the fleeing Israelites to get up a hymn of praise, and several hundred years afterward, in the account being written up, to color the facts so highly as to make it appear that a wonderful miracle had taken place, the Red Sea opening for the escape of one nation and the drowning of another equally as deserving. While waiting at Suez for the steamer I saw the tide recede, leaving miles of sand free from water, which a few hours before looked like the ocean itself; and at the upper end of the gulf a people could cross over on comparatively dry sand. In a few hours it became perfectly impassable, and this without the intervention of any miracle whatever. But the more probable truth is that which I a little while ago marked out, that the Israelites never lived in Egypt, and never crossed either the Red Sea or the upper end of the Gulf of Suez. It, perhaps, would be no more criminal to invent a whole story, drawing upon the imagination for the incidents, than to take one which had a basis of truth to begin with and then dress it up to make it wonderful by the arts of fiction.

I am now done with Egypt, though there is very much more of an interesting character that I might give you if time and space would permit. I could tell you of the ancient religious systems of Egypt, of the teachings of the priests of Heliopolis, and of their deep and cunning intrigues, of their practices down to the time of Cambyses of Persia, as well as some account of the Chaldean system which partially succeeded this conquest. I could describe the early stages of Christianity and give a glimpse of the probable Mithraitic system of the Persians which became somewhat incorporated therewith, but I cannot dwell longer. I must hurry on and tell you about other countries, leaving unsaid much of interest in the history of Egypt.

I arrived in Suez near the close of the day, and the next day, the 29th, I had ample time to look about the dead, dilapated place of some twenty thousand inhabitants, and to visit the several steamer offices to inquire which is the best line and the best steamer for us to take to Bombay. There is but little of interest about the town. During the construction of the canal there was considerable life here, but when the canal was completed, and goods did not stop here, but passed on boats directly through the canal, the trade of the town fell away materially and remains limited. Now let us say good-bye to Egypt.

Yours sincerely, D. M. B.

From Suez to Bombay

ON STEAMER CATHAY, FIFTY MILES FROM SUEZ, Dec. 30, 1881.

DEAR FRIENDS: This steamer of the "P. & O." —meaning Peninsular and Oriental—line was passing through the canal while we were in Suez, and as it would be several days before the steamer of another line would leave this port for the east, we decided to take this steamer, though the fare is somewhat higher than by the other lines, and probably we decided wisely. The rates of travel in this part of the world are high. First-class passage from Suez to Bombay—a distance of about three thousand miles, and not far from that between New York and Liverpool—is $250, while from New York to Liverpool it is from $50 to $100, being from three to five times less. We concluded to study economy and take second-class passage, saving by the operation the sum of $65 each. We get along just as rapidly, of course, and though we have not quite as much style as those of the first-class, we live quite comfortably and fare well enough. The $65 are well worth saving, and we have still saved more by purchasing a through ticket to Yokohama, a deduction being made on such a long distance, and stopping at several ports.

The dock of Suez is two or three miles from the town, and we were taken to it by a small sail-boat last evening, in company with us being the banker, Mr. Blake, of Boston, whom we met at Luxor, and who left Cairo on the same train with ourselves.

We left the dock last night at about midnight, and this morning we find ourselves steaming along at the rate of about twelve knots an hour, with a northeast wind helping us a little. The northerly wind cools the air somewhat, so it is not oppressively hot, which is usually the case in the passage of the Red Sea. We are now nearly to the point of the peninsula formed by the Gulf of Suez and the Arabian Gulf. Near this point is "located" the famous Mount Sinai, though the authorities differ as much about this locality as about many of the other holy places whose location nobody knows nor ever did. Mount Sinai is not a solitary mountain, towering up by itself on an immense plain, but is rather a series of hills or mountains forming a considerable range, so that to determine which is the real spot where Yahweh and Moses got up their pyrotechnics, and where a certain amount of lettering on stone was done, is difficult.

It is one of this congeries of sterile desert hills called Ras Sufsafeh, which tradition, with about the same correctness, probably, with which it settles all those knotty questions, has decided to be the genuine Mount Sinai, where Yahweh and Moses spent forty days and nights together laying their plans for the government of that chosen people; while they below were contributing their earrings, finger-rings, etc., and casting them into a golden calf, and bowing down before it, causing Moses to become so angry that in a pet he cast down the two tablets, and in a moment destroyed what it required forty days for Yahweh to perform. Ras Sufsafeh is some five hundred feet above the desert plain below, and perhaps it was on this mount that Moses took up Abihu and seventy elders of Israel, where they saw God face to face. If this account is true that these seventy-odd people saw the infinite, it was the most remarkable exhibition that has ever taken place in the world, unless possibly it was on that other extraordinary occasion when Yahweh showed his back parts to Moses; but just where that interesting event occurred, tradition has not yet established.

Jebel Moosa was for many years the traditional Sinai; but after a while tradition changed its mind and Jebel Moosa was no longer the place where Yahweh's voice rolled like thunder—it was not the particular peak where the fire from the Lord belched forth—and all that honor was transferred by tradition to Ras Sufsafeh, though whether it was justly done it might require Yahweh and Moses both to decide. Tradition is such most uncertain authority that it is very dangerous to place much reliance upon it. The world may never be able to definitely determine whether it was Jebel Moosa or Ras Sufsafeh which was altogether on a smoke at the time Yahweh descended upon it in fire, and "the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mountain quaked greatly; and all the people saw the thunderings, and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it they removed and stood far off. And they said to Moses, Speak thou unto us and we will hear; but let not God speak to us lest we die." Probably the people knew how dangerous a thing it would be for their God to let his voice out, and probably they had good grounds not to wish to hear it. Moses, it is said, was not a good speaker, but even a stammerer or stutterer might be preferable to one whose voice killed at first shot.

I should have liked very well to make the journey to Mount Sinai, but it is several days weary travel over a miserable desert waste, requiring fifteen or twenty days to go and return, with a considerable outlay of money for guides, guards, camels, etc., (and then when the place is reached there is great uncertainty where Yahweh and Moses held their private interviews) such as in a man with limited means would hardly seem justifiable. If I could see without any doubt the place where the feet of Yahwah once stood, the place where his fireworks came off, where his voice of thunder was heard, I would perhaps be willing to make a hundred days' journey over the desert; but there is too much uncertainty about it. I must acknowledge to you my unbelief; and since I cannot believe that Moses and the Israelites dwelt in Egypt, crossed the Red Sea, and made the journey to Sinai, I cannot believe in the pyrotechnics, the thunder, the smoke, and all the rest of it. I set it down for one of the pretty tales of which the Bible is composed; a draft upon the imagination so thin as to be less substantial than a moonbeam. I cannot believe that an infinitely beneficent God in a fit of anger, from that sterile mountain of granite and gravel, denounced the people he had brought through the Red Sea, and ordered every man to place his sword by his side and go forth and slay every man his brother, until several fratricides and homicides had been committed. It is easier for me to doubt the correctness of the writer, and to conclude that he had not stated the facts, than that a loving and merciful God should ever have acted in that cruel and revengeful manner.

MY TRAVELING COMPANIONS.

Our American friends having parted from us at Cairo, we have now a new set to become acquainted with. Mr. Blake, the Boston banker, an affable and sociable man, is on the steamer with us. He, however, is among the first cabin passengers, and we do not see him very much save when we meet on deck or he comes forward to see us, which he has several times done. There are some fifty or sixty passengers in the first cabin, largely English people who have been home on a visit or are now going out to India for the first time. These I will say little of, for I have not the opportunity of learning much of them. There are twelve of us in the second cabin, and we are "common sort of folks," and do not wish to assume very much style or to don lordly airs. I will say something of ourselves, however:

1. M. Picard, a French engineer, on his way to the interior of Africa to join a company of his countrymen now there, who are exploring the mineral resources of Africa and doing such other work as their government has ordered. Mons. Picard will leave the steamer at Adin and cross over to the coast of Africa, where some of his countrymen will await him and with a camel train accompany him to the field of operations. He is well supplied with scientific instruments and with showy goods for the natives with whom he comes in contact. He is a jovial Frenchman and appears rather fond of his wine and brandy. It will be better for him not to use these articles too freely in the hot, unhealthy countries of Africa.

2. Mr. J. Marcus is a gentleman from Bucharest, going to India partly on account of his health, which appears not to be good, and partly with a view to business. He speaks English some, and French fluently. He and Mons. Picard are boon companions over their wine.

3 and 4. Mr. and Mrs. H. T. Wilcox. He is an engineer on one of the India railroads, and they have been home to England on a six months' visit. They are social, communicative people. We learn many points about India from them.

5. Mr. H. Goddon, a schoolmaster in the British army, who has been sent out to Adin, where a regiment is stationed, to take charge of the school there. The English government pursues the commendable course of educating the children of the soldiers, and the soldiers themselves when they have not received a stipulated amount of education. This young schoolmaster has been educated for army purposes, and goes out well supplied with school books for the soldiers who cannot read and write. He, too, is a communicative young man; he is willing to tell all he knows, and can do the same in as short a space of time as most people. He carves meat well, and makes himself quite useful at our unpretending second-class table.

6. Miss Anna Rollins, a German lady of much intelligence, whose home is at Cologne on the Rhine, now acting as lady's waiting-maid for the newly-married wife of a Greek banker by the name of Ralli, of Ralli Brothers, doing business in Calcutta and having branch houses in other cities. Mr. Ralli was a young widower and has just taken another wife, also a Greek, born and reared in England. She seems a very modest, quiet young woman, and takes to her husband not a small amount of wealth. The Greeks, like the Jews, are money-catchers, preferring banking and that class of commercial business which pays a handsome profit. Many Greek dealers are scattered through the east, and are a thrifty class. Miss Rollins, though a Catholic, is very reasonable in her religous views, and is sufficiently unprejudiced to hear all sides and not to feel unfriendly toward those who differ from her. She has had the fairness to read some of the books I have with me, and is so far pleased with them as to pay me for my three volumes of travels around the world. She accompanies her young mistress to India, to remain there two years, when she will return to Europe.

7. Mrs. Stephens, an English lady who has lived thirty years in India, and, has been home to England for a year, visiting a son and other relatives. Her home is in Bombay, where her husband is awaiting her. She has lived in several parts of India and is well acquainted with the country.

8. Miss Elizabeth Mullahew, a fair, modest, quiet young lady from Manchester, England, going out to India to marry her dearly beloved, whom she has not seen for four years, but who is awaiting her in Bombay, and doubtless with not a little anxiety. She looks as though she is worth waiting for or going a long way for. Their home is to be at Cawnpore, several hundred miles up in the country from Bombay.

9. Mr. Vernon E. Bennett, a namesake of mine, but decidedly unlike me in several particulars. Perhaps he is a reverend. At all events he is going out to India as a missionary, and is decidedly the farthest gone on Jesus of any one I have seen for many a day. His home is in St. Joseph, Mo., and he is not much past twenty-one. It seemed to me that perhaps his friends are sending him abroad to get rid of him. I would not blame them if such was the case, for he is so full and overflowing with Jesus as to make himself a perfect nuisance—a bore to those around him. He is a strong, vigorous, well-developed young man, and whatever he does, whether it is loving Jesus or anything else, he does with all his might. He delights in telling everybody on the ship, including the ship hands, sailors, and Hindoos, how he was a very wicked young man, how fortunately he had found Jesus, how Jesus had forgiven all his sins, and that now he is leading a sinless life and going straight on to heaven by the most direct line. He is singing, praying, or talking for Jesus all the time. He is much given to button-holing people and telling them how he has found Jesus and how happy he is. He sings a great number of Moody and Sankey hymns in the most emphatic and vigorous manner. I have heard them over times enough to have committed them to memory, but not being especially fond of productions of that kind, probably I do not take to them as kindly as does my young namesake. The songs he sings, however, were much in this style, "I know my sins are all forgiven, and I am on my way to heaven!" "I love Jesus, glory hallelujah; I am going straight to heaven, glory hallelujah!" "Oh, the bleeding lamb! oh, the bleeding lamb! he was found worthy," and a dozen more of the same tenor. He gets on deck, gathers some of the ship's crew around him, and tells them how he found Jesus, how happy it has made him, and how happy it would make them if they would only find him; and then in the fullest voice he sings his entire category of revival hymns and songs, and the boys come in on the chorus, bearing down manfully. They like the singing, and sing so stoutly with the young enthusiast that he imagines he has them about half converted; but they only laugh at him and give it as their opinion that he is crazy. Sometimes he takes off his shoes and stockings, and with his pants rolled up he runs rapidly along the deck, leaping over whatever may happen to be in his way, shouting for Jesus and telling what Jesus has done for him, "glory, hallelujah," etc. It takes but little of that frantic kind of conduct to convince most persons that he is not of sound mind, and that he has more Jesus than good hard sense.

Sometimes he retires to his state-room and kneels in the middle of the room and prays to Jesus in the most audible manner so as to be heard by all the passengers. He thanks Jesus for the great work he has done for him, craving his protection, and asking him to bring other souls to the same happy state which the supplicant himself enjoys. His "O Jesuses" are particularly sonorous, and are to be heard in all parts of the cabin. This kind of thing does very well for a while as a sort of novelty, but we got tired of it at length, and several of our fellow-passengers became wearied with his noise and his importunities about finding Jesus and getting their sins forgiven. He has had talks with nearly all our group of passengers, pleading with them to seek the savior without further delay, in a way to make himself very tiresome. He did not commence upon me, and I rather held myself in reserve, with readiness to receive him in the spirit of Christ, but he came not. Possibly Jesus may have told him that I am a hard case, and scarcely worth the trouble of saving. At all events, he left me alone, though I have been not a little annoyed with his bawling and shouting. Seeing the other passengers were also greatly pestered with him, after he had been holding forth in the wildest manner and making more noise than a dozen men ought, I addressed him in the following mild manner:

"Look here, my young friend, you are making either a monomaniac or a d—d fool of yourself, and annoying the passengers not a little. We have no objections to your being as happy with Jesus as you can possibly be, but we do object to your making us all wretched in the operation. We say, Be as happy as you please, so long as you do not infringe upon our rights in doing so. It is our opinion that you are fast losing your good sense, if you ever were in possession of that article; and if you cannot contain your fervor in your own breast, and cease to disturb us, we will be compelled to apply to the captain of the ship and require that you may be kept somewhere else, for we cannot be annoyed in this way. I have seen men like you before, who claimed to be sinless and faultless, who had a great deal to say about their being so much better than other people, and I have found that they will bear very close watching, for a self-righteous man is more to be distrusted than any others. It is not safe for one to leave his pocketbook within reach of a self-righteous and over-holy zealot. I would not trust them a yard out of my sight. I have found in the course of my life that really good men are not constantly boasting of their excellence and their sinlessness, but leave it for others to discover the good qualities of their character. A braggart either in holiness or knowledge is always to be distrusted, for it is almost sure that he will turn out to be a rascal. But as for this disturbance you are keeping up on the ship, it must be discontinued or, as I said, complaint will be entered to the captain, and we will see if the annoyance cannot be stopped. I will be frank with you, and say that for one I cannot put up with it, and will not."

The young man had the grace to say not a word in reply, probably taking it as persecution for Jesus's sake. He colored deeply, but opened not his mouth. One would think that after a mild reproach of that kind he would have sung in a very low voice and kept rather quiet. Well, he did for a day or so, but after that he got so full of Jesus that he could not contain it, and then he would go on deck and sing and whoop and holler, and thus let off the steam which the love of Jesus was generating in his spiritual boiler. I did not mind his noise on deck, nor did I interfere further with him, especially as I saw it was sport for the ship boys, who joined with him in concert and had a regular "break down." He kept more quiet in the cabin, and the steward was kind enough to remove him from the state-room which Mr. Bridges and myself occupied, so that I was not thereafter greatly disturbed by him. He subsequently made an apology to me, and said he was sorry if he had annoyed me. I replied that it was all right; that I had no objection to his loving Jesus just as hard as he pleased, only that I did not wish to hear it constantly. I hoped he would go on and be happy, if that kind of recreation made him happy, but as for myself I believed he might take a more sensible course by keeping on hand a larger stock of common sense, and by not cultivating so much absolute and unprofitable nonsense. He seems a good-hearted young man, but is Jesus-crazy. The love of Christ has almost driven him mad, and I fear he will not be of very great value to the native Hindoos, or to the sea-faring men of Calcutta, whither he goes to work for his dearly beloved Jesus. Some of the passengers have said to me that I will make more converts than my noisy namesake.

While passing down the gulf of Suez we are in sight of ranges of mountains both on the east side and on the west, which present a very raw, naked, jagged, and serrated appearance, as though they had been thrown up by some sudden and extensive upheaval. There is not a particle of green about them, and the edges are as sharp and as broken as can well be imagined. As we emerge, however, out into the Red Sea proper, we lose sight of land on both sides, and have nothing but the trackless sea to look at. This is called the Red sea because of the amount of red coral to be found in its waters. It is said that there are in various places coral reefs of great extent, though we have met none.

The weather is very warm here, the mercury reaching eighty-two and eighty-five degrees in the middle of the day, and not falling more than ten degrees lower at night. It is hard to realize that it is the middle of winter, and that you at home are shivering and freezing over your blazing fires, or are not far away from them. It is not as hot here at present as it sometimes is, for excessive heat is not at all unusual in these latitudes.

We had a lively time in seeing 1881 out and in inaugurating young 1882. All the cabin boys, stewards, and assistants walked through the entire cabins ringing bells, blowing horns, playing accordeons, beating on tin pans, etc., wishing everybody a happy New Year in a manner to make one glad that New Year does not come any oftener. Once in twelve months is quite often enough for such a tintinnabulation.

MECCA AND ISLAM.

Somewhere about half way down the Red Sea, on the east side, is Jeddo, the port for Mecca, where thousands every year land on their dreary pilgrimage to the "holy city" of all the faithful Moslems. And while we are passing this dreary portion of the world, perhaps a few remarks and a few reflections about the Moslem religion may not be out of place. I have before had more or less to say about Mohammedan faith and practices, but still more may not prove entirely superfluous.

The Semitic races are supposed to be a branch of the great Aryan family, which several thousand years ago occupied the central portion of Asia, which is now Thibet, bordering upon the Himalaya Mountains. The portion which became the Semitic races, including the Arabs, the Chaldeans, Syrians, Phœnicians, and the Jews, removed to the west and southwest, and occupied all that sandy, desert country bordering on the Arabian Sea, the Red Sea, and to the Mediterranean. Their languages are found to be closely related, and the philological proofs of a common origin are plentiful. Of the homes from whence the old Semitic tribes emigrated, but little is known with certainty, but it is thought to have been the country watered by the rivers Euphrates and Nigris.

These nations have filled an important place in history, and they have spread themselves over the earth, as have the other branches of the Aryan family. They have played a conspicuous part in the religion, science, and commerce of the world, and have done their full share in foisting upon the world their meed of superstitions and religious vagaries. In the ancient worship of the Semitic races, before they separated, there are clear traces that the names of their chief gods had been fixed. These names expressed moral qualities; thus, instead of having names that meant fire, the sun, the dawn, etc., they used such terms as the strong, the exalted, the lord, the king, etc. One of the highest and holiest names was El, meaning strong. In the Babylonian inscriptions it occurs as Ilu, God, and in the very name of Bab-il, the gate or temple of Il. It also became Beth-el, the house of God, and in many other names of the Jewish story. The same El was worshiped at Byb'us by the Phœnicians, and was called "the son of heaven and earth." Eloah is about the same word as is the Arabic Ilah, God; Ilah, without the article, means a god in general; with article Al-Ilah, or Allah, it becomes the name of the god of Mohammed, as it was of the God of Abraham and Moses. Another famous name was Baal or Bel the Lord He was not only supreme god among the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Phœnicians, but was frequently worshiped by the Jews. There was also the Hebrew Melech, king, which is the Moloch of the Phœnicians, to whom children were sacrificed, with the absurd idea that a sacrifice so near to the hearts of parent must be unusually acceptable to the gods.

These and other names were common to the branches of the Semitic family, but it has been claimed, though not quite truthfully, that Jah, Javeh, Yahweh, or Jehovah was used by the Hebrews only. Be this as it may, the world has a deep interest in the Jews, because while the Aryan blood flows in our veins we cannot be wholly indifferent to an important branch of the same family, regardless of the errors, superstitious, and imaginary revelations which they were the authors of. And one of these Semitic religions which deeply concerns the world is Mohammedanism.

This religion, which is the guide in life and the support in death of more than one hundred and fifty millions of the human race, which, like Christianity, has its missionaries scattered over the globe, and which, for the past quarter of a century, has been spreading more rapidly than its rival, Christianity, though not a tenth-part of the money has been expended in its propagation, is indeed one of the great religions of the world. While but little is known by the founders of several of the important religions that have appeared in the world, the incidents in the life of Mohammed, the founder of Islam, are not unknown to us. Unlike most of the founders of the other systems of religion, however, Mohammed came into the world like other children, without being begotten by a god, and without having a virgin for a mother; still, wonderful things are said to have taken place at his birth, and a legend has it that angels took him from the very arms of his nurse, took his heart from his bosom and squeezed from it the black drop of sin, which is in every child of Adam. After that little effectual squeezing process, it is perhaps not strange that he passed into the charge of angels, and became a favorite with heaven, though he never made any pretensions to divinity, nor claimed to be a perfect man. He never pretended to foretell events, nor to perform miracles. He often said, "My miracle is the Koran, which shall last forever."

His followers, notwithstanding this, claimed that he performed wonders and did miracles. Legends have handed it down, and every faithful Moslem believes it, that the prophet, clothed in a robe and turban of light, rode upon a streak of lightning to Jerusalem by night, and then from the big rock which stood in front of Solomon's temple ascended on horseback to heaven, passing through the dwellings of the prophets, and passing into the very presence of the Infinite Unseen, where stillness was, and nothing heard except the silent sound of the reed wherewith the decrees of God are written on the tablets of fate. His followers stoutly believe all this happened, though he said over and over again that it was only a dream.

When he died the people would not believe it; the very places where he had walked were considered the holiest places on the earth, and the words which he had spoken were regarded as the words of God. This has been the same with many persons who claimed to be the prophets of the Most High. They have, perhaps, been too great for common men to understand, towering, as they have, too far above the masses to be correctly measured. Probably no man has ever lived who was more devoutly loved and venerated by his followers and his friends, or who was more persistently hated and denounced by his enemies. The Christian rivals have been unusually severe upon him, and denounced him as the greatest impostor that ever lived. Martin Luther called him "a horrid devil," and denounced him worse than he did the devil himself, at whom he one day threw his inkstand. Whatever the faults of Mohammed may have been, it is pretty evident that he was an honest man, that he was no impostor, and that he strove hard to establish what he considered the true religion, the one great truth, that "there is no God but God."

Mohammed was born at Mecca, in Arabia, in the year 571. His father, who died before our hero was born, was poor, but was a member of the noble tribe of the Koreish, who were the guardians of the famous sacred stone of the Kaaba in Mecca. He lost his mother when six years of age, and was consequently dependent upon the care of his relatives. He was a sickly boy, and much subject to fits, which also troubled him in subsequent years; but notwithstanding, he began at an early age to attend flocks in the fields, and from his early boyhood did more than enough to sustain himself.

He became a silent and thoughtful youth, and was fond of being alone and giving himself up to deep and abstract thought. The arid and lonely desert, and the stars which shone above him, were his favorites, and he was fond of being alone with them, with no human being near him. He had not the benefit of an early education, being able neither to read nor write, but he gathered much information from the wise men with whom he came in contact.

He is represented as being sweet tempered and truthful, though the malady with which he was afflicted made him sad and curbed down in spirit In his bright moods, however, he would enter with zest into the glad, free life of his companions, and play with them and repeat to them the fascinating and gorgeous tales of oriental life, of which the East has such a munificent store He lived a simple life; his dress and food were of the plainest description; he always waited upon himself, and was always ready to share his humble meals with those more needy than himself. When he was twenty-four years of age he entered the service of a rich widow, who afterwards became his wife and the mother of his children.

As he neared middle age his gloom deepened, and he more and more avoided the society of his fellowmen. For years it had been his custom to spend in prayer and meditation the sacred month, when the Arab tribes laid down their weapons; and when he was forty years of age he retired to a small cave on Mount Hira, a huge barren rock, standing by itself in the desert, some three miles from Mecca. Here visions, dreams, strange sights and sounds, were his frequent companions, and one night he believed that he heard an audible voice speak these words: "Cry in the name of the Lord, and spread the true religion among men by writing." He had what he believed to be visions of the dazzling splendor of the heavenly world, and he affirmed that in these visions the angel Gabriel communicated with him. With great humility he narrated his strange experiences to his faithful wife, Kodesha, and she hesitated not to pronounce him a "Prophet of God," and thus she became his first convert.

Previous to this time the Arabs were idolaters, and also worshiped the sun, moon, trees, and stones, particularly the Kaaba, the great black stone in the temple of Mecca, round which three hundred and sixty-five idols were stationed. This stone is said to be an aerolite, and perhaps from this cause was thought to have come from paradise, and to have been brought by no less a person than Adam, the progenitor of the whole human race. Though originally white, this stone has become black from the millions of kisses that have been given it by sinful men, and from the silent tears of grief that have been shed upon it. Arab legend also tells that the building which incloses this heavenly stone was erected by Abraham and Ishmael, and towards this holy place every faithful Moslem, in every quarter of the globe, turns his face five times every day in prayer.

Some of the Arab tribes are said to have entertained strange religious notions relative to a future life. It was a custom with them to tie a camel to a man's tomb and leave it without food. If the camel got away the man's soul was lost forever, but if the camel remained secured, the dead man would be sure to find it there on the day of judgment, when he could mount it and ride to paradise.

Before Mohammed's time, various prophets had risen and condemned the idolatry of the masses, and enjoined them to return to the worship of the one only God, but these were afterwards regarded as mere fore-runners—mere John the Baptists—to prepare the way for the greater prophet who was to come after.

We are assured that Mohammed did not claim to preach a new faith, but the old religion of Abraham, whom he often said was neither a Jew nor Christian, but pious and righteous, and no idolater, and whom he placed among the six great prophets of the world —Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed. He preached an almighty and all-wise God, who had spoken through these prophets, and the man was noble enough not to speak harshly of those who had preceded him. He even said nothing against his more immediate predecessor, Jesus, whom he denominated with the honorable term, "prophet."

Mohammed borrowed from the religion of the Jews, of which he had but a partial knowledge, from hearsay, but he wished to bring his countrymen to the highest phase of Judaic faith and teaching. He abolished the frightful habit of killing female children, and made the family tie more respected, although to this day it remains the greatest blot upon Moslem practice. He permitted the continued worship of the Kaaba stone, and allowed that the pilgrimages thereto be continued from year to year, upon the same principle that the Christian church, when they carried Christianity into Germany and Northern Europe, saw fit to adopt enough of the pagan notions to satisfy the masses, and then build on their own peculiar views. "Where the sacred trees had been revered by the Teutonics, they planted crosses; where holy wells had been dug, and the babbling spring was a deity, they built churches and abbeys; when love and piety had named flower and insect after the 'lady' Frija, goddess of plenty, they put the Virgin Mary in her stead. The goddess Hel, who in a realm of bitter cold received the souls of those who died of old age or disease (for only those who died in battle were then given endless mirth and feasting in Valhallah with Alfadir Odin), was changed from a person to a place where heat, not cold, is the torment. In the bleak North, life without fire is dreary, which explains why Hel was pictured as ruling in a cold region."

Mecca had been a place of great note long before the time of Mohammed, Arabs having a tradition that it was the birth-place of their tribes. Close by the Kaaba is a holy well, Zemzem, which was believed to be fed by the spring that opened before Hagar's eyes, when she and her son were about to famish in the desert, and when, with a mother's mad despair, she cast him from her, that she might not witness his death agonies; and the legend further states that they settled on the spot, with a tribe who were passing by, and thus arose the sacred city of Mecca.

Mohammed enjoined good morals, and taught that men should lead good lives, and strive to merit the mercy of God, by fasting, charity, and prayer, which he denominated the "Key of Paradise." He said in the Koran:

"Observe prayer at sunset, till the first darkening of the night, and the daybreak reading—for the daybreak reading hath its witnesses.

"And watch unto it in the night . . . and say, 'O my Lord, cause me to enter (Mecca) with a perfect entry, and to come forth with a perfect forthcoming, and give me from thy presence a helping power.'"

His sermon on charity is so excellent that it deserves many times to be repeated:

"When God made the earth it shook to and fro till he put mountains on it to keep it firm. Then the angels asked, 'O God is there anything in thy creation stronger than these mountains?' And God replied, 'Iron is stronger than the mountains, for it breaks them.' 'And is there anything in thy creation stronger than iron?' 'Yes, fire is stronger than iron, for it melts it.' 'Is there anything stronger than fire?' 'Yes, water, for it quenches fire.' 'Is there anything stronger than water?' 'Yes, wind, for it puts water in motion.' 'O our sustainer, is there anything in our creation stronger than wind?' 'Yes, a good man giving alms; if he give it with his right hand and conceal it from his left, he overcomes all things. Every good act is charity; your smiling in your brother's face; your putting a wanderer in the right road; your giving water to the thirsty is charity; exhortation to another to do right is charity. A man's true wealth hereafter is the good he has done in this world to his fellow-men. When he dies, people will ask What property has he left behind him? But the angels will ask, What good deeds has he sent before him?"

Mohammed forbade his followers to make any image of a living thing; to show mercy to the weak, and to orphans, and to be kind to the brutes; to abstain from gambling, smoking tobacco, and the use of strong drink. It was one of his pointed sayings, "They surely are Infidels who say that God is the third of three, for there is no god but one God."

But as good as were his motives, he was destined to meet the greatest opposition. His nearest friends turned against him, some calling him a fool, some a mad poet, a star-gazer, and epithets of that kind; but he steadily pursued his way, though for a long time with poor success, his followers up to his fourth year of his mission being few in number. It is related of him that one day, talking to a man of wealth whom he wished to become a proselyte, when a poor blind man approached and requested to be taught by the prophet. Mohammed was irritated at the interruption, and answered the poor blind man roughly. But his conscience troubled him for this, and his next day's revelation reproved him. This is from the Koran:

"He frowned, and turned his back,
Because the blind man came to him!
But what assured thee that he would not
Be cleansed by the faith,
Or be warned, and the warning profit him?
As to him who is wealthy,
To him thou wast all attention;
Yet it was not thy concern if he be not cleansed,
But as to him who cometh to thee in earnest,
And full of fears—him dost thou neglect."

He afterward, when he met the blind man, made a fitting apology to him. And from that time he began to teach abroad in Mecca and other places, but the opposition and enmity against him became so great that he was forced to leave his native city. On his return his wife died. She was a grand woman, and the prophet greatly revered her memory. To add to his numerous troubles, poverty came upon him, and learning that a plot was laid to kill him, he was a second time forced to leave the city and journeyed to Medina, where a few of his converts resided. On his way thither he and a friend hid for a few days in a cave, over the mouth of which a spider spun its web. When their wicked pursuers followed them and found the web of the spider at the mouth of the cave they were convinced that Mohammed could not have entered there, and turned back. This the faithful are fond of relating as a proof that God protected him from his enemies. This flight to Medina is called the Hegira, and from it the Moslems date their era.

From the date of his reaching Medina his fortunes suddenly changed for the better. A grand welcome was accorded him; power and place were conferred upon him, and instead of a humble preacher only, he became a ruler and law-giver, as well as a successful warrior. He was indignant at those who had refused to believe in him, and as he increased in power he sought to compel those by force whom he could not persuade by his eloquence. In this way he offered to idolaters and Jews submission or death. He urged his followers to deeds of valor in his cause by promises of the immediate joys of Paradise to all who fell in battle. Thus they threw themselves fearlessly into the conflicts that arose, looking upon it as God's warfare against the wicked.

The prophet's anger was, perhaps, the hottest against the Jews, to whom he had made advances and to whom he offered inducements to come under his standard. He had admitted their religion to be divine; he had adopted many of their rites, and made Jerusalem the holy city to which the faithful should turn their faces in prayer. But in return they only ridiculed him, and this cut him to the quick; he could not submit to their satire, and to his death he was their implacable foe. The Sabbath was changed to Friday, the day on which the Arabs met for prayers and religious ceremonies, and in prayer the faithful were taught to turn their faces to their own holy city, Mecca.

Mohammed was successful in all his wars with Arabs, Jews, and Christians, and having obtained full power in that part of Arabia, he decided to pay a visit to his native city, and to administer some deserved punishment to those who had opposed him and reviled him in the days of his unpopularity. About the tenth year after the Hegira he returned to Mecca accompanied by forty thousand fighting men, where he visited condign punishment not only upon his own tribe who had opposed him, but he compelled the general populace to acknowledge his rule and religion.

Upon his return to Medina he was apprised that his race was nearly run, and he dwelt at the mosque that he might take daily part in prayers so long as his strength held out. After inquiring in a humble manner of his neighbors and friends if he had done aught to wrong them, and after reading a few verses in the Koran, he went to his home and died in the arms of his faithful wife Ayesha, being sixty-two years of age at his death.

Prof. Clodd says: "He was a great and true man, and the religion which he set forth met the needs of the men in the east as no other religion did in that day, nor is it likely that it will ever cease its hold upon men or that Mohammed will give place to any other prophet. We must no more blame him for many of the sad errors and vices mixed up with Islam than we should blame Jesus for the evils that have crept into Christianity. Even for the wars he waged he may have found excuse in the history of the Jews. The Old Testament is reddened, in its books of their history, with the story of the shameful cruelty of which they were guilty, of tender children slaughtered, of whole cities put to the edge of the sword, and all this butchery done, as they would have us believe, in the and at the command of the Lord, of whom their ideas were so gross that they more than once offered up human sacrifices to him. And we all know what terrible wars and massacres have taken place in the name of our Christian religion, and how but a very few years ago it was held by many Christians that man could own and buy and sell his fellow-man."

The rapid increase of Mohammedanism has been great in the world, and has probably never been equaled in the growth of all religions in the world. Within a century of the death of the prophet it had converted half of the then known world, and it has been truly said that its green flag floated from China to Spain. Christianity was compelled to give way before it, and has not to this day recovered the ground which it then lost. Down to our times the religion is making rapid progress among the wild tribes of Africa as well as in parts of Asia, and as fast as the savage tribes embrace Islam they throw their worthless idols aside, filth and drunkenness are discarded, and the people are materially elevated and benefited.

"Along the northern coasts of Africa and nearly to the equator, from Turkey to within the borders of China, and among the larger islands of the east, the faith of Islam spreads, divided into sects, and numbers millions who offer to Allah their fivefold daily prayers. From every mosque the blind muezzin or crier proclaims at daybreak, 'there is no god but God; Mohammed is his prophet! prayer is better than sleep; come to prayer!' then each pious Moslem falls forward to the holy city of Mecca.

"I should add that the wars of Islam did not leave waste and ruin in their path, but that the Arabs when they came to Europe, alone held aloft the light of learning, and, in the once famous schools of Spain, taught philosophy, medicine, astronomy, and the golden art of song. The Arabic words used in Science —algebra, almanac, alcohol, and others—together with many names of stars, remain among us as proofs of what Arabia has given to Europe."

ESOTERIC VIEW OF ISLAM.

The following rather clear representation of the religion by an intelligent believer in that faith whom I have met, I will give in justice to the creed of the prophet:

"ITS EVOLUTION.—'Islam,' its proper name, means 'El (the) Shullum (peace) in old Shemitic, fused together by well established philological laws. This root has relations which cannot well be given here in this brief description of the primeval Asiatic conceptions of the universe and the mode of its evolution. On the whole, it represents a connection with the passive or 'rest' side of the cosmic energy. Its god is 'Al-la-h,' which is again a significant compound to those who have mystic tendencies. The old Shemitic signification is 'Al' (the—the definite particle—affirmation of existence'), 'La' (no, the declaration of non-existence), and the aspirate 'H,' which again, I am sorry to say, I am forbidden to explain further than as the energetic product. 'Al,' the 'existent,' par excellence, was the name under which the primeval Shemite race venerated the 'infinite.' In the process of degradation and anthropomorphization it becomes a mere title of the sun, which had been first selected as a symbol of the most powerful. The Shemite anthropomorphized powers of nature, now known as 'Malako' (gods or rulers, or 'angels'), retained the stamp of their differentiation from the parent source in their title of 'El-ohim,' or the 'God Family.' It was one of these minor deities, now acting as 'titular gods' to the various families of the Shemites, who, under the name of Jah, became the 'God of Israel.' At the same time the restriction of 'Al' to the sun having necessitated a new parentage for the gods, the primeval one was rediscovered and named 'Ba-al,' the father god.

"All the time the Jewish and Christian sects were quarreling about the acts, power, and nature of their demi-god Yahweh or Jehovah, the Arab tribes continued to worship their titular gods and goddesses, but all through retaining recollection of the primeval 'Allah' as the supreme, and all the while their own tendency to monotheism increasing. In the nick of time appeared Mohammed, and led the revolution already prepared. He said truly that he did not come to preach a new religion, but to restore the old 'Islam' by transferring veneration and adoration back from the demi-gods to the great primeval source, the God, as he truly phrased it, of their fathers, Abraham and Noah. Unfortunately his neighborhood to the Jews, and the influence of Christian traditions, caused him to make the mistake of considering 'Jehovah' as a synonym of his own ancestral 'Allah,' although I may here mention that the Mohammedans consider the word 'Tora' (which the Koran admits to be the 'word of God' delivered to the prophet [Nubbee-Wiseman] Moses), to be limited to the actual 'decalogue' as a code of law, and do not admit the 'inspiration' of the prior legends (as Genesis, etc.), and the later commentaries and applications which the Jews have incorporated in the Pentateuch.

"The same Jewish and Christian influences caused Mohammed to make the mistake of identifying Ibl-is (Baal or Belus) and Azar-El (the Mighty God) with the opposer or adversary, Satan.

"This mistake goes far to explain the root of subsequent schisms in Mohammedanism—the Exoterics or Traditionists (Soonness) being Judaized—the Esoterics or Protesters (Sheeas) being the Reversionizers to the old Shemite Pantheism. At present the first of these divisions is best represented by the Wahabees, the second by the Babees and Gholaites.

"The reasons of my preference for Islam, as against Christianity, are—

"As an Exoteric creed, it is simpler and more rational, and, therefore, less likely to mystify the masses. Its Exoteric moral code being more practicable of realization than the Christian, produces a greater practical result on the lives of those professing it, whereas, most so-called Christians abandon 'the imitation of Christ' in despair, and have, then, no standard of morals at all. Its principles are antagonistic to all priestcraft. The Koran forbids it. There is no Mohammedan priesthood, properly speaking. Every Mohammedan is his own priest. The cardinal doctrine of Exoteric Mohammedanism may be expressed by the formula, 'God is the only king, and all believers are equal.' Politically, therefore (except in the actual shock of war), Islam is favorable to religious tolerance and individual liberty. Nationally, if it does not stimulate what is called enterprise and progress, it is, on the other hand, favorable to private happiness and material comfort in its true sense of mental contentment and physical sufficiency. Viewed as an avenue to esoteric philosophy and so-called spiritual research, the advantages of Mohammedanism over Christianity are—

"That by virtue of its deep roots in the past (as we have already seen in discussing its development), and of its being in a more direct line of descent from the old Shemite creed, of which Judaism is an aberrant type (the reform of which to its original significance was the mission of Jesus, in which he virtually failed), and so-called Christianity an abortive distortion, it is more calculated to serve as a highway back along which the searcher for the one eternal truth can throw his mind toward the contemplation of the infinite mainspring of time and eternity."

As regards my own views, Christianity and Mohammedanism stand about on a level. The founders of each were doubtless sincere, and they were propagated with about equal zeal by their respective adherents. But they are equally in error in being based upon the claims of supernaturalism, which is a gross error, and which must ever prove a fetter and a misleading guide to the human mind. They have both been very bloody religions—the most sanguinary of any two systems of religion the world has known, which perhaps can easily be accounted for from the fact that the gods they acknowledge—whether they be considered as two separate gods, or as practically one—are more bloodthirsty than any other gods which men have worshiped. They are both religions of the past and are not abreast with the advancing spirit of the age. It cannot be expected that man can advance to his highest possibilities while hugging to his bosom systems of religion which do not recognize the teachings of science, which continually seek to belittle the great works of nature, demeaning it by the claim that it requires a superintendent to manage its actions, and that, I repeat, the great absurdity of supernaturalism as truth. To this extent both systems are clogs to the mentality and freedom of the world, and will both have to give place to the growing and more intelligent needs of mankind. The world needs a far better and far truer system of religion than either of them.

The Anti-Mormon Crusade.

For some months there hav been vigorous efforts made to rouse a public sentiment antagonizing Mormonism, the marrow of the matter being a desire to crush polygamy, as practiced in Utah. Ministers hav preached, politicians shouted, and newspapers screeched, all incessantly aiming to manufacture a public sentiment which should shape and voice itself in legislation to crush out the monster evil, as it is called. Now, I am no polygamist. One wife has been amply sufficient to care for me and mine in the way of household affairs, and had I been disposed to adopt plural marriage, my pocket-book would hav proved an insuperable objection; for, with a life of average industry, I hav found the fight for bread and butter hard enough with one wife and three children. Still, all the time the ministers and the others hav been engineering the crusade, I could not help asking myself questions, from time to time, to test the honesty of the movement, especially on the part of those who are Christians. This query, How happens it that, in the nineteenth century, polygamy has become a sin, when, in ancient times, Jehovah's peculiar and chosen people practiced it ad libitum? How happened it that the good patriarchs —those old saints, who are claimed to hav been the seed-bed out of which cropped Christianity—had wives and concubines innumerable? And why does not the New Testament hav something to say authoritativly on the subject, and if polygamy had been so great a sin, thunder a denunciation and threaten those who were the sinners in this particular direction with the eternal fires of that hell so frequently held up as a scare-crow for other sins?

Polygamy is not denounced, neither is it anywhere treated as a sin. Evidently it was let alone, as by condemming it there must hav been a letting down from their lofty pinnacles of those "good and holy men," made a part and parcel of our common religion, apparently mummyized for all time. It is true St. Paul was opposed to all marriage—monogamic as well as plural. He said it was best that a man should not marry; he was a celibate. Yet he said it was "better to marry than to burn," and we may logically infer that if one wife did not put out the fire, why take as many as might be necessary. As St. Paul is the central figure in the Christian system, the great head-light of all the churches, we may rest easy as to the sinfulness of polygamy, and if we meddle with it at all, must do so on grounds other than religious.

The fiery denunciations hurled at the Mormons are but so many boomerangs, which inevitably return and smite mos sorely the men of God in the olden times, notably David and Solomon, whom we are commanded to venerate. These men are the basis of our popular religion, and their praises are sounded in all the steeple-houses in the land, indeed the world over. So much for the consistency of religionists. With them white is black and black white. Indeed, to be a full-fledged religionist, one must be oblivious to everything which does no pass through the church strainer, crucify reason, and strangle common sense.

A Custom which Christians "Borrowed."

From the New York Sun.

To the Editor of the Sun, Sir: Will you tell me why and by whom the custom of eating eggs on Easter Sunday and dying them red was introduced? J. P. S.

Easter eggs symbolize the resurrection, and they are colored red in allusion to the blood of redemption. The custom dates back to the ancient Hindoos, Jews, Persians, and Egyptians, and it was symbolical of the mundane egg from which, according to an ancient tradition, the earth was hatched. It is said also to refer to the recreating powers of nature, which begin to be displayed in the Easter season.

The Case of Sindram.

DETROIT, MICH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I saw in a recent local paper an account of the execution of William Sindram for the murder of Catharine Crave, in New York city. The account referred to does not giv any particulars further than stating the facts, and that Sindram was an Infidel and remained so to the last. This is the first account I ever saw of an Infidel murderer. Hav you any statistics on this matter? I hav always maintained that all criminals were Christians.

Yours, M. J. MATTHEW.

A great deal of comment has been made upon this case by the religious press, and a good many lies told; while the rarity of Freethinking criminals adds to its general interest. We recently published statistics of two state prisons, in which among several hundred convicts no Infidels or Spiritualists were found. They all belonged to one or another of the various religious denominations. But William Sindram, who was hung at the tombs prison in this city on the 21st of this month for the murder of Mrs. Crave, was an outspoken Infidel, almost an Atheist. Until he committed the crime which he expiated with his life, he bore the reputation of a good citizen. But he had beneath his quiet demeanor an ungovernable temper, and under the constant aggravations of his victim it broke forth, and murder was committed. He was tried, and words which he had uttered a few days before the killing were construed to mean premeditation, and his sentence was death.

As soon as it was known he was to die, the clergy, who, when there was a prospect of his living, had not lifted a hand to save him, immediately visited him and sought to convert him. Receiving the ministers courteously, as became an educated gentleman, he nevertheless told them he did not believe that he could get to heaven on the merits of another. He had committed the crime himself and did not see how Adam was to blame, or how Christ could atone for it. He was reprieved to giv the clergy more time to convince him, but he was no coward or hypocrit, and told them that as he had got to hang he would "die as became a nineteenth century Infidel." And he did. There never was a man who met inevitable death with more calmness and courage. On the Tuesday night before his execution he asked a friend to call at our office and obtain some tracts on death. He wanted the words of philosophers, not the ravings of fanatics. The example of Socrates seemed better to him than the example of Christ; and he went to his death fortified with the words of philosophy and not the unfulfilled promises of theology.

His death affords us the opportunity to say the first good word for a minister we hav had for a long time. Most of the ministers, when they found they could not convert him, deserted him, but the Rev. Mr. Morgan, an Episcopal, did not. Sindram's friends are poor, and Mr. Morgan long ago promised that if he should die he would giv him decent burial. He kept his word. Mr. Morgan is a man, we are informed by a relativ, who has in his heart more of the milk of human kindness than of theology. He gave up trying to convert Sindram and applied himself to making his last days comfortable. Sindram had only one crime to repent of, and he did that heartily. His last letter, written on the eve of his death, shows much of his character. It was written to a young lady, and is as follows:

TOMBS, Thursday night, April 20, 1882.

MISS M. H.: I hav taken the liberty of writing a letter to you, which will be the last one I will write in this world, and when you read these lines I will be a dead man.

Leighton, as you may hav learned through the papers, has been respited until the 19th of May, and it is possible that his sentence may yet be commuted. I hav been a very unlucky man. I never drank or gambled; never did anything for which I deserved to be sent to prison, and always worked hard for a living. Yet if I had been the worst man that ever lived I could not come to a more miserable end. I deserved to be punished, of course, for what I done, but I did not deserve to be hanged. Had I had money enough a year ago to employ a good lawyer, then I would no doubt hav got off with a three or five years' sentence.

During the last few days I hav thought a great deal of you, Minnie, and of Annie and Gussie. What a pity it is that I was never so fortunate as to make the acquaintance before I got into prison of such good girls as you and your sisters are.

Last Sunday I little thought that it would be my last one on earth, and I even considered it possible that I would be a free man once more, after a few years. But in less than one day I knew what was in store for me. When I saw you last, you promised to pay my mother a visit some Sunday a few weeks hence, and I wish you would do so.

Yours, for the last time, WM. SINDRAM.

No doubt the pulpit will descant greatly upon this case, but we hope the priests will tell the simple truth that it is the first one of the kind. A man born with such a temper as Sindram's, while of course he must be held responsible and punished for its misuse, is to be pitied rather than denounced.

Do They Eat in Heaven?

ALTONA, ILL., April 15, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I would like to ask a question through THE TRUTH SEEKER. The question is this: Is there a passage in the Bible that tells us about having anything in heaven to eat? If so please giv chapter and verse,

And oblige, H. R. KEEL.

The bill of fare of heaven is not set forth with much particularity in holy writ, but they must at least hav a bakery up there, for we are told in the ninth chapter of Nehemiah (verse 15) that God "gave them [the children of Israel] bread from heaven for their hunger." He seems to hav made this bread question a kind of credential for the people to test him by, for he told Moses, as recorded in Exodus xvi, 4, that he would rain bread from heaven for him, and the people should go out and gather a certain rate every day, that he (God) might prove to them whether they will walk in his law or not. The bread was for breakfast, and in the evening he gave them meat. Rather scant fare, dry bread in the morning and meat in the evening, but perhaps it was all God had in the cupboard. The bread was pretty poor stuff, and would not keep till the next morning. Some of the people who left it till that time found it bred worms and stunk. Moses got mad at the people for this. But it seems to us that he ought to hav found fault with the baker man instead of his customers. Further evidence that heaven is a provision warehouse is found in Psalms, cv, 40, where we are told that God brought quails and satisfied the people with the bread of heaven. Whether any of it is eaten in heaven or not the book does not say, but as heaven is a very materialistic and sensual place, we suppose the angels must eat. Jesus said that he was the bread of heaven, and that people should eat his flesh and drink his blood in order to hav eternal life.

But if the Bible is vague as to the manner of eating in heaven, it is explicit about eating on earth. The Lord often forced people to devour various unsavory things. Very few people now-a-days would care to sit down to Ezekiel's spread. The famin which came upon Samaria and forced two women to make an agreement to boil and eat their sons upon alternate days, was God-sent, according to 2 Kings, vi, 29, and God told the people of Jerusalem that because they had not kept his judgments the fathers should eat the sons and the sons the fathers (Ezekiel v, 10). In Leviticus xxvi, 29, the flesh of their daughters is added to the banquet spread by a merciful God for the children of his creation. In Jeremiah xix, 9, the people are told that the flesh of friends would be their meat. In Numbers xxiv, 8, God made a hearty meal of "the nations, his enemies."

A great deal more is said about eating, but we hav pointed out enough passages to show that Jehovah and his chosen people were good eaters and that he gave them a great variety. We think the present generation has great reason to be thankful that he is out of the meat and provision business at present.

The Week.

BOTLAND, KY., April 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: A Christian (Campbellite) minister requested me to ask you the following question, viz., "How do you account for time being divided into weeks?" An answer through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER will oblige

Yours, etc., A. B. BRINEY.

If the Campbellite minister will tell the world how the week originated, he will be doing a good deed and making a discovery which none other has made. The week is an arbitrary period of seven days, having no reference to the celestial motions. It has been employed from time immemorial by the old nations. It might hav been suggested by the phases of the moon, or by the number of the planets known in ancient times, an origin rendered probable by the names given to the seven different days. The Jews obtained it from the Egyptians, whose week began with Saturday, but when they left the country, such was their hatred of its people, they changed the first day to the last. The world does not owe the origin of the week to the writers of the Bible, for the seven-day periods were used before Ezra and his scribes ever used a pen, or Moses wandered in the wilderness.

IN the North American Review for May, Carl Schurz, treating of "Party Schisms and Future Problems," presents many well-considered observations which cannot fail to interest in the highest degree that large and growing class of citizens who refuse to be influenced by obsolete party cries. "Days with Longfellow," by Samuel Ward, contains personal reminiscences of the beloved poet just deceased, extending over a period of forty-five years. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, in an article entitled "What does Revelation Reveal?" seeks to prove that the objections brought against the Bible by modern unbelievers are based upon a misconception of the true intent and scope of the sacred volume, but makes out very poorly. Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe writes of "The Navy," with considerable knowledge of its needs, and with a degree of frankness almost unprecedented in the naval service. W. H. Mallock, begins a series of "Conversations with a Solitary." Finally, Gail Hamilton contributes a paper, "The Spent Bullet," in which science, the pulpit and the law are illogically taken to task for the part they respectivly played in the Guiteau-Garfield tragedy. Her scolding of either amounts to very little, but her position is the most absurb and ridiculous ever taken by so well-informed writer as Gail. Her article contains a good deal of sentiment and very little sense.

THE next quarterly meeting of the Spiritualists and Liberalists of Van Buren and adjoining counties will be held at Longwell's Opera House, Paw Paw, Mich., commencing on Saturday, May 6, 1882, at 3 P.M., and continuing over Sunday, May 7th. C. B. Lynn, of Boston, Mass., and Mrs. E. C. Woodruff, of South Haven, Mich., are engaged as speakers. Good music is expected, and a cordial invitation is extended to the public to join in making the convention one long to be remembered. L. S. Burdick, Kalamazoo, Mich., is president, and E. L. Warner, Paw Paw, Mich., is secretary pro tem.

W. F. JAMIESON, having lectured most of the winter in Wisconsin, will next visit Illinois. He will soon deliver a course of lectures in Braidwood, Ill., and is engaged to speak at the State Liberal League which will meet in Bloomington early in June. Address him at Bloomington, Ill., until June 1st.

A NEW auxiliary Liberal League has started at Braidwood, Ill. Mr. F. F. Follett has been there. Also Mr. Orlando Child, of Moline, Ill., takes a life membership in the League. There are now twenty life members. Six of these are in the state of New York and five in Illinois.

THE next meeting of the Heredity Association will be held at the residence of Dr. Foote, at 120 Lexington ave., on the last Thursday evening in April. Everybody interested is invited to be present.

C. W. STEWART is located at 110 Ferry street, Lafayette, Ind., and will be pleased to receive calls to lecture in any part of the country.

T. L. BROWN, of Bimghamton, has written his own funeral address, but has no expectation of using it for a long time.

ELMINA is in New York, and would be pleased to hav friends call upon her at 209 West 34th street.

MR. BLISS has resumed the manufacture of planchettes, and we can supply them promptly.

COL. INGERSOLL has a new book in press which will be ready in a short time.

Talmage Annihilated.

Colonel Ingersoll's second lecture upon "Talmagian Theology" was delivered at the Academy of Music last Sunday afternoon before a large audience, which expressed its approval and appreciation by repeated and prolonged applause, which was so enthusiastic at times as to interrupt the progress of the lecturer.

He said: Mr. Talmage is a Presbyterian, and therefore considers every one born only once as totally depraved, every unbeliever as infamous, and that God cannot be deceived by the veneering of good works. According to him the generosity of an unbeliever is avarice, his honesty is larceny, and his love naught but hatred.

Mr. Talmage is consistent with his creed, and therefore I do not blame him, but his creed; I do not attack him, but his doctrin. I believe that there is something good in in every human being. There is also probably something bad. No one was entirely the one or the other, but there was the seed of goodness in every human heart; there was the capacity for improvement in every human soul.

The so-called wicked men did some good, and it was not infrequently the case that Christians stopped reading the Bible long enough to beat their wives, to murder them, and to trample upon their children. But however bad men might be, none were ever as bad as the Presbyterian creed.

The colonel related the story of the captain of a wrecked ship, who offered to blow out his brains that the men with him might eat his flesh and liv to be rescued, and asked, If that man had died would he hav been damned to eternal punishment? He emphatically said no, but Presbyterianism said yes, if the captain was not a believer in Christ.

In this connection the lecturer referred to the death of Darwin, at the mention of whose name the audience applauded vociferously, as the greatest man England had produced in modern times, and also as the child of nature, who knew more about his mother than any other child she had ever had. Yet he was not a Presbyterian, and, according to that creed, was today suffering the torments of hell. So, too, he might go on to show that all the really great men of the world were now in hell. According to Presbyterianism every soldier of the Revolution, every patriot of the war of 1812, every hero of the Civil war, who was not a believer, is now suffering torments in the prison of God, compared to which Libby and Andersonville were places of joy and ecstasy—a prison where a famin would be a delight.

Cherishing such a belief as this, what right had these Christians to ask an unbelieving man to enter the army? What right had they to go and hire such men as substitutes for themselvs?

Just think of these Christians in heaven, going to the edge and looking over, and one nudging the other and saying: "Do you see that fellow there in the fire? That was my substitute."

The colonel then proceeded to take up Mr. Talmage's arguments. The first that attracted his attention was the assertion that the reason that Infidels hated the Bible was because their minds were poisoned. He said he could see no evidence of a poisoned mind in the hatred of a Bible or a God who upheld slavery and polygamv and taught his children to wage wars of extermination and to plunge the sword of war into the breasts of women and babes.

And yet Protestants make the Bible their pope. The Catholics did better than this, for, if they happen to get an idiot, he will not liv always, and, if he is a man, he may be capable of some growth. But the book cannot change, except as you change it through hypocrisy.

The lecturer declared that the time would come when human beings would be amazed that such things were ever believed. Colonel Ingersoll referred sarcastically to belief in the wonderful power of the Bible, and illustrated it by this story: A man had been in hard luck for a long time, and nothing that he could do would change it. So one day his wife said to him:

"John, if you were to read the Bible and hold family worship, the Lord would help you."

"Well, let's try it; it can't be any worse," said John.

So he got down the old dust-covered Bible and assembled the family. As he opened the book the first thing he saw was a $10 bill.

"What did I tell you?" exclaimed the wife. "I knew God would help you!"

And there was great rejoicing, and John rushed off and bought a large supply of edibles, and the house was filled with the fragrance of plenty. But just as the family were sitting down to the well-cooked meal, a constable entered and arrested John for passing counterfeit money.

The next point to be touched by Col. Ingersoll was the clause that the Bible is inspired. But how is it to be known that the Bible is inspired? Mr. Paine took the ground that the evidence of inspiration was in the possession of the men who were inspired. There is no other evidence, and the witnesses are not obtainable. We do not know that these men ever said they were inspired, and if anybody should now lay claim to inspiration, we would not believe them, because we know them.

"But suppose some voice were to whisper to you," said the lecturer, "what experience hav you got in the Jehovah line of business? How would you know whether it was angel or devil?

"Read the prophecies of the Old Testament," said the lecturer, "and you cannot tell when they are fulfilled, and you don't know to what they apply. You don't know whether they apply to the defeat of Tilden, the administration of Hayes, or the final success of Civil Service reform. They will apply to the destruction of an empire or the death of an insect."

Some men were always endeavoring to show a conformity of the Bible and science, making the latter true as it agreed with the former. He, however, reversed the process, and found whether the Bible was true or not by fiuding whether it agreed with science or not. The blind faith of some people reminded Colonel Ingersoll of another story. A young man in Connecticut possessed a watch, in which he came to hav the greatest faith. One day, about sunset, he looked at his watch and then at the sun, and then addressed this remark to the latter: "See here, old sun, you'll hav to hump yourself, or you'll be two minutes behind time."

But Mr. Talmage cites the fulfilment of prophecies as evidences of inspiration. But how are we to know that the prophecies were not made after they were fiulfilled. There was nothing about these prophecies any way, and the most of them were strange, weird, and lunatic. As an evidence of this, Colonel Ingersoll read, amidst much merriment, a prophecy from the first chapter of Ezekiel, as a specimen. He also referred to the wonderful vision of Daniel, and concluded that there was no doubt that these prophecies had been fulfilled, they were so utterly ridiculous and meaningless.

Dr. Armitage had recently preached a sermon upon the first, in which he said that the wheel within a wheel, mentioned therein, was symbolical of that tender and endearing providence of which Jesus spoke when he said, "The very hairs of your head are numbered."

Colonel Ingersoll thought that an ordinary person, not illuminated by the spirit of prophecy, would never hav dreamed that there was the slightest reference in Ezekiel's vision to anything like counting hairs There was nothing so laughable about this sermon as the sermon itself, and nothing more ridiculous.

The next point that engaged Colonel Ingersoll's attention was the claim by Mr. Talmage that the existence of the Jews as a separate people is a proof that the Bible is true. He then proceeded to show very conclusivly that such an existence did not prove any such thing, but rather the barbarity of Christendom in its persecution of the Jewish people. In this connection he found an opportunity to pronounce a glowing eulogy upon the enterprise, honesty, and uprightness of the Jews. They had been driven from everything else into the channels of trade, but there they had conquered, until they controled the wealth of the world, and made crowned heads bow before them. But now the race was progressing in everything, and, said the lecturer:

"If you would see the difference between some Jews and some Christians, compare the addresses of Felix Adler with the sermons of Mr. Talmage."

"According to Presbyterianism," he continued, "atonement was necessary. Consequently, it was necessary to hav some people bad enough to crucify Christ. According to Talmage, the infinit God took possession of the Jewish people and endeavored to civilize them. If he had succeeded, and they had refused to crucify Christ, heaven would hav been for rent."

The next evidence of inspiration claimed by Mr. Talmage was martyrs, and in claiming it the minister declared that no man ever died for a lie. Colonel Ingersoll claimed that men had died for literally believing that wafers and wine were the body and blood of Christ, for believing in immersion, and for believing in the Koran. And yet, according to Mr. Talmage, these were lies. Such deaths only proved the sincerity of the man and the barbarity of his executioners, and not the truth of any book. Colonel Ingersoll declared that he had a respect for a man who had the courage to die for anything—or to liv for anything.

Dr. Talmage also claimed that miracles were evidences of the inspiration of the Bible.

"What is a miracle?" asked the lecturer, and he answered it with, "Whenever the cause does not produce the necessary effect, whenever any power can step between those links, that is a miracle."

But the question was, Had a miracle ever been performed? Did the audience know any man they would believe if he said he had seen a miracle performed? Certainly not. They would immediately set him down as a lunatic or a liar. He referred to the changing of sticks into serpents and the other miracles in order to convince Pharaoh, and declared that a god who would destroy poor dumb animals with showers of hail would not make a decent fiend. But all these miracles did not convince Pharaoh, nor did all the miracles performed in the wilderness convince the children of Israel. They had water from rocks, were furnished with clothes that would not grow old or even shiny at the knees and elbows, were deluged with showers of quails and bread, and yet they had more confidence in a calf they could make than in this Jehovah. He also referred to the miracles in the days of Christ, which nobody believed, because they were there. Why should we be convinced, who only hear, when those who saw were not?

The fact of the matter was that a miracle could not be proven. No power could step between the cause and effect. Col. Ingersoll referred humorously to the miracle of Elisha and the bears, and said: "I suppose Mr. Talmage would insist that it proves two things—first, that children ought to respect preachers; and second, that God is kind to animals."

Another claim of Mr. Talmage's was that the Bible was inspired because there were more copies of it sold than of any other book. At one time there were more copies of the Koran than the Bible. Was the Koran an inspired book at that time? What if a man should go to the proprietor of the New York Herald and say, "Here is a false story in your paper," and the proprietor should reply, "Why, that cannot be, sir; my paper has more copies issued than any other paper in this country." Would that be any argument?

Mr. Talmage again claimed in support of his position that no Infidel could be elected to an office in the United States. "Suppose," said the lecturer, "that enough Infidels were to get together in one precinct and elect one of their number. Would Infidelity be true in that precinct? There was a time when a man believing in the rotundity of the earth could not be elected, when a Quaker could not be elected, and the lecturer went on to enumerate other instances where prejudice interfered with the result of elections. He declared that no question of metaphysics could be settled by a popular vote.

He then told the story of Daniel in the lion's den, and reflected upon the justice of a god who would save a man and allow women and children to be devoured by the wild beasts, and declared that he wished to rescue the reputation of Jehovah from the assaults of the Bible.

Mr. Talmage had also endeavored to show that the Bible was inspired by referring to the testimony of Eusebius, Irenæus, Polycarp, Origen, and others. Col. Ingersoll arraigned each of these witnesses separately, and showed them to be ignorant, malicious, and mendacious. And yet Mr. Talmage's doctrin was, "False in one, false in all." Referring to the reverend gentleman's position in this matter, the lecturer said, "No man with the brogans of his impudence has the right to trample in the temple of another," and added: "The Christian places his soul above the good of the whole world. I place the good of the world above the good of any individual soul. I place the good of my country, the good of humanity, above all books and above all creeds."

Religion was an individual matter to be settled by each person for himself. The only question that he ever asked in voting was whether the candidate was honest, capable, and a lover of liberty; and furthermore, that he would not ask any man to vote for him for whom he could not vote. He did not get his authority from Rome, or his orders from Sinai. He was glad, however, that Mr. Talmage had stated how Presbyterians vote.

As to religion in politics he said: No priest, no bishop, could be elected president of the United States. No party could carry that load. Why? Because if it was a Methodist bishop all the other churches would vote against him. If it was a Catholic bishop all the Protestants would vote against him. Why? The churches hav no confidence in each other, because they know each other. They know that human liberty is only safe in the keeping of the men who are to be damned. You cannot trust a saint with human liberty.

Another great argument of Mr. Talmage's in favor of the inspiration of the Bible was that if there was no Bible there would be nothing to swear witnesses on. Col. Ingersoll entered into this question at length, and ridiculed the idea that the Bible was at all necessary to make a man tell the truth in a court of justice. He said the custom put rascality upon an equality with honesty. What did people do before there was any Bible? Did they not tell the truth then? He also asked if all men told the truth who swore upon the Bible. He said, on the contrary, rascals took advantage of it to clothe their dishonesty in the gold of solemnity. He did not believe in swearing witnesses at all. The discussion of this subject reminded him of a story. A witness was brought before a country justice to be sworn. "Hold up your right hand," said the justice. "I havn't a right hand," said the witness. "Hold up your left hand, then," said the justice. "I havn't any," said the witness. "Well, then, hold up your foot," said the justice; "no man can be sworn in this court without holding up something."

Colonel Ingersoll declared that thousands of people use their religion as a business. They say it is a good thing. It pays ten per cent right here. Others liv on the policy of insurance. There is going to be a great fire in the next world; we will insure you for so much.

Mr. Talmage had also argued that if the Bible were taken away there would be nothing to put on the center table. Upon thinking this matter over, Colonel Ingersoll had concluded that if everything upholding slavery, polygamy, and murder were taken out of the Bible it would look just as well on the center table as before. He did not think it mattered much anyhow, as a block of wood on the center table would hav as much attention paid it usually as the Bible. He felt that the most appropriate ornament for such a place would be a volume of all the best thoughts and utterances ever published.

Mr. Talmage had also asked, if there was no Bible, what could a mother giv her son? Colonel Ingersoll declared that if all that was degrading to women, obscene, and opposed to civilization were taken out of the book, it would prove a much more fitting gift. He, however, would present a young man with a treatis upon hygiene, physiology, science, or some rich literary work. As a general thing, however, the young man who was presented with a Bible by his mother seldom read it.

Here Colonel Ingersoll related the story told by Edmond About, concerning and Italian gambler who had lost continually at play, and had gone over and prayed to a crucifix to giv him luck. He played again and lost, and again prayed. Once more he lost, and, addressing the crucifix, said: "This is my last penny, and I want you to giv me luck." But it did no good; and when he had lost again he went over to the crucifix, shook his fist at it, and hissed, "Cursed little Jesus, I am glad they crucified you."

Mr. Talmage also claimed that the Bible must be inspired because so many people believe it. Colonel Ingersoll took up the countries one by one in which the Bible is believed, showed that the progress was due to Freethought and liberty, and not to religion. In Italy, he said, the Christian church was first established, and the present pope is one of the successors of St. Peter. For hundreds of years Italy was the beggar of this world, and to her outstretched palm, from every land in Christendom, flowed rivers of gold and silver. He added that if it had not been for Freethinkers, like Garabaldi and Mazzini, the heaven of Italy would still hav been without a star. Of Portugal he said:

"I admit that Portugal would be better if Portugal were Protestant. I admit that every Catholic is in favor of education enough to make a Catholic out of a barbarian. I admit that every Protestant is in favor of education enough to make a Protestant out of a Catholic. But I assert that Catholic and Protestant are both opposed to an education which makes a man's mind free."

Of England he said: "I tell you to-night that the trouble existing between England and Ireland is a religous question and nothing else. When England outgrows Episcopalianism, when Ireland rises above Catholicism, they can be friends, and not till then."

But of all the people who professed a belief in the Bible, as a matter of fact, not one in fifty in the civilized world ever read the Bible, no two ever agreed as to what it means, and no one ever understood it.

Christian nations had always busied themselvs with inventing means to destroy other Christian nations, and the result was that the combined debt of these nations for wars amounted to the enormous sum of twenty-five thousand million dollars. When Christians went to war they each prayed to the same God that they might destroy the other, and when the war was over the victors praised God for their success, and the vanquished thanked him that it was no worse.

Another claim of Mr. Talmage's was that the writers of the Bible knew all about modern inventions, and this the reverend gentleman considered an evidence of inspiration. Job knew all about evaporation, trade winds, and the tides. Isaac understood the Copernician system, and Nahum invented railway locomotivs.

"I am astonished," said Colonel Ingersoll, "that Mr. Talmage himself does not figure in the Patent Office. I can't account for it, except on the supposition that he is too honest to infringe on the patents of the patriarchs."

The lecturer then reviewed the Bible as a scientific work, and said that it was not scientific to say that God made a moral character for Adam—Adam had to make a character for himself; that there could never hav been any disease or death in the world had it not been for the sin of Adam, as all the rocks of the world are filled with the record of death millions of years before Adam was created; that thorns and brambles were produced by original sin; that labor was a curse; that the flood existed; that there was separation after the building of the Tower of Babel; that angels were in the habit of walking around the world eating veal dressed with butter and milk; that Lot's wife was turned into a pillar of salt; that people lived to be nearly 1,000 years old; that the angels of God wrestled with Jacob, got the better of him, and put one of his joints out; that God, in the likeness of a flame, lived in a bush; that a stick could be changed into a living snake; that God caused darkness to be over the land of Egypt, except in the houses of the Jews; that a dry stick budded and blossomed and bore almonds; that the ashes of a red heifer mixed with water can cleanse sin; that an animal saw an angel and conversed with a man; that a spear thrust through the body of a woman ever stopped a plague; that seven priests blew seven rams' horns loud enough to blow down the walls of a city; that the sun stood still in the midst of the heavens; that God made known his will by letting dew fall upon wool without wetting the rest of the ground; that an angel of God appeared to a woman in the absence of her husband, and afterward went up in a flame of fire, and that, as a result of this visit, a child was born, whose strength was in his hair; that water gushed from a hollow place in a dry bone; that one man turned over a house so large that 3,000 people could stand on the roof; that a man was once fed by the birds of the air, who brought him bread, and that afterward an angel turned cook to him, and he ate enough to last him forty days; that a God of infinit mercy destroyed people for laughing at a baldheaded prophet; that the sun went back in the heavens as a sign to a miserable, barbarous king that he was not going to die of a boil; that slavery was once right; that polygamy was once a virtue, and that extermination was mercy; that a being of infinit power and goodness went into partnership with insects, and granted letters of mark and reprisal to hornets; that an infinit being spent forty days in furnishing Moses with plans and specifications for a tabernacle; that when a man commits a sin he can settle with God by killing a sheep; that God ever killed children to get even with their parents; that Jehovah advertised for a lyre, as recorded in 2 Chronicles; that fire refused to burn or water refused to wet; that children have been begotten without a father; that people have ascended bodily to heaven, taking their clothes with them. "In short," said the lecturer, "everything that is foolish, unreasonable, miraculous, or supernatural, is unscientific."

The final point considered by the lecturer was Mr. Talmage's claim that the Bible was merciful. In answer to this he read the 28th chapter of Deuteronomy, which he declared to be the foundation of the Anathema Marathana. Of such a God he said: "I despise that God! I defy that God! There is no such God, except in the imagination of a barbarian."

He stated his objections to the Bible to be as follows:

1. Human slavery; 2. Polygamy; 3. Wars of conquest and extermination; 4. The idea that other nations are not vested with the same rights that you hav; 5. Religous persecution; 6. The divine right of kings; 7. A belief in malicious supernatural beings; 8. A belief in an infinit being who would make a man, knowing that he would be eternally damned; 9. The idea that one man can be good for another or bad for another; 10. The dogma that a finite being can commit an infinit sin.

Perfection, he said, was the only possible evidence of inspiration, and when a perfect book was given him he would believe it. The Bible is not inspired, and the theologians know nothing about another world and very little about this. He closed his lecture with this peroration:

"The hand of earth is stretched uselessly toward heaven. From the clouds there comes no help. In vain the shipwrecked cry to God to-night; in vain the imprisoned ask for liberty and light; in vain the martyr prayed; in vain the slave and mother wept. The heavens are deaf and dumb and blind. Frost freezes, fire burns, slander smites, the wrong triumphs, the good suffer, prayer dies upon the lips of faith—no help from heaven for man. If the naked are clothed, man must clothe them; if the hungry are fed, man must feed them; if the ignorant are raised in the scale of education, man must raise them; if the world is to be made better, man must do it.

"So far as I am concerned, I rely not upon churches, not upon sacred books, not upon out-grown and moss-covered creeds. I rely upon human endeavor—not upon God's; I rely upon the human heart—not upon angels; I rely upon the human brain; I rely upon the efforts of all good men and all good women."

I.

Not having been out of the sight of the smoke of our chimney at Snowville for years and years, it seems so like a fairy dream to be roaming about over the glad and beautiful earth and seeing not only the lovely handiwork of dear old Mother Nature, but the improvements and additions made by the hand of man which are everywhere speaking of a creativ skill and ingenuity far surpassing that of any god he has ever created.

I think some of my readers would hav smiled at the "turn-out" which conveyed me the twelve miles from Snowville to Christiansburg. Finding it impossible to obtain a horse during the busy ploughing season, I was compelled to ride in a large lumber wagon loaded with plows and plow-points (shares); and the first experience was the balking of one horse in the middle of the ford as we crossed the river. He was persuaded to go on, but made a second and worse balk coming up the steep bank on the far side, and fearing to be upset among the ironware, I jumped out and walked till the horse sobered down. Half way to town the wagon stuck fast in a mud hole and we all had to alight, and as I was stepping on the rubber (a big block of wood that rubs the wheel and locks it to go down hills) to get in again, the horses started and threw me down in the mud, plastering my dress and one hand pretty well with the sacred soil of old Virginia; but as I only wore nature's gloves the hand was soon cleansed and the rest of the mud rubbed off when dry.

Just ahead of us on the road was the United States mail. The bag was thrown across a small mule, and on the top of it sat a small boy probably twelve years old, judging by his looks. Every now and then he would jump off and get a club from the road-side and beat the mule, driving it along as one would a refractory pig. and it really was not much larger than a big pig. I asked if he was not afraid the mule would run away with the mail. "If he does I'll get somebody to catch him," was the response. By dint of hurrying the driver I arrived in Christiansburg in time to catch the train, and was soon aboard. It was a keen, frosty morning; quite solid ice had frozen during the night, "killing all the fruit," though probably, like the famous cattle of holy writ, it will much of it be left to be killed over and over again. It was pleasant to sit in the cars and see the lovely landscape go by. Beautiful meadow lands covered with the greenest of grass and grain, rugged hill-sides dotted with evergreens interspersed with large bushes of red bud, whose pink flowers are now out in all their glory. The dog-wood roses, too, showed their white bloom among the dry brown stems of leafless trees. Orchards were pink with peach and apple blooms, and cherry-trees gave promis of a large fruitage; while the Lord's cattle on a thousand hills and his black and white children, some busy at their various avocations, and others standing watching the steam-horse and his train, added variety to the shifting, changing scene. Inside the cars was the usual traveling crowd of men, women, and children; book and paper pedlers, etc. One of these had a collection of Infidel publications, and a passenger bought a volume of selections from Ingersoll's sayings and commenced reading them in a loud, clear voice to his seat-mate. Every sentence made its mark. The reader seemed to be a Universalist or a Theodore Parker man. His companion was pious, but they appeared to relish most of the sentiments of the great orator, but could not fairly understand whether he was a believer in a real God and in a future life or not. Several ladies sitting near me were terribly shocked, and called the book blasphemous, and one said, "Such books should be burnt." I said, "You cannot destroy the truth by burning it." "That's a fact," said one. It was certainly a sign of progress to see Infidel literature publicly sold and read aloud on a train of cars this far south. The last I saw of the reader he was searching the holy book (which he took down from the rack) for the 109 h psalm, and as it's getting hungry-time I'll search for my breakfast.

II.

I hav seen so much in the four days I hav been here that my head feels like a kaleidoscope of shifting, changing views. Been through the Capitol and seen the Senate and House in session, and the big magnates making our laws and deciding important issues by yeas and nays. Hav been through parks, gardens, and greeneries, and seen all the wonderful, strange, and beautiful exotics growing in the moist, warm air of the hot-houses. Hav been to museums and seen the stuffed skins of all manner of birds and animals, and the bones of others, and so many curiosities that the eye and brain refused to take them all in; attended an excellent lecture on anthropology, that not only had no Godism in it, but was directly Infidel or Materialistic in all its leanings, though no overt reflections were made against "our holy religion," and what was best of all, the lecture was well appreciated and cheered by the audience, which was a large one.

I hav been to see a medium, too (Mrs. French), who told me many wonderful things that I cannot understand how she divined. Mentioned the names of ever so many of my dead friends and relativs; described them, and told the relationship and mentioned some I had myself forgotten, but recalled as she reminded me of them. One Charles Bird came. I said I had never known him, but she still insisted I had. I said I had lost a relativ called Charles, but no Bird. "It is Bird," said she. "I see it here." My cousin laughed then, and said, "Oh, its a duck, a Drake." Then the medium shook hands with me heartily, as if the spirit was glad to be recognized. It was my father's brother, Charles Drake. When cousin E. (who went along with me), asked the medium what I did at home, she looked a long time and said, "I see piles of scratch papers, many talk-sheets, and pick-ups," meaning, in her broken Indian (for her's is Indian mediumship), that I wrote on sheets of paper for the newspapers, and the types printed it, as she made motions of type setting. When we had first started, I proposed to go in and not speak for a while, but let my cousin do the talking, as I wanted a test. I was born with a portion of the roof of my mouth and palate gone, therefore hav an impediment in my speech. So my cousin told her I had a natural defect, and she was to find out what it was. She took my hand, and in two minutes passed her other hand up the sides of my throat and described it (the malformation and my mode of talking), better than I could hav done. My cousin was as eager for the test as I, and was as well satisfied with the result. I had a full hour's sitting, but I only mention these few items to show that the wonders are not all humbug; and even if I fail to believe that the dead liv, I think the phenomena well worth our investigation as a new phase of the powers of humanity.

III.

One evening a lady came here, and we had a sitting around a stand for raps, she being mediumistic and a firm believer. But though we sat two hours, only a few faint raps came, and those usually in response to the mention of Guiteau's name. On Sunday we went to Oak Hill cemetery and saw that large and beautiful city of the dead. It was a pleasant resting place for the silent and sleeping ones. The grounds tastefully laid out, grand monuments, plain, simple head-stones, a profusion of flowers, vines, and shrubbery, and stately trees looked calmly down on all. In the afternoon we went to a fashionable Catholic church to "vespers." To one to whom like myself it is all new, it was a beautiful and curious show. All the lighted candles, the gold and glitter, the solemn, sweet music, chants, and elevating the host and bowing to it whenever any one passed in front of it was interesting, and if seen but once is really beautiful so long as one keeps back the thoughts of the gross superstitions and powerful machinery of the institution. The attendance was very large, and the congregation appeared as intelligent and refined as any I hav seen, though it is supposed to be mostly composed of "servant girls," and such classes.

In the evening we attended a spiritual meeting in a large hall. The audience was tolerably large, and seemed to be composed of a thinking, serious, and reflectiv body of people. The speaker was a Mr. White. The lecture was flowery and rather wordy, on "Inspiration." Not argumentativ, so I did not feel greatly interested. After we got home a Mr. L. called. A large, portly man, pretty well along in years, finely educated, and once a strong Materialist, believing death ended all, and still antichristian and anti-theological, but has long been converted to Spiritualism, though he has to attend seances and obtain new tests continually to keep his skeptical nature in subjection to the new ism.

On Monday had a sitting with another medium, but very little, if any, satisfaction. Had she not been vouched for by those who knew her well, I should say all she told was mere guess-work, and wrong guesses nine times in ten. I must confess that, being almost constantly in the society of Spiritualists, and hearing of the very rough usage some of them hav received at the hands of the invisible, has one or two nights made me almost "creepy" about going to bed way up in the third story all by myself. Just as children listened, open-mouthed, to ghost stories, and then go in a crowd to bed and cover up head and ears, so did I almost feel; not at all convinced or believing, only imagining I know not what. The lingering remains of superstitious notions will cling to us despite philosophy, reason, and common sense.

ELMINA.

Washington, D. C., April, 1882.

California Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since my return from the North I hav been lecturing in Sacramento every Sunday, with the exception of four lectures in Stockton and four in Modesto, at both of which places the friends of Freethought held a Paine memorial meeting, which, in point of attendance and interest, speaks well for the growing interest among our people for the cause of truth.

I am at present speaking in Sac City to large audiences, and will remain here until our old chief, D. M. Bennett, reaches here on his way East. I can't afford to miss seeing him, and grasp the hand of a man who dares to speak the truth, for he is one of my kind.

As one of the results of our labor here this winter, the friends hav organized a Liberal Union, with about one hundred members on the roll, with a splendid board of officers—with S. S. Hall as president; J. D. Byers, vice, and S. J. Martin, secretary.

We hav received circulars from Byron Adonis, issued by Liberal League 190, of San Francisco, in relation to a reception to be tendered to Mr. Bennett in San Francisco on his arrival in that city.

The Liberal Union of Sacramento hav also taken steps, by the appointment of an efficient committee, to do the same thing in Sacramento.

We propose to make his heart glad, and send him to his home and friends stronger than ever to contend against bigotry and superstition, and I hope similar ovations will be given with a hearty good-will all along the line of his travel to New York.

Let us honor the man who, from principle, submitted himself to pass through the fires of persecution to attain and preserve for us a larger freedom; and, in the language of our circular, let us keep the fires of liberty burning all along the line.

Last Sunday we spoke to at least four hundred people on the demands of Liberalism, and presented the claims of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for which I hope to send you a number of names soon—at least as soon as the reception is over; now we are all busy getting things in readiness for that event, and I am quite sure that Mr. Bennett's presence here will add to THE TRUTH SEEKER'S list of subscribers.

Of course you are aware that there are a great many Liberal people who do not take any Liberal paper, and do not know to this day that we hav a just cause for which to contend, and that our honored leader, D. M. Bennett, has been in prison at the hands of Christian devils, and that he is now on his way around the world.

I speak advisedly when I say that at least two hundred of my audience, on the occasion above alluded to, had never heard of D. M. Bennett, and had never seen THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Ponderous bodies move slowly, and so does the cause of Liberalism, and yet, thank heaven and the workers for truth, the leaven is at work in the minds of the people.

We want more live men and women speakers on the rostrum, to expound Liberalism and exhort the people to concert of action.

If Liberalism means that every person shall hav a little hobby of their own, and each stand apart from his fellow, then our cause is a forlorn hope, as against the well-organized and well-trained forces of the enemies of Freethought and free religion. Individuality and selfhood—to be able to stand alone—is a grand thing, but transcendently grand and precious is it to be able to join hands for work in a good cause.

Liberalism is not simply negations; no, not that. A fool can deny, but earnest and sincere Liberals will discover that Liberalism has a positiv side, and while she denies the system and methods of Christianity to save the soul, she stoutly affirms in favor of natural development in harmony with the laws of nature. It is not enough to deny the truth of the Bible; we must affirm something in its stead and help the people out of superstition by truth. Church people are alive. and stand together, and pull together for what they deem their cause. Our cause is to us a better, broader, and higher cause. Let us do at least as much as Christians do for our sacred cause. But how can we do this unless we place ourselvs in proper relations to the cause of truth? And to do this we need to sustain the Liberal press, as well as to study books, for this is our only means of knowing what is going on in the Liberal field.

I wish I could say something to inspire every Liberal to take a Liberal paper, and thereby come into sympathy with the cause at large by coming into sympathy with each other. The hearts of Liberals are in the right place, and we only need to bring them into closer relations with each other to find them beating in unison to the grand march of human freedom.

Now you know that I promised that my letter should not be as long as the last, and will close by saying to the Liberals of Oregon, Washington Territory, and British Columbia, whose letters are constantly coming to hand, that I hav not forgotten them, and hope to see them soon. And further let me say I hav just issued a volume of Freethought poems, handsomely bound, Radical, and spicy, to help spread the light. Price, single copy, 75 cents, sent by mail, and $7 per dozen. So in the mean time, to whet the appetite, send to San Jose, Cal., for a dozen of my books, and while you will get more than your money's worth, you will at the same time spread the light.

With many good wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its noble workers, I am, Yours for all truth, DR. J. L. YORK.

The Death of Mr. Darwin.

Charles Robert Darwin, the famous savant, died on the 20th at his residence, Down House, near Orpington, England. He had been ill for some days, but was supposed to be recovering. He did not rally from a relaps he experienced on Tuesday.

Mr. Darwin had been suffering for some time from weakness of the heart, but continued to work to the last. He was taken ill on Tuesday night with pains in the chest, faintness, and nausea. The nausea lasted more or less during Wednesday, and culminated in death in the afternoon. Mr. Darwin remained fully conscious until within a quarter of an hour of his death.

Mr. Darwin was born in Shrewsbury, England, Feb. 12, 1809. His father was Dr. Robert Waring Darwin, a physician and the son of Dr. Erasmus Darwin, the poet, philosopher, and physician. Mr. Darwin's mother was a doughter of Josiah Wedgwood, the modern founder of the English pottery manufacture. He graduated from Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1831. He accompanied the ship Beagle in her scientific circumnavigation of the world in the same year. He was the naturalist of the expedition, and served without salary, and partly at his own expense. On his return to England he published a journal of the voyage. He afterward prosecuted his scientific investigations in England. He published "The Structure and Distribution of Coral Reefs," 1842; "Geological Observations on Volcanic Islands," 1844; "Geological Observations in South America," 1846, and in 1851, 1853, and 1859 a "Monograph of the Family Cirrhipedia" and "Fossil Species." His "Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection," published in 1859, was translated into many European languages, and gave rise to much controversy. In 1862 he published a work on the "Fertilization of Orchids," and in 1868 on the "Variation of Animals and Plants Under Domestication." In 1871 he gave to the world his treatis on the "Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex." He has since published many separate papers, notably on "The Geology of the Falkland Islands," "The Formation of Vegetable Mold Through the Action of Worms," "On the Expression of the Emotions in Men and Animals," and on "Volcanic Phenomena," and "The Distribution of Erratic Boulders," both the latter relating to South America. He received the Copley and the royal medals from the Royal Society, and the Wollaston Palladian medal from the Geological Society. He was elected a member of various English and foreign bodies, was made a Knight of the Order "Pour la Merite" by the Prussian government, a corresponding member of the Academy of Vienna. 1871, and had conferred upon him the degree M D. by the University of Leyden in 1875, and the degree LL.D. by the University of Cambridge in 1877. In the following year he was elected a corresponding member of the French Academy of Sciences. He married his cousin, Miss Emma Wedgwood, in 1831, and leaves several children.

From the New York Sun of April 21st.

Mr. Darwin, the naturalist, who died yesterday, has left to the world a shining name and scientific treasures of inestimable value. His life, for over half a century, has been full of great work, out of which hav grown fertil theories, reaching into all the fields of science and over the whole realm of nature.

It has been a life of continuous activity and productivness from the opening of his manhood until his death, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. When a youth of twenty two he was regarded as qualified to undertake the duties of naturalist for the exploring expedition around the world that was under the command of Captain Fitzroy; and the volume in which he gave the account of his discoveries upon the voyage showed how well he had been equipped and qualified for the work. He continued the pursuit of his studies during subsequent years, observing the phenomena of nature and life with a precision and comprehensivness that had never been surpassed by any other naturalist, and finding in them suggestions that were at once revolutionary and constructiv. Books of geological and zoological research proceeded from his pen, and his scientific peers began to recognize him as a genius in natural history.

When ripe in knowledge, mature of mind. and master of the situation, he delivered the book which established him in the foremost rank, brought him world-wide fame, was turned into all the languages of civilization, provoked a whirlwind of criticism from scientists as well as theologians, and was fortified by the support of many of the most eminent naturalists of Europe, "The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection."

From that time onward mankind has heard of "Darwinism," and the battle has been waged around it in a way that givs sufficient proof of its tremendous importance to the species with whose origin it deals.

Twelve years after the appearance of this book, he furnished another that is complementary to it, "The Descent of Man," and down to the close of his life he adhered to the hypothesis which was the crown of all his research.

Mr. Darwin was a voluminous author. Besides his chief work here named, he published not a few others of importance in special branches of investigation; and it was but last year that he expanded one of his earlier papers into a book of astonishing interest, entitled, "The Formation of Vegetable Mold Through the Action of Worms."

Mr. Darwin has been luckier than some of the other creativ minds of science, in that he lived to see the hypothesis through which he is most familiarly known widely accepted by the men who are capable of properly judging it, and in that foes as well as friends hav always awarded him the highest praise as an original and profound investigator of the phenomena of nature.

The death of Mr. Darwin at this time has deprived us of the opportunity we were about to enjoy of seeing him here in the United States. He had announced his intention of paying a prolonged visit to this country during the approaching summer. Death took him before he had carried out all his plans, but not till after he had made contributions to knowledge equaled by those of few men since the days of Aristotle.

A Live League.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Every available inch of space, standing or sitting-room, was utilized at the regular meeting of the Chicago Liberal League on Sunday evening, April 16th, and the ante-rooms were packed with an eager but disappointed throng. Though the capacity of our meeting-place (holding several hundred) is more than tested every Sunday evening, a larger number than usual failed to gain entrance. After preliminary business and musical performance by our quartet, President Magie formally introduced the speaker of the evening, Mrs. H. S. Lake, who gave us one of the most brilliant, bold, and earnest lectures it has been our fortunate lot to hear. A number of pugnacious Christians are always anxious to obtain the floor and antagonize anything presented by our Radical friends. Nevertheless, even these paid their tribute to the ability and impassioned eloquence with which our gallant moral hero brought her artillery of argument to bear upon their faintly-defended fortresses, and sent destruction and demoralization among the enemies of universal mental liberty. Her theme was. "The Mission of Liberalism," and but a faint idea of her effort can be gained by the following synopsis:

The National Liberal League was organized in Philadelphia in the centennial year. Its object was to amend the Constitution and to repeal all laws bearing oppressivly upon antichristians. It became evident, however, ere long, that immediate political action could not be made to succeed, and that the work of the auxiliary Leagues must be devoted to the preparatory one of developing among the people an intelligent meaning of the word Liberalism, and a consecration to the purpose of bringing about a triumph of its principles.

Mental changes are effected by much the same process as are physical changes. To develop a Christian into an Infidel is oftentimes a long and tedious task. But the work of the teacher of the new dispensation must not stop here; for, after the rejection of Christianity, people divide up into different classes, such as Atheists, Agnostics, Deists, Materialists. Spiritualists, Positivists, Secularists, etc. Defining these different classes, and paying a glowing tribute to the president of the Liberal League. T. B. Wakeman, as a representativ of the Positiv philosophy, the speaker continued: It is the mission of Liberalism to fuse these different elements into one general mass, which shall appropriately be called a Liberal League.

For fifteen hundred years the human race has imbibed from the mother's breast the religion of believe or be damned Throughout the centuries hav scientists and philosophers striven under the displeasure of the church to evolve more correct ideas of God, heaven, hell, duty, rewards and punishments, etc. To giv these strugg'ing ideas a chance to grow and flourish is the mission of Liberalism. The God of blood and sacrifice, of curses and vengeance, of frowns and fury, is to come down out of heaven, and there is to be shown instead infinit space studded with stars and alight with suns, changing, perfecting, dying, as eons unroll from the bosom of eternity.

Instead of the kingdom and the throne, the lamb and the river of life, we are to learn to think, and to say the republic, the court of justice, man, and the development of his life. Instead of looking up into heaven for manna, the best principles of agriculture are to be taught, and that land is for all the people. Instead of depending upon God to convert sinners, we are to learn the law for propagating saints; instead of relying upon the efficacy of the atonement, man is to atone himself for every injury he may inflict upon a fellow; instead of working for a heaven in the skies, he is to labor to build one here below.

Wherever the mission of Liberalism is effected, there believers in gods many and gods few, in no gods, false gods and true gods, gods of reason and gods of revelation, harmonize and fraternize, knowing that these thoughts and expressions are simply the indications of the ideal aspirations of the race and the degree of humanity's dissatisfaction with itself.

Whenever the mission of Liberalism is accomplished, we shall not find the coarse condemnation of the law and the black look of the pharisee toward those whose views of domestic life are heterodox, like, perhaps, the neighbor's religion. It will be seen by those who are capable of comprehending the meaning of Liberalism that polyandry and polygamy, monogamy and celibacy, loves many or few, life love or love for a day, love true and love false, are all the expressions only of the affectional want of human kind, and the vain endeavor of the sexual instinct to evolve higher from lower conditions.

"Truth is colored by the medium through which we view it." No two see life from exactly the same standpoint; and while Catholic pneumonia and Protestant pneumonia are, as Felix Adler so quaintly puts it, exactly alike, the mental changes and heart-needs of people differ so widely as to make no rule of treatment for this part of the being possible for the doctors of divinity or the doctors of law.

All that can be done with the religious sentiment, the sexual instinct, or the political aspiration, is to giv it more room and more information.

The morning of humanity is breaking. Are you up to behold its splendor and inhale its atmosphere? Are you ready to share with me the toil and the trial, the glory and the success, the defeat and the delight of developing new aspirations in human minds, of freeing the young from fear, and furnishing the old with faith born of reason? If you are so ready, if you can so grow, giv your name, your interest, and your support to the National Liberal League

E. A. Stevens,

Another.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The Liberal League of Pittsburgh is neither dead nor sleeping, B. F. Underwood to the contrary notwithstanding. So far from being defunct is it that it manages to stir up mightily the two hundred churches of Pittsburgh and Allegheny City, and keep their dear pastors continually on the ragged edge of fear, lest, like Othello, they may wake up some fine morning and find their occupation gone. Desperation seems to hav made them reckless, and they are willing to adopt any measures that may give promis of enabling them to "sear the hydra heads of heresy." They put forward their ablest and most unscrupulous men, employ misrepresentation, detraction, slander, falsehood, and intrigue. The press is almost entirely under their control; but, not satisfied with this, they hav inaugurated a series of Thursday morning lectures, under the auspices of the "Christian Evidence Society," of which more anon.

The anti-Infidel panic has extended to Mount Washington—one of the suburbs of the smoky city—and the faithful sentinels on the watch-towers of that earthly Zion have "pooled their issues," and are holding union services, at which Infidels are roundly abused, without any reference to accuracy of statement, while common sense has ta'en the road,

An' off an up to Cowgate.

But it would appear that these very zealous gentlemen hav overdone the business, forgetful of the shabby treatment of Uzzah, who was a little too zealous in a good (?) cause; in proof of which I clip a couple of items from the daily papers of Pittsburgh:

From The Leader.

The M E and Baptist congregations of Mount Washington held union services in the Mount Washington Baptist church last night, when Rev. Williams, pastor of the M. E. church, was to preach the sermon. The Baptist pastor, after stating to the assemblage that Rev. Williams was about to address them, sat down. Mr. Williams arose and was about to state his text, when he fell in an apoplectic paroxysm. Drs. Wilson and Potts were called, and relieved the unconscious man of some blood, which brought him to. He was removed to his home and this morning was greatly improved, though still confined to his bed.

From The Times.

About eight o'clock last evening Rev. Gustavus Backert, formerly pastor of the Mount Washington Lutheran church, but now a supply pastor, was attacked by a fainting fit while sitting on a chair in Charles Merz's saloon, No. 15 Carson street, South Side, and in falling struck his head against a stove and cut several deep gashes in his head. His injuries are not serious. When they were dressed none of his friends would assist him to his home. He will, probably, be disfigured for life.

Can it be that God has at last determined to see justice done, and has espoused the cause of the much-abused Infidels? or is he only sick of the indiscriminate lying of his holy mouth-organs, and determined to put a stop to it?

Of course we Infidels are neither silly nor dishonest enough to assert that God had anything to do with it. Between apoplexy and whisky common sense can find an explanation.

But suppose this same phenomenon had occurred at the Liberal League meeting last Sunday when Dr. Audley arose to inveigh against "Prophets, Priests, and Kings;" what then?

Monday noon would hav seen the religious dailies of the entire country garnished with such flaming head-lines as these: "Terrible Warning to Infidels;" "The Judgment of God;" "A Blatant Blasphemer Struck Dumb," etc.

Now, it seems to me that logic and consistency would demand that if such phenomena be deemed judgments in the one case, they should be in the other. If not, why not?

Let the clergy of Pittsburgh, and especially of Mount Washington, who are so fond of prating about special providences, and distorting natural phenomena into judgments of God, display at least a show of consistency by manfully facing the music when it is their ox that is getting gored. Further, let them remember that however commendable zeal, in the defense of truth, may be, there is one thing more commendable still, and that is truth itself; and when they feel inclined to emulate the example of that illustrious Christian, Paul, who said, "If through my lie grace hath more abounded, why, then, am I accounted a sinner?" let them remember the fate of Ananias and—draw it mild. Experience has taught us to not expect either candor, courtesy, or justice from the paid advocates of an antiquated superstition—made desperate by its dying throes—but having raised on high the banner of the free in priest-ridden Pittsburgh, we will lower our arms only in death.

Yours, for liberty and light, League.

Divinity Endangered.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Three or four months' traveling nearly cut my connection with your paper and all else on the Atlantic coast.

Returning last week to my home, there waited me an invitation to write a letter of greeting to Mr. Bennett on his arrival at San Francisco, in his passage round the globe. It was too late to comply with the request of the committee of correspondence, but let me here express my thanks for the kindly invitation, and my congratulations to our chief, and his many patrons and friends, that the long voyage has been so signally prosperous, and so wondrously rich in its experiences and observations, so industriously reported at every stage. I think no tourist nor traveler of modern times has ever accomplished so much at sight-seeing and recording and publishing as has the editor of The Truth Seeker. The first thing which meets my eye and ear on reaching home is the lively controversy now waging among the friends and supporters of the Andover, Mass., divinity school, one of the oldest, wealthiest, and most widely known institutions of the kind in America. It was founded in the year 1807, its object being, as avowed "to provide for the church a learned, orthodox, and pious ministry."

The fourth article of faculty regulations and requirements reads thus:

"Every professor in this University shall be a Master of Arts, of the Protestant reformed religion, in communion with some Christian church of the Congregational or Presbyterian denomination, and sustain the character of a discreet, sober, learned, and pious man; and shall be of sound and orthodox principles in divinity, according to that form of sound words, or system of evangelical doctrin, drawn from the scriptures, and denominated The Westminster's Assembly's Shorter Catechism.

"If, on the associate foundation, he must also be an ordained minister of the Congregational or Presbyterian denomination."

Next follows, in article fifth, "the creed," in three full octavo pages, which every professor, on the day of his inauguration into office, must "publicly make and subscribe, in the presence of the trustees of the Seminary;" and to be by him repeated in the same presence, "at the expiration of every five successiv years! and no man shall be continued as president or professor in this institution, who shall not continue to approve himself to the satisfaction of the trustees; a man of sound and orthodox principles in divinity, agreeably to the system of evangelical doctrins contained in the said Westminster Shorter Catechism, and more concisely delineated in the aforesaid creed."

If, Mr. Editor, you can make room for the following extract from the creed, you will giv readers an idea of what is required of a professor:

"And furthermore I do solemnly promis that I will open and explain the scriptures to my pupils with integrity and faithfulness; that I will maintain and inculcate the Christian faith, as expressed in the creed by me now repeated, together with all the other doctrins and duties of our holy religion, so far as may appertain to my office, according to the best light God shall giv me, and in opposition, not only to Atheists and Infidels, but to Jews, Papists, Mohammedans, Arians, Pelagians, Antinomians, Arminians, Socinians, Sabellians, Unitarians, and Universalists; and to all other errors, ancient, and modern, which may be opposed to the gospel of Christ, or hazardous to the souls of men."

The controversy to which I hav referred, in the institution, grows out of the appointment of a new professor, whose former preaching, it is held, does not comport with the Andover requirements.

The present professors admit that they or their predecessors hav banished some things, "infant damnation" included, and "perdition of the heathen." Over their own sign manual the professors say:

"We would beg leave to remind our reviewer that what has most excited criticism in Dr. Smyth's position is a natural development of principles which the New England theology has especially cultivated, and which for more than a generation hav been taught with particular emphasis from the chair of Christian theology at Andover—the universality of the Atonement, and the necessity of personal choice in order to the existence of either guilt or virtue.

"These principles hav gained their rights only by hard conflicts. At every stage the cry of heresy has filled the air. But they hav won the day. They hav banished the dogmas of guilt for Adam's sin, of infant damnation, of passiv regeneration of the universal perdition of the heathen. The path of New England theology is thus strewn with concessions concessions to an advancing knowledge of God's word concessions to truth."

But my article grows too long. Let me just add one brief but most torrid quotation more from the Andover creed, and I close:

"The souls of believers are at their death made perfect in holiness and do immediately pass into glory. . . . But the wicked will arise to shame and everlasting contempt; and with devils be plunged into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone forever and ever."

This provision of the creed is presumed to be still intact, untouched. At any rate, not "banished," as the professors say, with infant damnation. So there may be hope for Andover yet.

Concord, N. H., April, 1882. Parker Pillsbury.

The New Chronology.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The Bruno-Wakeman system of chronology published in The Truth Seeker of the 1st inst. is a natural, scientific, and magnificent system. May it become universal. You see I hav adopted it, because, in my opinion, it is just, reasonable, and adapted to universal ends. We cannot now apply it to the drawing of legal documents, making wills, etc., but we can apply it to social uses and in our correspondence to your splendid journal, and to all other Liberal literature. The facts and logic and historical research in Mr. Wakeman's article in support of adopting the new chronology are arraved in a masterly manner, and are convincing to every thoughtful, rational mind. For years I hav heartily detested dating my letters, public and private, according to the chronology based on the advent of "our Lord," that Lord whose presence in the world has been the curse and scourge of mankind.

Since we hav dethroned the man-God or the God-man, with all his superstitions, or superstitions founded on and in his name, let us forever abolish that chronology connected with the "immaculate," and which is but a record of the blood of the innocent. Freethinkers, wherever we are scattered throughout the earth, let us adopt the chronology founded in memory of the heroic Italian Freethinker Bruno, who gave his life to the cause of mental emancipation. He was basely murdered by the Christians, but his "soul goes marching on" through the eternal years, We are carrying on the sublime work he commenced, each according to his humble power, but united we shall triumph over the priestly despots who hav so long enslaved poor humanity. It is only a question of time until the chains binding the slaves are broken. Speed the glorious hour of man's redemption from ignorance, bigotry, and superstition!

San Francisco, 4, 7, 212. Byron Adonis.

Thomas Paine.

From the Memphis Appeal.

In the Appeal of April 16th appears a letter purporting to be written by Dr. Franklin to Thomas Paine, urging him not to publish that celebrated work against the Bible, "The Age of Reason," and advising him not to "unchain the tiger." This pious fraud has been so often exposed, I am surprised that journalists of your information and intelligence should reproduce it. Dr. Benjamin Franklin died in 1790, three years before a line of "The Age of Reason" was written. The first part of that work was written in Paris in the latter part of 1793, amid the terrors of the French Revolution, when the author was in hourly expectation of arrest and execution, and, in fact, Paine was arrested the last of December, 1793, upon the order of Robespierre, and imprisoned at Luxembourg within six hours after he had finished that great work. The second part of "The Age of Reason" was written for the most part in that prison, where the author lay nearly a year, and the whole published by Paine some time after his release. The letter which you publish, purporting to be written by Dr. Franklin, was written by a lying scribbler, Grant Thorburn, and published by the Bible Society under the title, "Don't Unchain the Tiger." Dr. Franklin was himself an Infidel, as was Jefferson, but they wrote no book against the Bible, and hav therefore escaped the wrath of the priesthood, which was all reserved for the devoted head of Paine. Forgetful of his great services to the cause of American freedom, they hav pursued him relentlessly with every weapon that malice and detraction could invent.

Such is the fate of all who dare question their creed. But a few years ago, when a great flood was pouring down the Mississippi, a prayer-meeting was called to avert it. For suggesting that wheel-barrows and spades in the hands of vigorous men employed in enlarging the levees would be more efficacious than prayers, the Appeal called down upon itself a torrent of wrath more fierce than the floods of the great river. Within a twelvemonth we hav seen a minister, the Rev. Mr. Long, ostracized and driven from his pulpit by a conclave of bigots, because he believed that Christ died to save all mankind, and refused to believe that hell is paved with the bones of infants foreordained to be damned. But, thanks to the Infidels—Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and others—the thumbscrew and fagot are no longer possible, and Mr. Long preaches to an overflowing house. "The gospel of Geneva is dead, and in the streaming light of the ninetennth century Calvin is nothing but the obscene owl of superstition, hooting at the midday sun of intellectual and spiritual freedom." "On the ruins of its ivy-grown cathedrals, ecclesiasticism, surprised and blinded by the breaking day, sits solemnly blinking at the light and life about it, absorbed in the recollection of the night that has passed, dreaming of new phantoms and delusions in its wished-for return, and vindictivly striking its talons at any heresiv assailant who incautiously approaches too near."

Letters from Friends.

CARRICK, PA., April 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: If not too late I inclose $5 for Round-the-World book, and $1 for Mr. Bennett's and Mr. Robert Ingersoll's life-size lithographs. Yours,

WM. WALKINSHAW.

ERIE, COL., April 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6—five for the Round-the-World trip, if I am not too late, and the balance for books. The want of cash has kept me from subscribing sooner. Yours truly, G. A. LLOYD.

EAST GREENWICH, R. I., April 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, which you may put down for the volumes of the journey round the world. I hav read Mr. Bennett's letters with much interest, and as my copy of the paper is worn with much reading, desire to preserve the record in another form. Hoping that its editor will liv long to battle for truth and expose error, I am,

Yours truly, DANIEL C. KENYON.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 9, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 to meet friend Bennett on his return. I want the books of travel. I want a Bible for reference, and I think Bennett's Bible of the Holy Land will suit me. I never owned a Bible. I hav been keeping house fifteen years, and hav two children, a boy and a girl, but I hav never kept any Bible about my house. I never told a lie in a horse trade nor tried to palm off a bad article on a greenhorn. I use no tobacco, tea, coffee, or liquor. Some Christians say I am very near the kingdom, but I say I hav been an activ worker for the cause of Infidelity for twenty years, and will remain so during my life. Yours respectfully, W. H. H. GRA-AM.

BELLVILLE, KAN., April 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5, to be appropriated as per inclosed order. Vol. I. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" is received. I am glad to see it lying on my table beside the old Jewish history, the Bible. Its records bear to me far more of truth and certainty than that old Jew book. I want to see and hear Mr. Bennett talk some day. It would afford me a very great pleasure indeed, and could the shortening of my life but add a few more years of effectiv work in Liberalism to his life he would freely get it. It is truly a pleasure to know that superstition is rapidly dying out, that knowledge is taking the place of ignorance, that tyranny over the mind of man is rapidly yielding to truth and freedom. Truly yours, H. PATRICK, M.D.

LOWELL, MICH., April 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a "V" now for the Round-the-World book. I wish my name in the book, and hope there will be as many to help bring our old scribe back as there were to send him away. He is worthy of a few friends to help bring him to his cottage by the sea. I feel for that young man that went back on science and reason and took up with superstition and belief, but I cannot reach him. The young ladies are bad customers to deal with if the head is not right. You know how it was with Adam; his head must hav been out of sorts. I don't think King Solomon's head was just right on the girl question, and a good many of those old saints, preachers excepted, go over on the gee side. I don't think an organ will make a Christian of me, for we hav had one in the house for ten years. As to the girls, I will run my own risk and quote some scripture. I hav heard said you could find everything in the Bible. Seek first the kingdom of some young lady with common sense and her righteousness, and then all shall be added unto you. I suppose "all" means cash. If so, then I will send for THE TRUTH SEEKER library, for I want it, and shall hav it when able. Send book as soon as convenient. Please send catalog of your books, and I will try and help you to a sale for some of them. WM. R. BOWEN.

EPHRAIM, UTAH, April 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $5—$2.25 to apply on binding the books of Mr. Bennett's travels around the world, and the balance as directed.

As I see by your esteemed journal that there are men in the field lecturing on Freethought, I often wish some would come to Utah on a mission of that kind, and particularly to San Pete county, as there are a good many Liberal people here. But the yoke of the Mormon priesthood is so hard to break that it takes men of talent as well as courage to tackle the monster and demolish it. I am doing what I can, but the name of Freethought sounds repugnant in the ears of so bigoted a set as liv here; and if it were not for the strong arm of the law there would soon be a movement on foot to exterminate all those who are not in sympathy with Mormon theories.

Yours for Freethought, R. CLANSON.

OMIO, KY., April 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I got the first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" to-day, and am very well pleased. Yours truly, H. KEELY.

STREATOR, ILL., April 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The first annual convention of the State Liberal League of Illinois will be held in Maennerchor Hall, in the city of Bloomington, Illinois, on Saturday and Sunday, June 3 and 4, 1882. Prof. W. F. Jamieson and other good speakers will be there to address the meeting. It is very desirable that as many of the members of the State League as can possibly come should attend this convention, as much important work is needing to be attended to in order that we may push forward the Liberal movement in Illinois. It has been proposed that we make arrangements to employ and keep a good lecturer in the field in this state. If that is done, he or she will need a little help outside of what may be collected by them in some of the places where their services may be needed. This deficiency can be made up if all will only help a little. The State League has now one hundred and forty-one life members. This is a good showing for the first ten months' growth. One dollar makes any man or woman a life member of the State Liberal League of Illinois; and all of the money thus received is expended in building up the organization in this state. Let every one who feels like extending a helping hand send me a dollar and become a member of the State League. We need the money for defraying the expenses of the coming convention. We hope that everybody who can will attend the Bloomington meeting. Prof. Jamieson writes me that he shall make Bloomington, Ill., his post-office address until after the convention, and that he will accept calls to lecture in Illinois up to that time. Now, friends, this is the last call I shall make on you through THE TRUTH SEEKER until after the State League Convention; but I entertain hopes of meeting many of of you there. Address me at Bloomington, Ill.

WHITEHALL, MICH., April 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: As the time of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER expired the first of this month, in order to contribute my share in keeping up the general supply of Liberal literature, I herewith send you the subscription price for another year. Brother Green delivered a lecture to a few of the unterrified here (one of the most stormy nights we had this winter), and succeeded in creating a little ruffle in the wave of thought, and as I take Bro. Chainey's publication and circulate it somewhat, there is music in the air which sounds very melodious to the ear of an old Infidel like myself. It seems to me about time we should giv up the old literature of a semi-barbarous age; quit working for imaginary gods and devils, and try to do a little more for humanity. I think when Brother Green suggested Liberal socials, he struck a key-note, which, if taken up by the friends of progress, would result in much good to the cause. The social element is the strong pillar of the church to-day, without which it would crumble away in less than one generation. Let Liberals show as much zeal in the cause of truth and humanity as the church does in the cause of imaginary gods and devils, and the current would soon become irresistible, and the time wasted in seeking for a crown and a harp would be spent in the proper elevation of humanity here, and to the relief of the distress which, to a large extent, is due to the propagation of these superstitious notions. But as I hav already sufficiently taxed your patience, I remain,

Yours for truth and right, N. F. STRONG.

P. S.—Inclosed find order for $3.25. For the twenty-five cents send me Bradlaugh and Besant's "Fruits of Philosophy." N. F. S.

MARSHALL, KANSAS, April 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The radical expounder of Freethought principles, E. C. Walker, has just dropped among us, alighting with both feet plump upon Orthodoxy's abdomen, everlastingly knocking the wind out of the monster, and bruising him up in such a thorough manner that we hope it will be many a day before he will recover.

Mr. Walker is a deep thinker, a logical reasoner, a splendid speaker, and as pleasant and sociable a gentleman as one would please to meet. Such a worker as he should be kept with the harness on all the time. It seems to me that the majority of Liberals place far too low an estimation upon the services of our lecturers. They read Ingersoll's lectures and think they hav found out every fact in nature. If you but hint "lecture" to them they will point to the colonel's works, and sit dozing away, picking their intellectual teeth after the feast they hav had; while probably the Bible is being daily read in their own school.

Liberals, look at the thousands of clergymen who are almost hourly tugging away at the mind of the masses to pull them into the slimy slough of superstition. Can one man, singly and alone, cope with this mighty host? No. There are thousands of ears for every Liberal lecture; there are thousands of eyes for every Liberal paper. Then let us not depend upon any one in our ranks, but upon the army. This alone is the only way we can ever accomplish anything. When there is an army in front we can never conquer by bushwhacking.

Yours, for organization, S. V. MULKEY.

THE SOUND THEORY IS NOT OVERTHROWN.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., April 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: About ten months ago you published a communication of mine, in which I showed that Mr. Wilford Hall, the "Christian hero," who had demolished the undulatory theories of light, sound, etc., and, in fact, "Infidel science" generally, did not understand the doctrins which he presumed to attack. Your contributor, Mr. Irvine, either did not read THE TRUTH SEEKER then, or was not convinced, for in the two last numbers he recapitulates Mr. Hull's argument, and evidently thinks it deserves attention. I can hardly point out all the errors which show that it does not, for they are really innumerable; but I may indicate a few of the chief without taking up much space. Hall says that sound cannot be propagated through iron, though it can through wood. He is entirely mistaken. What, but iron, is a telephone-wire? Sound can be propagated through any substance which will vibrate—that is, any substance. It is chiefly propagated through the air, but no one ever said exclusivly, except Hall, who wastes a great deal of space upon this man of straw. I was taught, at ten years of age, that sound could be propagated through anything, and in proof of it, bidden to put my ear to a wall, while some one struck with a hammer at a distance. In this experiment two blows are heard; one report coming through the wall, the other, after a perceptible interval, through the air. Hull's assertion, that the waves produced by a fan do not radiate ten feet, and his comparison between the fan and a tuning-fork would make a cat laugh. All waves extend as far as the medium (air, water, etc.) in which they are raised. Hull evidently thinks the fan ought to make more noise than the tuning-fork, because it is moved with greater force. He does not understand the difference between force, or momentum, rather, and velocity. If he did, he would not talk such arrant nonsense as the following, which I must giv entire:

"'Wave lengths,' says Tyndall, are measured from the center of one condensation to the center of the next. Wave length of sound depends on pitch or number of waves per second. A piccolo, flute, or high D has 4,752 vibrations per second; the length of each wave is under three inches per second. The loudest tone of an organ has sixteen vibrations; wave length seventy feet.' Now, this tone makes the air particles move thirty-five feet and back sixteen times per second each. This equals five hundred and sixty feet a second, or three hundred and eighty-one miles per hour, which would produce a tornado double the velocity necessary to sweep a village to ruins. If this theory were true, an organ would burst the cathedral walls."

Now, just let me explain. The force or momentum of a moving body varies as its velocity multiplied by its weight. A tornado is a column of air weighing thousands of tons, and moving, not only about its own axis, but also forward, at a rate of perhaps a hundred miles an hour. Those waves, moving at more than double that rate which strike the windows of a cathedral when the organ plays, are (see above) only seventy feet long, and instead of the whole mass of air within that small space being hurled forward bodily, there is simply an alternate compression and expansion of it, at the rate named. See any difference? Hall didn't. Is it "overbearing, blundering, and unreasoning" to call this stuff, from one who writes as a scientist, and pretends to correct the science of the world, ridiculous? Mr. Clark Irvine, or Mr. Wilford Hall, proceeds:

"Tyndall says that 'in sound the quantity of matter set in motion augments as the square of the distance from the center of the explosion; the loudness diminishes in the same proportion.' That is, the loudness of any tone four feet from the sounding body is but one-sixteenth as great as it is at the body itself."

Oh, no, my dear sir. It is much worse than that. The sound four feet from the sounding body is but one-sixteenth of what it is at one foot. The subsequent argument in the first letter is based on the old confusion of velocity with momentum. The velocity of a sound wave corresponding to its "pitch," is the same from the sounding body to the end of the atmosphere. The momentum (corresponding to the loudness) diminishes as the square of the distance increases, because the latter is the ratio for the area of concentric spheres, and the successive waves may be regarded as spheres, in each of which the same aggregate momentum is distributed over a greater or a lesser surface. The same rule, for the same reason, applies to gravity, and all other forces radiating from a center There is something very funny in the triumphant exclamations of the "Christian hero" at the absurdly rapid increase of the ratio. If he were to try the experiment of putting a lighted candle a foot from his nose, reducing the distance to six inches, three inches, an inch and a half, and 0.75 of an inch, I think he might suspect those dogmatic scientists had gone further into the matter than he, and it absolutely is 256 times as hot at the last of the these distances as the first! The test is not philosophicably delicate, but I have an idea it would be rather convincing.

I do not think Mr. Irvine's second letter needs a very careful analysis. He says scientists assume sound waves to be "in all respects" like those produced by a stone in water, and immediately proceeds to prove the contrary by his quotations. Sound waves, I will inform him, are spherical, or, to be more exact. they consist in three dimensions. Scientific truth is not learned, discovered, or systematized without immense labor. The course of the human mind, since she broke the dungeon of the dark ages, has been marked at every step by the tombs of discoverers who gave their consecrated lives to the pestilential jungles, to the lightning, the tempest, the epidemic, the noxious recesses of the earth, the untrodden sands of the desert, the eternal ice of either pole. The martyrs of modern civilization hav died sometimes in battle with the Bible God whom Wilford Hall still champions. Most of them, however, fell fighting the "Great Designer," whom Clarke Irvine believes in—the gentleman who designed things so well that every discovery requires a life. Over both they hav been victorious. Their entire devotion, their undivided love of facts, and their simple attatchment to the irresistible inductiv method, hav created that noble temple of truth, which we call science, a temple far, indeed, from complete, but which already exceeds the united structures of the past, and in which the worship of the universe will be offered when the memory of all the ancient gods has ceased entirely. It is easy to misunderstand and to ridicule, but impossible to refute them; and, therefore, as Mr. Irvine complains, it is not very easy to provoke them. Cranks, like Hall, who undertake to demolish the whole of "Infidel science," are now such familiar characters that no scientist wastes time upon them.

You observe I don't set up for a scientist. The subject for me has an interesting little side moral. Hall, a worse crank than Joseph Cook, for he pitched right into mathematics, which Joe was always prudent enough to keep away from, came out as an othodoxy-indicator. His avowed object was to clear the way for the old ideas by destroying the new. His book is a specimen of the movement in favor of ignorance. It was hailed with shouts by many religous papers, has converted a few uninformed Freethinkers, and has been approved by at least two college professors. It is, therefore, a gratifying measure of that ignorance with which we hav to contend. Otherwise it is no more to any student of such matters than blue glass or condurango. C. L. JAMES.

ST. JOHNS, MICH.

MR. EDITOR: I am a resident of New York city, and at present on a visit among relativs and friends who settled in this section of country some fifteen or twenty years ago; at which time the sturdy oak, beech, and maple towered above the earth in solid columns for miles around, presenting almost a hopeless task to those who had come hither to make their homes.

The change which has been wrought here during the past fifteen or twenty years, is magical. The defiant timber lands hav been swept away, and in their stead may be seen cultivated farms, comfortable dwellings, well filled barns, and last, but not least, the eye is frequently greeted with that foremost civilizer of the age, the school-house.

The village of St. Johns has about 3,000 inhabitants, is the county seat of Clinton county, and is located on the Detroit and Milwaukee railroad, some 98 miles from the city of Detroit. Situated as it is, in the midst of a splendid farming country, it is not surprising to learn that there are more cattle and grain shipped from this point than from any other on the line of the D. & M. road.

Having thus briefly alluded to the temporal blessings which prevail here, I will endeavor to lay before your readers the provisions which hav been made for the spiritual welfare of the inhabitants.

There are five churches here, viz., Catholic, Methodist, Episcopal, Congregational, each of which is laboring with varying success to convert the heathens which surround them. Their labors in this respect would doubtless be far more effectual and much more congenial were it not for the fact that several of the heathens hereabouts hav taken it into their heads to convert the churches, thus reminding one of the man who was getting along so nicely in the jungles of Africa hunting the tiger, but did not consider it quite so pleasant when the tiger commenced to hunt him.

The Freethinkers in this section of country, are a wide-awake, intelligent class of people, and are zealous workers in the cause of liberating humanity from the shackles of superstition.

Notably among this class is a man a little past sixty years of age, named M. Babcock. He is a host in himself, and is, perhaps, doing as much if not more than any other one man in the state to open the eyes of the people with regard to the Bible and the dogmas of the Christian church. He has retired from activ business with a competence of this world's effects, and, as he puts it, intends to spend the balance of his days in doing all the good he can. The good he is doing does not consist altogether in his lecturing, issuing tracts, pamphlets, books, etc., but he is noted for putting his hand down in his pocket and helping those who are needy and in distress. The writer had the pleasure of listening to a lecture given by Mr. Babcock in Opera Hall in this village on the evening of Nov. 1st, 1881, the subject being, "Is God a Prayer-Hearing and Prayer-Answering God?" The gallery and main body of the hall were packed with an appreciativ audience, who applauded the speaker vigorously whenever he made an effectiv hit; and, be it said, these were numerous and of a kind that will not soon be forgotten by those who heard him. He alluded very feelingly to the sad taking-off of our late president by the assassin Guiteau, and argued that the latter's prayers were answered, not only in the death of the president, but they were seemingly answered in what transpired in the treatment of the president, his removal to Long Branch, etc., thus enabling Guiteau to set up a strong defense. He dwelt at considerable length on Guiteau's imagining he had a divine commission to execute, and cited other instances of a heart-rending character of people who had become so crazed on the subject of religion and the teachings of the Bible as to take the lives of their offspring under the impression that they were doing the will of God. His argument disproving the efficacy of prayer was particularly strong and forcible, and must hav made a deep impression upon all who heard him. He referred to a custom which is in vogue at the county poor-house, some three miles from St. Johns, of placing the dead bodies of paupers in a pickling vat and selling them to a medical institution at Ann Harbor, where the bones were scraped and wires adjusted and sold to the medical fraternity. He regarded this a disgrace to the state of Michigan, and, for one, he would be willing to donate something toward digging a hole to put these poor creatures in and giv them a respectable burial. He thought it strange that the clergy of St. Johns were silent on this subject; and professing as they do to hav a religion especially adapted to the wants of the poor and needy, it was not a little surprising that they rarely or never visited the almshouse to offer spiritual consolation to the inmates.

The only way that he could account for this plain neglect of duty on the part of the clergy was that the inmates of the poor-house did not shear well. He thought a little less of the God of the Bible and more humanity was one of the crying wants of the age.

His closing remarks were of a general character, in which he arraigned the clergy for their cowardice in not coming out to defend their side of the question, after being cordially invited to do so, and his points with reference to the Bible being read in the public schools of St. Johns were exceedingly well taken; and considering that there are many in this village who concur with him in his views, it is altogether likely that this effort on the part of priestcraft to pollute the minds of the rising generation with the superstitions of bygone centuries will be done away with, and the schools of St. John will be run in their legitimate channel, that of propagating a knowledge of the arts and sciences.

A detailed report of all that was said would consume much time and space, and even this would fail to portray the full attractivness of the lecture, for the style, manner, and personnel of the speaker are of a kind which always takes with a promiscuous audience, for after speaking about two hours, and being about to close, there were numerous calls to go on, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour.

In conclusion, be assured, Mr. Editor, that the cause of truth in this section is in good hands, and sooner or later it is bound to prevail.

Fraternally yours, C. D. KELSEY.

CINCINNATI, O., April 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: That theological jumble of mixtures called the Christian religion is still a popular bugbear and a widespread humbug. It is passing strange that any such preposterous nonsense can hold its own after every point and every claim for its respect or faith hath been fully exploded and the whole budget of errors hath been so clearly exposed. The closer this dogmatic religion is examined the more its ugly defects can be clearly seen. Look at it from the standpoint of reason and behold how absurd! Look at it from the standpoint of science, and how full of ignorance! Look at it from the standpoint of truth, and, oh! how full of falsehood! There is nothing in it to be believed unless you bid adieu to a sane condition of mind and become a demented mummy and grope through life an unthinking dupe. The people of this planet are outrageously humbugged by every phase of priesthood. The iron collar of superstition is locked on the necks of millions, and they crawl through life the abject slaves of some religious system which a knave or a council of knaves hath foisted upon the world when the masses of mankind were destitute of any intellectual powers of knowing right from wrong. Ignorance hath ever been the great factor in the birth and development of religious superstitions of all kinds and in all parts of the habitable globe for ages, and every system hath and doth sustain swarms of idle priests. Paganism, in a multitude of forms, hath flourished and brought its modern phase down to the present day with a new name and a change of program; but all the features of the old superstitions are quite visible in the ceremonies and unmeaning mummeries so peculiar to modern religions. But it makes but small difference whether it be a religion of a hundred thousand years standing or the religion of a day, it is paganism still and the climax of humbug. Disprove it if you can. T. WINTER.

RICHFORT, VT., April 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, to pay for your good paper to Jan. 1, 1883. It is very interesting to me. I did not think that Palestine was so poor a place—so much poorer than Ireland. I am sorry that the business of Christianity is clearly to make mankind as damned as human ingenuity is capable.

The description of Smith and Bennett are overwhelming proof that our Bible is a fabrication of priestcraft, and the Jewish God is fate personated. And our Christ Jesus never had any real existence. To suppose our God had a real, personal existence, with such a character, is to me blasphemy against omniscience, omnipotence, and infinit mercy. I wonder how friend Underwood, Abbot, and Bundy can assist superstition, bigotry, and despotism to rule our United States politically. There are but few men who can be big; and we are in imminent danger. Superstition, falsely called religion, has ruined the old world, and is grappling with the new. "Pay us a big salary," say millions of mystagogs, "to tell you what to think and what you shall say, or you will be damned after you are dead. We hav got the keys of heaven and hell; Jesus gave them to us to save your souls and make you build more reverend steeple-houses to preach falsehood, preach what we do not know anything about, only it is in an old fabricated book, written by nobody knows who, when. or where. But mystagogs hav consecrated to fate, falsely called God, who predestined all things, and worketh all things after the counsel of his own will (Eph. i). What a pity that we could not hav been born well the first time, so we could see the kingdom of God without a second birth of wind and water. Logos, the almighty Jesus, must hav been born twice, or John lies (iii, 3, 7). What a pity that we could not be correctly instructed to liv while here, after having been born once.

What a wonderful affair it was that Constantine, a horrid, despotic, tyrannical murderer, in A. D. 325, established the Christian church and our Bible, and murdered and persecuted all opposition fifteen hundred years. Our Bible claims that the foundation of the edifice was a Jewish god-begotten bastard in adultery (Matt. i, 18–20). And the intellects of Christendom hav been chained 1,882 years, so that none but priests hav a right to think and speak their thoughts on penalty of damnation. It is wonderful that millions of men of good sense and billions of fools support that falsehood in 1882 and call it divine. It is wonderful that Mohammed, six hundred years after, did the same thing just as effectually. Mohammedanism and Judaism are equally as sacred, and equally devilish; their morality is equally so, keeping men ignorant of their fate here to prepare them for a crown above the clouds.

I am glad D. M. Bennett has been to to the holy land, Palestine, Italy, Ireland, England, Scotland, and Egypt, that we may read and think what a cursed place our holy religion can make if we practice our hypocrisy and despotism in the United States until our population is 200,000,000. Just think what a democratic government will be here. Our Christianity is a mass of affirmations that we must accept on hearsay without and proof at all. So our Bible, the three first chapters. So the first four articles of Methodist creed. Wo to the poor fellows who cannot believe them! So the Catholics condemn all as heretics who do not accept the infallible pope. "The pope is infallible only in respect to the dogmas of the church," they say. The Protestants are like them; five hundred sects, without any evidence to prove their dogmas. Jesus upbraided his disciples with hardness of heart because they would not believe his resurrection on hearsay. He was there, but did not make them know that he was crucified or resurrected, but commissioned them, with signs following that never did follow, "He that believeth (the dogmas) and is baptized (and pay the priest) shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16). Such is and has been the gospel, these eighteen hundred years, and will be unless truth stops the falsity. Respectfully, JOSEPH NOYES.

MR. EDITOR: If there is any one thing I desire to accomplish more than another this present year it is to make the Watkins Glen Freethinkers' Convention a great success, and to do that we must induce our most popular advocates to be with us. And I know of no four persons who would attract more people than Col. R. G. Ingersoll, Charles Bradlaugh, Prof. Felix Adler, and George C. Miln, of Chicago. And I shall do what I can to procure their attendance, and I hope all who hav influence with either of these distinguished Freethinkers will aid me in that undertaking.

Some time since I wrote to Mr. Bradlaugh, inviting him to attend the Convention, and received the following courteous reply, which, if it does not promis an attendance, is encouraging, and I am inclined to think we shall be able to procure his attendance.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S LETTER.

"LONDON, N. W., Jan. 31, 1882.

"MR. H. L. GREEN: I hav your favor of Jan. 25th, which finds me in the middle of my Parliamentary struggle. If it were possible I should be very glad to be at the convention at Watkins Glen, but it it just now quite impossible for me to say what time the Parliamentary fight will take. I desire to be kindly remembered to all American Freethinkers who care to hear from me. Yours sincerely,

Via Solitaria.

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM. BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Alone I walk the peopled city,
Where each seems happy with his own;
O friends, I ask not for your pity—
I walk alone.

No more for me yon lake rejoices,
Though moved by loving airs of June.
O birds, your sweet and piping voices
Are out of tune.

In vain for me the elm-tree arches
Its plumes in many a feathery spray;
In vain the evening's starry marches
And sunlit day.

In vain your beauty, summer flowers;
Ye cannot greet these cordial eyes;
They gaze on other fields than ours—
On other skies.

The gold is rifled from the coffer,
The blade is stolen from the sheath;
Life has but one more boon to offer,
And that is—Death.

Yet well I know the voice of duty,
And, therefore, life and health must crave,
Though she who gave the world its beauty
Is in her grave.

I live, O lost one! for the living
Who drew their earliest life from thee
And wait, until with glad thanksgiving
I shall be free.

For life to me is as a station
Wherein apart a traveler stands—
One absent long from home and nation,
In other lands;

And I, as he who stands and listens,
Amid the twilight's chill and gloom,
To hear, approaching in the distance,
The train for home.

For death shall bring another mating,
Beyond the shadows of the tomb,
On yonder shore a bride is waiting
Until I come.

In yonder field are children playing,
And there—oh! vision of delight!—
I see the child and mother straying
In robes of white.

Thou, then, the longing heart that breakest,
Stealing the treasures one by one,
I'll call thee blessed when thou makest
The parted—one.

B. F. Underwood's Reply to T. B. Wakeman.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I hav read T. B. Wakeman's "Open Letter" to me in your issue of April 8th. Its distortion of facts, its wilful misrepresentations, and its downright falsehoods are equaled only by its rancorous spirit and insolent tone. It illustrates a remark often made by those acquainted with the writer of the "Open Letter," that "Wakeman is ready to ruin when he can't rule." Mr. Wakeman has not been able to bend me to his purposes, and now he thinks he will overcome me by the tricks of the demagog. I hav seen but one production of late that resembles his assault on me, and that is a similar assault on Col. Ingersoll by a Campbellite preacher. If Wakeman did not take his scurrilous epithets and phrases from Ingersoll's disappointed, envious, and malicious assailant, the mental and moral characteristics of the defender of the Bible and the pseudo-defender of the Constitution are at least wonderfully alike.

Mr. Wakeman's ferocious denunciation of the Index is very natural. He knows he cannot use it, and he has probably heard that it is making large gains in circulation, and that its influence is extending under its present business and editorial management.

. . . . . .

Mr. Wakeman's statement, as reported in THE TRUTH SEEKER, was as follows: "Anybody who said he was in favor of obscenity was a liar, and he was astounded that such a paper as the Boston Index should repeat these slanders and steadfastly refuse to publish the corrections he had repeatedly sent." He is not now willing to stand by that statement, and sends it materially modified to other papers for publication. Yet Eugene Macdonald writes me, "Wakeman said exactly as I reported him." He evidently thought that these remarks would pass unheeded by the editors of the Index; and wishing to give clearness and definiteness to his accusation, to create as much ill feeling as possible against this paper, he did not scruple to state what he knew to be false, and he showed no disposition to correct the report of his speech until he saw his falsehood would be exposed.

No communication has been received at the office of the Index from Mr. Wakeman while I hav been one of the editors of the paper, and but one from the time Mr. Potter succeeded Mr. Abbot, and that one was published.

Confining myself to the period during which The Index has been under its present editorial management (of which I can speak from knowledge) I affirm that no article or paragraph has appeared in the paper charging the National Liberal League with being in favor of obscenity, or T. B. Wakeman of being in favor of obscenity, or reflecting on his character in any way whatever. His quotation from the R-P Journal in no way sustains his accusation. The Index is not responsible for anything that appears in the R.-P. Journal or in any other paper. The Index never commented upon, nor referred to the paragraph in the R.-P. Journal except to inquire why it was said the League was arrayed in defense of "blatant Materialism" "when it is made up in part of Spiritualists, and when among its acknowledged leaders and representativs are men and women like D. M. Bennett, 'Prof.' Toohey, George Lynn, Mrs. Severance, and Mrs. Lake, who are avowed Spiritualists."

The friendly word given the R.-P. Journal, which disturbs Mr. Wakeman, was deserved for its exposure of humbuggery and fraud, but it was written before even the paragraph in the R.-P. J. mentioning Mr. Wakeman. This is stated not because I care to satisfy T. B. Wakeman, but to show your readers the unfounded character of his accusations.

In giving the names of the persons mentioned above, as leaders and representativs of the League, and at the same time as Spiritualists, I was not conscious of doing them or the League any injustice. They certainly are among the representativs and even officers of the League, and they are all Spiritualists. Mr. Bennett has avowed his belief in Spiritualism, both in his paper and in his published pamphlets, as well as in numerous conversations; this implies no reflection, nor was any intended. Mr. Wakeman's attempt to arouse resentment against me and to obtain sympathy and aid, by coming to the defense of the character of persons whom I merely mentioned as Spiritualists and members of the National Land League, in reply to the statement that the League was a body of Materialists, is extremely cowardly. It don't indicate that Mr. Wakeman thinks his position is sustained by the great mass of Liberals. Mr. Wakeman says:

> In the Index of July 14, 1881, editorial, Mr. Underwood quotes Abbot without reproof thus:
> "The vicious and sensual type of Liberalism contrived most absurdly to identify itself in myriad credulous minds with the love of liberty."
> Here I and my co-managers of the League are classed as the "vicious and sensual type of Liberalism!"
> And,
> "The National Liberal League was suffered to fall into the hands of the Freelove ring."
> There never has been any Freelove ring in or about the League in any way whatever.
> The charge of "unscrupulous falsification" is there repeated and charged upon the League by the Index.

Unfairness and unscrupulousness could not go further. The article by me, alluded to above, was a reply to Scribner's Monthly, and from it I giv the following extracts:

> The editor of Scribner's Monthly (July number) in his desire to identify Liberalism "with the love of moral dirt," gives an extract from one of Mr. Abbot's editorials in the Index, and exclaims, "Has anybody more thoroughly identified the majority of Liberals with the love of obscenity than the old president of the Liberals themselvs?"
> Of course, Mr. Abbot has done nothing of the sort, and the extract given utterly fails to sustain this untruthful representation. "Nothing could be more wicked," Mr. Abbot wrote, "than the persistent attempt to represent us as saying that the 'seven y thousand' (?) signers to the Bennett petition are consciously in favor of obscenity. We never said anything of the sort." And, all through the controversy growing out of the action of the National Liberal League at Syracuse, Mr. Abbot, while earnestly advocating reform of the postal laws against obscenity, and opposing and denouncing "the policy of repeal," recognized and admitted the sincerity and worthiness of the great mass of men and women who adhered to that policy, and frequently protested against the unfairness of his opponents in representing that he had declared the repealers were in favor of obscenity.
> But, if all the Liberals of the United States were in favor of the repeal of the so-called Comstock laws, it would be no evidence whatever of "love of obscenity," on their part. These laws are of recent date; and their constitutionality and wisdom are a subject of discussion among intelligent and honest men, irrespectiv of their religious views. Common fairness, therefore, demands the admission that those generally who ask for the repeal of these laws hav no sympathy whatever with obscenity, and rely on other agencies for its suppression.
> In view of these facts, is it not pretty small business for Scribner's Monthly, which circulates largely among the class it insults, to make the action of the Liberal League regarding certain postal laws grounds for charging "the majority of Liberals with the love of obscenity?"
> . . . . . .
> I admit with sadness that I know something of the "unscrupulous falsification" of which Mr. Abbot speaks. I was a victim of it hardly less than himself. The severity of his language when applied to certain individuals is not undeserved. But personal wrongs must not color our judgment nor allow us to misjudge honest men and women because of the acts of unworthy men acting with them. I know that the majority of the people still adhering to the National Liberal League, with their President, Mr. Wright, are worthy people, many of them regretting the action of the Chicago Convention; and if in favor of repeal of the Comstock laws, they are actuated and influenced by love of justice and liberty, and not "love of obscenity." The characters in the Liberal League the most open to criticism, as is not unfrequently the case, are certain persons who hav been the most eager to identify themselvs publicly with the organization; while the mass of members, neither seeking notoriety nor having ulterior purposes in view, are honest, worthy people. I say this in simple justice to the majority of men and women composing the League, with many of whom I am personally acquainted. And the great mass of Liberals, in no way represented by this organization or responsible for its policy or its quarrels, hav as little "love of obscenity" as has the editor of Scribner's Monthly, by whom they are so outrageously misrepresented and slandered.

Again:

> 8 Or this from the Index of August 25, 1881: The call of the League issued by the "venerable President Wright" for its Congress on September 30, 1881, was never printed, but is made the occasion of these words:
> "But it is to be regretted that it adopted resolutions at its convention last year which virtually exclude from participation in its proceedings men who, like Hurlbut, Abbot, Ingersoll, and Julian, believe in the total separation of church and state, but are unconvinced of the wisdom of demanding the repeal of all postal laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails."
> The League has only opposed such Unrepealed states postal laws as created a censorship and espionage over the mails and made them traps for Comstockism.

The above paragraph written by me is strictly correct. Mr. Wakeman and the National Liberal League are opposed to "all postal laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails." That is far from saying they are in favor of obscenity. A man may be opposed to all prohibitory liquor laws designed to prevent drunkenness, but it does not follow he is in favor of drunkenness.

Mr. Wakeman quotes other passages, but not one of them affords the slightest justification of the charge that either I or the Index, under its present editorial management, ever intimated that the League or himself was in favor of obscenity. I have noticed those extracts on which he has relied the most confidently to prove this slanderous statement. Every statement I have ever made in regard to the National Liberal League is true. The reference to the trouble between D. M. Bennett and myself is uncalled for; not only uncalled for, but mean and cowardly. The allusion to D. M. Bennett, in reply to the New York Independent, made by Mr. Potter under his own initials, utterly fails to sustain Wakeman's charge.

I come now to the meanest part of Mr. Wakeman's performance. Referring to persons I had mentioned as Spiritualists, who are members of the League, without the slightest reflection on their character, Mr. Wakeman says:

> As individuals, I hav never heard their characters questioned, as I hav yours. Not one of them has ever been compelled to arbitrate charges of adultery, as you hav done.

Now, what are the facts? Mr. Bennett made charges against me that were false and libelous. I took steps to prosecute him for libel, employing a New York lawyer for that purpose. In THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. Bennett said:

> I am content to leave it with the Liberals of the country . . whether you now hav just grounds upon the plea of injured innocence to set the "hounds of the law" upon me, and deprive me either of my liberty, or the little I have accumulated by the most constant industry and exertion.

I did not wish to get Mr. Bennett's money, or to deprive him of his liberty. He had slandered me, and I desired vindication. Mr. Bennett wrote my attorney:

> I am perfectly willing to leave the matter in dispute to fair-minded men, to settle by arbitration. I will agree to be bound by their decision, and will endeavor to pursue such a course as they shall prescribe.

Thus the proposition for arbitration came from Mr. Bennett. He named T. C. Leland. I named T. B. Wakeman, with full knowledge that he was an intimate friend of D. M. Bennett, but with full knowledge, too, that I had papers that overwhelmingly disproved the charges against me. The investigation was made, with no partiality toward me, as is well known, and here is an extract from the report, signed by T. B. Wakeman and T. C. Leland:

> What, then, is the evidence as to these imputations against Mr. Underwood? To sustain them certain statements are made, and certain letters produced which hav been written to Mr. Bennett by several parties, from one of which letters an extract was printed by him in his paper. . . . .
> Both parties, of course, proceeded to call upon the persons alleged to know the facts to affirm or deny them. It seems that two rumors furnished the only justification for those letters. One of these rumors arose from a fact that has been perfectly explained, and was shown to be entirely innocent. The other rumor we hav traced to a man who had a grievance against Mr. Underwood, and who after repeated requests, has no evidence or authority whatever for the story. In one letter this witness says that he does not believe the story, and in the last he says that he believes Mr. Underwood to be an honorable man, and entirely exculpates him. We find no one back of the letters Mr. Bennett relied upon who knows of any insulted lady or improper acts on the part of Mr. Underwood. Whether Mr. Bennett was justified in trying to carry the war into an Africa or not, it is certain, therefore, that he had and has no ground to stand upon there, and the best proof that he has erred innocently is his prompt retraction of those publications and statements as to Mr. Underwood's private character, which we are authorized by him to make as a part of this report.

I leave the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to judge as to the correctness of my statement that Mr. Wakeman's conduct in this affair has been unspeakably mean, such as no gentleman would ever descend to. The men who originated and communicated to Mr. Bennett the slanders above mentioned were and are enthusiastic supporters of the League. I hav in my possession letters which they wrote, and which it may yet be my duty to giv to the public, letters which reveal a deliberate purpose on the part of the writers and accomplices to strike me down by lying and slander. This Mr. Wakeman knows. His "Open Letter" will enable intelligent and fair-minded Liberals to place him where he belongs, among tricksters and demagogs. His tactics in defense of the League (really in furtherance of his own personal ends) will prove as unsuccessful as they hav generally in his own profession. I am not concerned about anything he has "heard" concerning me, nor will I decend to the disreputable business of repeating the gossip current in New York in regard to his habits and life.

My mistake with regard to him is that, in my unwillingness to heed the words of others who knew him better than I did, I reposed confidence in his honesty and honor, when he he was, as he now is, destitute of both.

Yours truly, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

A Bold Physician.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

The inclosed card came to me because I wrote a postal to B. F. Underwood, entitled "Three Judases," telling him that Bundy, Abbot, and Underwood were Judases, while the name of D. M. Bennett would liv in history as one of the noble men of his time, and to it I signed my full name, underlined. SEWARD MITCHELL.

Newport, Me.

[The card, which Mr. Mitchell incloses, is as follows:

> Your postal indicates that you are feeling bad Call on us some time and we will do you good. B. F. Underwood has medicin for such fellows as you, which he administers gratis. P.

As will be observed, the above card is signed "P," but, judging from the handwriting, either Mr. Underwood himself wrote it, or his chirography and Mr. Potter's are wonderfully alike. But again, the card seems to hav been written in a belligerant spirit. "Medicin for such fellows as you," is obviously intended to express the idea that should Mr. Mitchell call upon Mr. Underwood, the latter gentleman would do him (Mr. Mitchell) bodily harm, personal injury, assault and batter him, etc., which heroic treatment is to be administered gratis. This makes us doubt the possibility of Mr. Underwood's having written it, as he has informed us, in a confidential letter, that he is unfamiliar with the prize-ring; and unless a man has some knowledge of the art of self-defense, it is not considered prudent, in the country we hail from, to knock a chip off the shoulder of a down-easter.—ED. T. S.]

Row at Headquarters.

From the Halifax (Nova Scotia) Mayflower.

Wakeman riddles Underwood with a volley of unanswerable facts. The trouble is that the Boston Index is, and has ever been, a failure. Starting under favorable auspices, with capital and Boston culture at its back, it, under Abbot, became stilted, pedantic, tiresome, and arrogant; and with Potter and Underwood is little better. THE TRUTH SEEKER, without capital, and with only the brain of a self-taught man, is credited in George P. Rowell's "Newspaper Directory" with having nearly treble the circulation of the Index—a mournful commentary, most truly, upon the public taste that prefers the vile TRUTH SEEKER to the immaculate Index.

There is proverbially supposed to be "honor [even] among thieves," but the Index, when Bennett was hounded into jail, jubilant that a formidable Liberal rival was locked up, was foremost in assailing him. Bennett's offense was sending a purely medical work through the mails, in which book there was not one indecent allusion; but Comstock was paid to trap Bennett, and trap him he did, as any man can be trapped however pure his motivs. Bennett came out of jail though, received an ovation, was sent to Europe, and is now on his trip around the world at the expense of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The attention of the Index is now turned to T. B. Wakeman, a New York Liberal of position, wealth, and influence.

The author of "Jesus and the Gospels," published in the Mayflower, a man of great scientific attainments, extended travel and research, a Docteur in the University of France, and member of several learned societies, as well as authority in religious anthropology and biblical archæology, writing me of Mr. Wakeman, states he was highly pleased with his writings, and desired me to secure for him all his lectures and works. Mr. Wakeman must, however, now go down; because, forsooth, the Index has fixed its baleful eye on the man. Judging by Mr. Wakeman's reply in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 8th, he will die hard—probably as hard as Geo. Chainey, who still has crowds to hear him, notwithstanding the Index querulously hopes that Chainey will do something worthy of the Liberal cause besides talk.

"Don't slop over," was the advice of a certain moralist to his son. The Index, not satisfied with attempting to reorganize religion, would reorganize man until he became a model animal, probably similar to the brace of worthies who conduct the Index. Any Freethinker who is guilty of the slightest indiscretion must be "fired out." Now this is all nonsense. It does not follow that a man must become a total abstainer from wine, an immaculate Joseph, or wise as an owl, in order that he may be permitted to laugh at the myths of Greece or the creed of the Christians. Freethought is not a matter of morals, or even of superior intelligence; it is a matter of common sense—reason versus superstition, freedom versus chains; and such is the quality of liberty, that even the fabled wolf preferred freedom and hunger to bondage and surfeit. Messrs. Potter and Underwood desire none but college graduates for Liberal leaders; but the trouble is that leaders in all great reforms are, as a rule, not hatched from colleges. I hav referred to this before, and quoted a host of brilliant names to sustain the position assumed . . . .

Now read the ponderous essays of Bradlaugh and Underwood. What are these men aiming at? Are they striving to be pedants and purists? If so, let them seek different readers. The people do not want talking machines; they want ideas backed with sincerity. A church has ever been the unfailing refuge for a comfortable nap, and how can it be otherwise when most sermons are old as the hills, and prayers printed? Men like Underwood cannot interest readers of Spencer or Mill. Let him tell the people what he knows, and tell them so they can understand it. The first-class periodicals and reviews are doing good work among the cultured; let Underwood and men of his stamp stick to the rank and file, remembering every man has his sphere, and there are round holes for round men and square holes for square, only the trouble is that human nature slips over, and the round men will persist in jumping into the wrong hole. This is a curious phase of human nature. Frederick the Great and Richelieu fancied they were poets, and wrote the most abominable verses, and our local legislature abounds in melancholy examples of country store-keepers and fishing smack skippers, who fancy themselvs statesmen; but at least they hav the excuse that they were voted into their positions; but there are lecturers, preachers, and (heaven save the mark) editors who, self-appointed, conduct cru-ades, compared to which Don Quixote's campaign was not a circumstance.

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian ystem of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. V gell and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogell and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits an defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, cured thoroughly and permanently cured by an which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. And some of these were in a terribly shattered condition—hundreds in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits, others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

Gems of Thought.

ADD to the power of discovering truth the desire of using it for the promotion of human happiness, and you hav the great end and object of our existence. This is the immaculate model of excellence that every human being should fix in the chambers of his heart, which he should place before his mind's eye, from the rising to the setting of the sun—to strengthen his understanding, that he may direct his benevolence, and to exhibit to the world the most beautiful spectacle the world can behold—consummate virtue guided by consummate talents.—Rev. Sydney Smith.

A REALLY reasonable faith need not fear evolution, or, indeed, any truth. But the faith that is unreasoning apprehends much from every new discovery. At first the religious world sneered at evolution, just as it sneered at the idea of the earth going around the sun. It indulged in vituperation of Darwin in the like spirit to that in which it imprisoned Galileo. But evolution has been, from its intrinsic truth, too strong for its religious foes. To-day they are good enough to admit that there is merit in the idea . . . I urge that no man, least of all the religious man, has a right to speak of science yielding only a "dark and dreary view of the future." It has made the past and the present more luminous with a light wholly of the earth. Where religion has failed, science has been man's strength and stay. The ease, comfort, and happiness of our every-day life are due to science and its discoveries alone. And in it is our only hope for the future. As long as men think selfishly of their own individual life and its prolongation, so long the future is dreary. But science, holding out no hope of personal immortality, points to the possibility of the advancement of the race, and reminds us of that nobler immortality in "the minds of those who, coming after us, shall call us blessed." —Dr. E. B. Aveling.

Ut populus, sic sacerdos; as the people, so the priest. Many a man occupies the pulpit who disbelieves what he preaches. He justifies himself by saying that the people are not ready for the truth, which simply means that he is not ready to meet the consequences of uttering it. It is said, by way of excuse, of such a one, "Oh! it is his business." As though it were not the business of the preacher to be sincere.—Felix Adler.

THE first and last thing which is required of genius is the love of truth.—Goethe.

To understand that justice is better than iniquity and love and charity than violence and oppression; doing good to mankind than the conquering of nations; and preserving the world than ravaging and destroying it; to find out that temperance and sobriety is more excellent than debauchery; and wise and reasonable counsels than the sudden impulses of lust and passion—these things require no great depth of knowledge, no nice and tedious disputes, nothing that can perplex or confound the understanding even of the meanest person; they are easy and obvious, plain and self-evident, and visible as the clearest day-light. Yet these are the things of the greatest importance, and which are of the highest concernment for all men to know and understand; these are the things by which the world subsists, and by which alone all order and government is maintained.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

"YOU do not believe," said Coleridge, "you only believe that you believe." It is the final scene of all kinds of worship and symbolism; the sure symptom that death is now nigh. It is equivalent to what we call formulism, and worship of formulas, in these days of ours. No more immoral act can be done by a moral creature; for it is the beginning of all immorality, or rather it is the impossibility henceforth of any morality whatsoever; the innermost moral soul is paralyzed thereby—cast into fatal magnetic sleep! Men are no longer sincere men. Blamable idolatry is cant, and even what one may call sincere cant. Sincere cant; that is worth thinking of! Every sort of worship ends with this phasis.—Carlyle.

WHEN the question is asked whether punishment can control men's beliefs, and not their profession merely, all history answers in the affirmativ, as regards religious and political creeds, on which the majority of mankind, being insufficient judges of themselvs, are led by tradition and by education. But in matters of daily practice, where the simplest can judge as well as the wisest, the case is altered. No severity of threat could bring a man into the state of believing that his night's rest was hurtful to him; he might be cowered into saying that it was so, but he would never act on his forced affirmation, and, therefore, he would show that he did not believe it.—Chambers's Encyclopedia—Article Belief.

RADICAL means root. A radical is one that goes to the root of things, to bottom facts, to bed-rock principles. He is dissatisfied with error, and exposes it; with evils, and works to remove them. But let nobody mistake rant, a violent denunciation, or Utopian theories or Quixotic actions for radicalism.—F. R. Index, of September 1st (under the temporary editorship of Mr. Underwood).

WHEN by night the frogs are croaking, kindle but a torch's fire;
Ha! how soon they all are silent! Thus Truth silences the liar. —Longfellow.

IT is the Bible-Jesus, the God-begotten hybrid, half deity, half man, that I am trying to prove to be weak, erring, and fallible, like other mortals. I wish to prove that he was fanatical, ranting, boasting, tyrannical, and cruel, wherever and whenever any one opposed his claims to divinity, royalty, or leadership of any sort. If he was meek, lowly, and humble, it was always for a purpose. He "stooped to conquer." Uriah Heep-like, he could fawn, cringe, and bend, if he thought by this he could advance his views and projects, and gain his own ends. That there was much that was grand, good, kind, and noble in him I do not deny; but, as I hav always said, it is the duty of Liberals to point out his errors, simply as proof that he could not be a God, and was not a perfect guide.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

THIS story is told at the expense of the cloth. Some years ago there was to be at New Rochelle, N. Y., a ministerial convention composed of delegates from the various denominations of the Christian church. A resident brother, who always entertained the shepherds when they convened in town, having to be absent from home on the week during which they were expected to arrive, left the following prudent directions to his wife: "When the Unitarian minister comes, giv him the run of the house; he's all right. When the Presbyterian arrives, show him to his room, and keep your eye on the servant girl. When the Baptist shows up, lock her in her room, and keep the key; but when the Methodist parson gets here, let the maid sleep at the neighbor's across the way, lock your own door, and send for me."

MR. EVARTS'S REMARKS AS TO SPRING.

Whereas, on sundry boughs and sprays,
Now divers birds are heard to sing;
And sundry flowers their heads upraise—
Hail to the coming on of spring;
The songs of the said birds arouse
The memory of our youthful hours,
As young and green as the said boughs,
As fresh and fair as the said flowers;
The birds aforesaid, happy pairs!
Love midst the aforesaid boughs enshrines
In household nests, themselvs, their heirs.
Administrators and assigns;
Oh, busiest term of Cupid's court!
When tender plaintiffs actions bring;
Season of frolic and of sport,
Hail, as aforesaid, coming spring!

AN INQUIRING INFANT.

One day I sat in a car-seat on the Lake Shore road behind a pale, care-worn lady, who was taking a little boy from Cleveland to Ashtabula. As the little boy was of a very inquiring mind, and as everything seemed to attract his attention, I could not help listening to some of his questions.

As the cars passed a pasture in which were a sheep and a lamb, he asked:

"Where do lambs come from, auntie?"

"Oh! from the old sheep. The old sheep has them."

"Can little boys hav lambs?"

"Certainly. I'll let you hav a lamb, Freddie, when you get home."

"Will it hurt me, auntie?"

"What hurt you—the lamb?"

"No; will it hurt me to hav it?"

"O Freddie, do stop! You ask such foolish questions. I'm all worn out."

"Did you ever hav a lamb, auntie?"

"Freddie, stop! Don't you speak again for half an hour!"

Then the poor, worn-out woman sighed, and leaned her head on the back of the forward seat, while Freddie busied himself placing his mouth against the window, and soliloquized in a singsong tone:

"Mary had a little lamb!
"Sheep had a little lamb!
"Auntie had a little lamb!"

OUR RAILROADS.

He stood in the station; she at his side
(She is a fair, young, blushing bride).
On their honeymoon they're starting now;
It always follows the marriage vow.
He looks at the flaring railroad maps,
At the train of cars and his baggage traps,
And whispers, "Pettie, how shall we go—
By the Kankakee or the Kokomo?

"These railroad maps confuse the eye;
There's the C. B. Q. and the R. N. Y.,
And this one says your life's at stake
On any road but the Sky Blue Lake,
The N. E. R. L. P. Q. J.
Hav sleepers on the entire way;
But I've heard these trains are much more slow
Than the Kankakee or the Kokomo."

She murmured, "Sweetie, I've heard pa say
What a fine old road is the P. G. K.;
But mamma seemed to disagree,
And prefers the X. S. H. O. P.
This chart says, baby, the views are fine
On the Texas-Cowboy-Mustang line;
But still, perhaps, we'd better go
On the Kankakee or the Kokomo."

A conductor chanced to pass them by,
And the bridegroom caught his gentle eye;
He said, "O man, with the cap of blue,
Inform me quick, inform me true,
Which road is best for a blushing, pure,
Young, timid bride on her wedding tour?
And tell us quickly what you know
Of the Kankakee and the Kokomo."

The conductor's eyes gave a savage gleam,
These words rolled out in a limpid stream:

"There's the A. B. J. D. V. R. Z.
Connects with the Flip-Flap-Biff-Bang-B.,
You can change on the Leg-off-Sueville-Grand,
And go through on the Pan-cake-Ace-Full-Hand.
That road you named is blocked by snow
(The Kankakee and the Kokomo).

"The Pennsylvania, Pittsburg Through,
Connects with the Oskosh Kalamazoo,
With a smoking car all the afternoon,
Just the thing for a honeymoon;
And the Central Scalp Tooth-Bungville-switch
Goes through a vine-clad country rich.
Of the road you named I nothing know,
The Kankakee and the Kokomo."

The bride said: "Baby, 'tis best, by far,
Like the dollar, we return to pa.
(That's a pun I heard while on a train
On the U. R. N. G. Jersey main.")
The conductor smiled; his eye-teeth showed;
He had spoiled the trade of another road.
He knew in his heart there was no snow
On the Kankakee or the Kokomo.

And the bride and groom returned to pa,
Who heard it all, and then said, "Pshaw!
If you found you couldn't go that way,
Why didn't you go on the Cross-eyed Bay?"
The bridegroom gave a howl of pain;
The railroad names had turned his brain,
He raves, insane, for ever more;
In a mad-house, chained unto the floor,
He gibbers, "Tootsie, shall we go
By the Kankakee or the Kokomo?"

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

Marriage AND Parentage

AND THE

SANITARY AND PHYSIOLOGICAL LAWS.

FOR THE

Production of Children of Finer Health and Greater Ability.

BY A PHYSICIAN AND SANITARIAN.

"The virtues of men and women as well as their vices may descend to their children."

"There is nothing Utopian in hoping for the time to come when men and women will consult a wise sanitarian before entering into the marriage relation."

The Southern Clinic, a journal of medicin and surgery, says: "We took up this book with prejudice, but soon saw the author was a physcian, and a good one too; a sound physiologist, an instructiv writer, and a man of high moral sense;" and adds, "A race of vigorous, beautiful, sweet-tempered people would be the result of the observance of its principles."

The Home Journal, Boston, says: "We earnestly commend it to all. Its influence can be only beneficial. The author has a thorough mastery of his subject.

Demorest's Family Fashion Magazine says: "It contains enough sensible hints to set up a family."

The Alpha, edited by Dr. Winslow, says: "We like the book thoroughly." And adds: "Send for it, fathers and mothers, for your own good and for the sake of your children, who are to fill your places when you are called up higher."

The Buffalo Express says: "Whoever buys this book will find it a paying investment."

The Scientific American says: "Books on this subject are usually written by 'cranks,' but this is radically different; it is scientific, sober, clean, and worthy of conscientious consideration by every possible parent, and particularly by the young."

Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, writes: "I hav read all of your works, and feel I must study this one. Your contributions to sanitary and social science hav all been imbued with the spirit of sound conservatism and earnest conscientiousness, all too rare among reformers. Whoever gods over this book will find himself on sacred ground. It is the most valuable of your many valuable books."

Prof. N. S. Townsend, of Ohio University, writes: "I am greatly pleased with this work. I hav loaned it to some of my pupils, who express delight with it. I hope every thoughtful young man and woman will read it."

Notes and Clippings.

THE Louisville Court of Appeals has decided that an Atheist cannot be deprived of the right to testify.

ORIGINAL sin, by doom divine,
The original pair infected;
And yet original sin's not mine,
My sins are all—selected!

GIRARD College is to hav a complete machine shop, with a workbench, forge, and gas engin for each of the ninety pupils in practical mechanics.

THE battling brethren of the Sunday School Army of the Eastern District of Brooklyn hav ceased to hold meetings on the vexed question of having the Universalists join in their parade. They are now fighting by means of "communications."

PAGE, of California, wants Bibles to be admitted free of duty. Some years ago nearly every railway car had a free Bible. Nothing of the sort remains, because some honest Christian always stole the books as fast as the railway company supplied them.—Augusta Chronicle.

D. M. BENNETT, the ablest and most aggressiv opponent of Christianity in the United States, is expected to arrive in San Francisco by the China steamer of Sunday next from his tour around the world. The Liberals are preparing to giv him a magnificent reception. Mr. Bennett is the editor and proprietor of the famous TRUTH SEEKER, and the author of a large number of remarkable theological works.—Jewish Times.

A FRIEND inquires whether the famous poet Longfellow was a Liberal? He probably was. We read in the Traveller that he did not attend church, and, as another evidence of his liberality, he signed the recent petition to the legislature in favor of allowing Atheists to testify as witnesses. These facts show that Mr. Longfellow was a Liberal, as all men are who are intalligent, just, and the advocates of equal rights.—Investigator.

THE Connecticut legislature has provided that school boards, on the petition of twelve adult residents, may order instruction in the public schools concerning the effects of intoxicating beverages. The liquor dealers in some of the cities are preparing to oppose the use of text books made for the purpose by total abstinence societies, and to insist on scientifically accurate works. The brewers will take a part in the controversy by demanding that the children be taught that beer in moderation is not hurtful.

ALBERCHT SCHUETTE, of Collinsville, Mo., was 78, and for several years had eagerly awaited death, as constant illness made life burdensome. He told his wife that he could wait no longer and had made up his mind to commit suicide. They were a religious couple, and so she read to him from the Bible various texts to impress him that those who suffered bodily ills with Christian fortitude would be rewarded hereafter. He argued that he had already earned a respit, and then killed himself with a pistol.

COLONEL MCDONALD, late director of public instruction, in Madras, India, stated, in a recent lecture delivered in London, that in many parts of India to know how to read was regarded as destructive of womanly modesty. It was held that only public singing and dancing women were coarse enough to want to read. Men said that reading and writing faciliated intrigue, and was only desired by profligate women. Are American men any less stupid? The average American man believes that those thinking women who desire a part in the government of the country, must necessarily make bad wives and mothers, and are coarse, unwomanly creatures. When the art of printing was in its infancy, Christian bishops and priests preached from the pulpits that if women were taught to read it would unfit them for the duties of wives and mothers.—Exchange.

How to prevent the adulteration of food is engrossing the attention of the Massachussetts legislature. A committee has reported a long bill designed to preserve the purity of both food and drugs, giving a broad definition to the term adulteration, and putting ample powers into the hands of the state board of health. That body is to make all necessary inquiries, fix the limits of "permissible variation" from the standard, and establish regulations for examining articles, in order to determin their quality.

BRO. BARNES was one of the regular and zealous attendants of revival meetings in the colored church of Allegheny, Pa. He made his appearance one evening in a new overcoat, which he took off and laid over the back of his seat, preparatory to kneeling for prayer. Bro. Herbert reached over and seized the coat, declaring that it had been stolen from his room a few days before. A loud dispute arose between the men, and then they had a violent fight for possession of the garment. The meeting was broken up in disorder, the combatants were arrested, and the ownership of the coat remains to be settled.

A GOOD deal has been said about the Russian persecution of the Jews, and it is scarcely fair that their persecution by the German Government should be quite overlooked. Prof. Victor Meyer is a well-known and popular chemist at the University of Zurich, where he is much esteemed and highly popular. Some time ago the philosophical faculty of the University of Halle invited him to accept the professorship of chemistry at their university. The offer was accepted. But now the German Government steps in and declares that Herr Meyer, who is of Jewish descent, must allow himself to be baptized in the Christian faith, or he cannot be admitted a professor.

JOHN MILTON is an exhorter and an orator of considerable force, connected with the Berean Baptist church of Crow Hill, Brooklyn. The Rev. Joshua Lee is pastor of the Free Union Baptist church on Sumpter street, in the same city. Brother Lee has caused the arrest of brother Milton, on the ground of assault with intent to commit personal damage. The brethren had met in the street and engaged in discussion about mission work Loud angry words were spoken, and blows followed them. The colored population of Crow Hill are much mixed as to which of the brethern is the more to blame. The matter is to be adjudicated in court during the present week.

Speaking of our friend and agent, the Vermontville Hawk (Mich.) says: The venerable Dr. C. S. Rowley, of Lansing, author of several beautiful poems, and professor of elocution, made this office a very pleasant call on Monday. For forty years Mr. Rowley has been spiritually and prominently identified with the Liberal and Freethinkers of the United States, and often, when opportunity offers, speaks beautiful allegorical passages, in the ideal of a spiritual conviction, which he has long since ceased to believe; having reached the point where (he says) knowledge has supplemented belief. Mr. R has for some time and is now agent for the New York TRUTH SEEKER, an ably conducted journal in the realm of Freethought and free discussion. While here Mr. Rowley visited our school, where, with the permit of Prof. Brown, he recited several of his choice poems; and the half hour's respit was an interesting and profitable diversion with the scholars.

THE Canadian census shows that in 1881 there were in that country of people of no religion and religion unknown (which is a polite way of informing a man you hav none), 89,403; in 1871, 22,202; loss to religion in ten years in Canada, 67,200. Now, as these 89,403 people represent a respectable number of voters, politicians hereafter will not be quite so rampant in their denunciation of Freethinkers, or in slobbering over rival creeds, and the fuss and frivolity of manipulated superstitions. That nearly ninety thousand Canadians, in spite of bibles, state, and church persecution, social ostracism, and withdrawal of patronage, should hav found the courage to avow themselvs as having no particular religion, speaks well for Canadian manhood, and it is safe to argue that if 89,403 Canadians dare face the music, there are many who sympathize with them, still, from prudential reasons, conceal their views. Let us hope that this noble army of free men will steadily increase until Canada shall be free as its forests, and flourish like its wild flowers, fragrant even when the storm is fiercest.—Mayflower.

IN an article on "The Great Pyramid," in Knowledge, March 24th, Mr. Procter says: "Our very religion has all its times and seasons regulated in ways derived from the astrological system of old Egypt. Our Sunday is the old Chaldean and Egyptian quarter-month rest-day associated with the belief in the malefic influence of the planet (Saturn), which formerly ruled the last day of the week (still called Saturday or Saturn's day). The morning and evening sacrifice of the Jews and their new-moon festivals were evidently astronomical in origin—in other words, astrological (for astronomy was nothing except astrology to the old Chaldeans and Egyptians). The Feast of the Passover, however later associated with other events, was derived from the old astrological observance of the passage of the sun (the passing over of the sun-god) across the equator descendingly. Our calendar rules for Easter and other festivals would never, we may be well assured, hav been made to depend on the moon, but for their original derivation from astronomical (that is astrological) ceremonial."

THE experience of the converted of the Salvation Army, now raiding different parts of England, before conversion are curious. At Middlesbrough a recruit explained how he "used to turn black houses into white ones by the aid of whitewash." At Blackburn "one who used tobacco for twenty-one years, and could not pray without a chew, has, after a hard fight, made a surrender." At Halifax a "brother said that when he told his wife that he had joined the Salvation Army she called him names, and threw his shield through the window. He and his son got on their knees, and prayed that God would hav mercy on her. While doing so, old boots were flying about, but they prayed on, and the next night she came and got herself saved." In Chester-le-street "there was a man so bad that he went by the name of Charlie Peace. He would come home sometimes so drunk that his wife had to hide his razors, but now a wonderful change has been wrought in him." In Winsford a brother says: "I used to go to the public houses and stand on my head on the table, and play my concertina and dance with my feet against the ceiling, but I am saved now."

THE controversy over the election of the Rev. Dr. Smyth as professor of theology at Andover Seminary has at last reached its crisis. The board of visitors has by its vote annulled the action of the faculty and the board of trustees, both of which bodies had voted Dr. Smyth into office. This opens the way for a series of theological and ecclesiastical complications. Dr. Smyth says that if he is heterodox, the gentlemen who compose the faculty and the board of trustees are quite as much so as himself. The old creed of Andover, to which all the professors are obliged to subscribe adherence, is an ironclad Calvinistic one of the most rigid type, declaring the same doctrins as those of the Westminster confession of faith. It is generally agreed that, with the progress of the age, Andover has relaxed considerably from the severity of the teachings of the olden time. A complication arises in regard to Dr. Smyth himself. He is still a Presbyterian. There hav been heresy trials of other men for no greater departures from the old Westminster standards than those which he has preached and written. The Rev. Albert Barnes, whose trial forty years ago had much to do with splitting the Presbyterian church into old and new school, did not express himself quite as much at variance with the "standards" as Dr. Smyth now has. But a heresy trial on such points as those which are in dispute would now be next to impossible.

JOHN CHARLES FREDERICK ZOELLNER, astronomer and natural philosopher, died at Berlin on April 29th. Prof. Zoellner was in his forty-eighth year. He was born in Berlin. He studied in Berlin, and in Basle, Switzerland, and became professor of physical astronomy in the university at Leipsic. One of his principal works is entitled "On the Nature of Comets," in which he argues against the infinity of space. In the course of a visit of Slade, the American Spiritualist, to Leipsic, Zoellner became a believer in Spiritualism, and tried to reconcile his belief with science on the theory of the "fourth dimension of space." The adoption of this belief by Zoellner led to a bitter controversy, and his opponents went so far as to call him insane. Among his writings are "Researches in Photometry," "Principles of the Electro-Dynamic Theory of matter," and "Theory of the Relativ Force of Light in the Phases of the Moon."

A Truth Seeker Around the World

From Suez to Bombay.—Coucluded.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

We have had strong head winds since the first day out. We have been unable to get any sails up, and the white-caps have been very numerous. But the Cathay, though not a large steamer—some 3,700 tons burden—is very steady, and not much given to rocking or pitching. To those of you who in the future have occasion to journey in this part of the world, I can recommend with considerable confidence this good, steady-going Cathay.

As we draw toward the lower part of the Red Sea, we pass several islands. One, standing alone, I am told is called the "Virgin," and two others are called the "Brothers." Then there are several together, termed the "Twelve Apostles." Still later on we left on our right, while some of the apostles were on our left, the Island of Perin, where the English have a fort and a regiment of native soldiers, with two or three European officers to command them. The islands here appear to be of volcanic formation, and are almost entirely devoid of verdure.

The manner in which the British government took possession of Perin Island may be considered somewhat characteristic of the people. Soon after the forepart of the present century the French government sent out an admiral, whose name I do not remember, to take possession of the island; but instead of his doing so at once he made his way to Aden, where he was kindly entertained by British officers. Of course wine was drank freely, and possibly beverages of still greater strength, by which means the tongue of the French admiral became so limbered up that he made known the charge with which he was commissioned from his government. John Bull possibly was comfortably mellow, but he assuredly was not so far gone as to lose a chance to make a good movement for his own government, and at once started a vessel to Perin Island to take it in the name of the British government. So when the communicative Frenchman arrived at the island he found the British flag already waving there, and he only had to make his way back home, having failed to carry out the instructions given him. In this way, and in others equally shrewd, England has taken Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Aden, etc. Wherever any advantage is to be gained in a commercial, military, or naval point of view, then look out to see Johny Bull firmly planted there, with big guns and plenty of ammunition to back the claims.

We reached Aden early in the evening of January 2d, where we stopped several hours to take on coal. Here the Frenchman and the English military schoolmaster went ashore, and a Parsee and two Portuguese Hindoos, employed in the Indian postal department, came on board to attend to assorting the 180 bags of mail.

Aden is built in the crater of an extinct volcano, and is perhaps one of the driest cities of its size in the world. It has no water, and depends largely upon distillation and water brought from a long distance, as I am informed. The place has some 16,000 inhabitants, with a mixed population of Arabs, Greeks, Europeans, Africans, and various other nationalities. It is a place of considerable trade, being the principal seaport of southern Arabia. Ostrich feathers, drugs, dates, and other commodities are brought here from hundreds of miles in the interior. Considerable shipping is also done, and a large quantity of goods sold. Here men take their lives in their hands, and run the risk of cholora and other fatal diseases for the profits of trade. There was considerable cholora here a few months ago, but I cannot learn that it prevails now.

Passing out through the straits of Babel-mandeb—or gate of hell—or the passage of tears—so named from the numerous shipwrecks of sailing vessels which formerly occurred here, we rounded out into the Arabian Sea, where we will meet no other land till the coast of Malabar heaves in sight near Bombay. Here we turn squarely toward the east, bearing a little north, and the wind has been so accommodating as to turn with us, keeping directly ahead of us all the way. But the weather is so warm—the mercury reaching 86 degrees above—that the breeze is very welcome. Some of the time the waves ran rather high, and the motion of the vessel was rather too much to be pleasant.

I have spent a portion of my time in catching up with my writing, and I must mention one incident which was a little out of the ordinary course of things. I was sitting in my state-room at about 11 P. M., writing on my knee. Mr. Bridges had retired and was wrapped in the arms of the drowsy god. The weather being warm, the windows were open, and while I was thus busily engaged in writing, something came in at the window and fell upon the floor. I was startled a little, but not badly frightened, and looked around to see what kind of a visitor had called. I soon discovered it to be a flying-fish, six inches or more in length. Some one asked me if at first I did not think it was the Holy Ghost, but I could not say that I did; it smelled too fishy. I immediately took it by the fins, or wings, while still bouncing, and carried it to the steward, who had not yet retired; he stretched out the fins that serve for wings, that they might dry in an expanded position, and disemboweled it, so I could take it home with me and show my friends in America what kind of a visitor had called upon me away out in the Arabian Sea, late at night; but the fellow smells so strong, and room in my single satchel is so scarce, that I have decided to leave him here in the orient, and let my friends at home take my simple asseveration for the facts in the case. It is not likely that the poor simple fish intended to embark on the Cathay, but in the exuberance of his fishy muscularity and joy, he happened to make his ingress into my window. Probably in less than a minute he wished himself back in his native element.

January 10, 1882.—We arrived at Bombay about 2 o'clock this morning. The changing glimmer of the light-house marked out to the steamer just where we were, and after steaming slowly up the harbor, with the street-lamps on shore in full view, we cast anchor in front of the city, finding ourselves a little too late to go alongside the dock at high tide.

Soon after daylight, while taking a view of this oriental city at a distance, I received a note from Col. H. S. Olcott, which had been sent on board from shore, instructing me to remain on board till he called for me. I had corresponded with him, and had informed him on what steamer I expected so leave Suez for Bombay, he having previously invited me to call upon him and Madam Blavatsky, when I reached Bombay. I knew them somewhat while they were living in New York, and before they came to India three years ago. I, of course was glad to meet them and renew our old acquaintance and to see in India those whom I had known in America.

Between 8 and 9 A. M., the colonel and his assistant, Mr. D K. Maralankar, a Hindoo, and his servants, came to the steamer with a boat, and took us on shore. The harbor presented a very lively appearance, vessels being in from the Zanzibar coast in Africa and many other localities. We saw crews of genuine Africans unloading ships, with no clothing save a small clout, and they seemed as happy as Africans usually are. Between parts of the work, when they could attend to it, they were singing their national ditties, slapping their thighs, and giving a regular plantation "break-down," reminding me of a first-class minstrel performance. I could not doubt, however, that the exhibition before me was the genuine African article. No burnt cork was necessary; everything was eminently natural. The products from the African coast are elephants' tusks, ostrich feathers, ginger, dye stuffs, and other articles of drugs; and in exchange European manufactures and merchandise are taken to the dark continent.

The docks of Bombay present a neat and pleasant appearance, and the town is lively and pleasant. The lower part, or that which fronts on the harbor, called the Fort, is quite European in style, many of the buildings being fine and stately, with beautiful esplanades and wide streets.

The colonel's carriage was in waiting and conveyed us to his residence, some four miles from the landing, after allowing us to get the mail which was awaiting us from America, which of course we were glad to peruse, and to get the news from loved ones at home.

In rolling up the rather pleasant streets we could not help being struck with the novel appearances in oriental life. One feature is particularly noticeable, and that is the nearly naked condition of a portion of the native inhabitants. The lower castes are not dressed at all, save a very small rag or cloth about the middle. I must, however, make a slight reservation for the women; for they have a little more on than the men; but they are content and happy with far less than is required by American ladies, even in the warmest part of the year. I notice that one soon becomes accustomed to this difference of costume, and in a little while it seems to make little difference with us whether people wear any clothing or not. None of the natives, or scarcely any, wear the European styles of clothing, but those most fully dressed have simply a white muslin loose, short robe or long shirt, with usually no pants, and a turban on the head.

This truly seems a tropical country. The weather is very warm; thousands of flowers are blooming, thousands of palm-trees of different kinds are rearing their tall trunks toward the skies. Private residences and private and public grounds are profusely supplied with the gayest of flowers and choice shrubbery, many of which are new to me.

Madam Blavatsky and Col. Olcott occupy very commodious premises in the western or northwestern portion of the town, on elevated ground, commanding a beautiful view of the bay and ocean that is not often excelled. I met a cordial welcome here, and I could not see why I should not have a few days of rest.

Bombay is a city of nearly 800,000 inhabitants, and is built upon an island, which has, however, been joined to the mainland by artificial means. There seems to be a great deal of thrift and enterprise here.

But I am settled here for a while at least, and I will not prolong this letter, but tell you more of my experience in India in my next. Adieu for the present.

Experiences in Bombay.

BOMBAY, Jan. 13, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS IN AMERICA: I never was so far away from you before, and I am well aware that it takes letters longer to reach you from this place than any I have previously written you. But if I keep on traveling eastward I will reach America again after awhile, when I trust "we shall meet to part no more."

I shall of course have much to say to you of what I see in this far-off part of the world; but first of all I must tell you something of our whilom friends, Madam H. P. Blavatsky and Colonel H. S. Olcott, who came here from New York some three years ago. They jointly established in New York in 1875 a theosophical society, partly of a scientific, partly of a religious, and partly of an investigating character into what is called the occult domain of nature, and which I will endeavor to explain to your comprehension further along.

It was thought strange by many that they should leave America to remove to this oriental world, but their object seems to have been to place themselves in a situation where they could do the most good to their fellow-creatures, and particular to be nearer the bands of "Brothers" up among the Hamalaya Mountains, where they live wholly secluded from the world, and devote their lives to doing good in their peculiar way and in studying the subtle and mystical powers or forces of nature, which they claim to be able to control in a manner wholly unknown to people in the occidental world.

I must acknowledge myself agreeably surprised to find in what a healthy condition the Theosophical Society is out here, and the amount of good it is effecting in bringing together the different schools of native thought, in helping them act in concert in the studying of nature in all her domains, and in combating the teaching of false and superstitious systems of religion. I have already had conversation with many intelligent natives, Hindoos, Brahmans and Parsees, and they bear uniform testimony of the good which Madam Blavatsky and Col. Olcott have effected here, in harmonizing the native element and in fostering a fraternal spirit among those of different creeds, and especially in opposing the work of Christian missionaries here in India and in the Island of Ceylon.

Col. Olcott has spent fully six months in Ceylon, and has succeeded in organizing several healthy and vigorous societies of native Buddhists, establishing schools, etc. Some "Truth Seeker Tracts," and some also of Mr. Bradlaugh's publications, have been translated there into Singalese, and published and circulated among the truth-seeking people. Of course this kind of work interferes very much with the operations of the Christian missionaries, who are doing their utmost to add this portion of the world to Christendom. As a sample of what Col. Olcott and his co-laborers are doing in this moral vineyard, allow me to give you a letter which one of these Ceylon missionaries wrote to the missionary organ in London. A wail of this kind is as well calculated to convey an idea of existing truth as anything that can be read:

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER FROM THE REV. J. SPARR, MISSIONARY OF CEYLON, TO "THE SHIELD OF FAITH," LONDON.

Never was there such a revival of unbelief as there is at present in Ceylon. All this, while we hav had to deal with difficulties arising from the purely heathen Buddhist, but now there has sprung up in our midst a theosophical society, whose president and founder in Ceylon is a professed American, Col. H. S. Olcott. He is engaged in publishing pamphlets, catechisms, etc., and opening schools with the avowed obj ct of stopping heathen children from attending Christian schools. If ever "the heathen sage and the people imagine a vain thing," it is now. They construe the missionary's silence into want of ability to meet their Goliath. I am sure there is more than one quite competent in the name of the Lord of hosts to go out to battle; but as I said before, the convenient method of getting over it is by saying, "Don't be afraid; Col. Olcott won't do much harm; it will be sure to come to an end." God only knows, however, the incalculable mischief that is done. I have just read that the Rev. Joseph Cook purposes to visit India shortly. Oh! if it would please the Lord to send him or you among us for a season. . . . J. SPARR.

Perhaps we are left to infer that the Lord has already answered this unhappy missionary's prayer; for, lo and behold! my old enemy, Joe Cook, is even now in India, and absolutely in this city, probably on a tour of India and Ceylon to demolish the work of Col. Olcott and his earnest co-laborers, and to help the Lord in setting the missionary cause all right again in this heathen land.

Cook had delivered one lecture here before I arrived, and was to give another speech on the night of the 10th, the day of my arrival in India. Of course Col. Olcott and myself attended. We found about twenty-five per cent of his large audience composed of European missionaries and their sympathizers; the balance were the intelligent native element, who take but little stock in Christian dogmas. Lectures here begin at 5.30 P. M., instead of 8 o'clock as with us, and dinner is eaten after the lecture is over.

Cook's arguments did not strike me as being strong, but with his usual assumption and assurance he endeavored to induce the natives of India to take his noisy mouthings for the truth.

In Mr. Cook's previous lecture I learn that he made some attack upon the Theosophical Society, making, in his characteristic way, aspersions calculated to damage it in the opinion of those who heard him.

Now, it so happened that an anniversary meeting of the Theosophical Society was appointed to be held last night, the 12th inst. Col. Olcott was to make the leading speech, of about an hour's length, to be assisted by some two or three others. He invited me to say a few words. I assured him that my speaking abilities were very limited, but as he continued to request that I talk a little, I consented.

Thinking a report of the crowded meeting in the Framji Cowasji Institute may interest you, I will give you the principal portion of the addresses, with subsequent proceedings which occurred. You will see that my enemy, the arch-slanderer of America, is trying to injure me here in India, and that I found it necessary to reply to his falsehoods. Please excuse what repetitions you may notice, and remember the speeches were made on different occasions.

The following is a report of the first meeting:

The chair being, upon motion, taken by Dr. Pandurang Gopal, F. T. S., the well-known surgeon-oculist, that gentleman made a few preliminary remarks expressive of his interest in tbe society, of which he has long been a member, and his belief that it has been an agency for doing great good to the moral and spiritual interests of the Indian people of all castes. He then called upon Mr. Damodar K. Mavalankar, joint recording secretary of the society, to read the treasurer's report to 31st December, 1881, which he did.

Mr. Damodar then read the following letter from Judge Scott, the secretary of the Simla Eclectic Theosophical Society:

My Dear Col. Olcott: I regret that my official duties prevent my accepting your kind invitation to attend the anniversary meeting on the 12th instant and take the chair. But, that you and your colleague may know that my absence indicates no lack of real interest in the work of the society, I send you the assurance of my sincere devotion to the noble objects you are striving to realize. After three years of intimacy with Madam Blavatsky and yourself, and a constant watch over the development of your plans, I need only say that my regard for you and appreciation of your aims are stronger to-day than ever, and my sympathy with you in the great work you have undertaken continues unabated. It was, of course, inevitable that the public should have misunderstood your motives, for it has seldom seen a movement of a purely philanthropic character organized on such a scale as that of the Theosophical Society. Nor should we be surprised that the enemies of truth have eagerly caught hold of every pretext to abuse its exponents, who are conducting a searching inquiry into the origins of popular religions, independently of all prejudices. You, founders of our society, have repeatedly been slandered and your sensibilities been wounded from sheer malice and dislike to the task you have set yourselves of exposing the fallacies and weaknesses of the various religious systems. The recent lecture of Archdeacon Baly on the religions in India, in which that gentleman expressed the opinion that Theosophy was a sort of school for clever conjuring, fairly represents the popular ignorance of the nature of the movement you direct, its aims and accomplished results. He seems unaware of the powerful effect you have already had on the minds of educated Hindoos, in awakening their interest in the ancient Aryan religions, and promoting a higher moral tone amongst them, nor does he appear to realize the enormous results you have achieved among the Buddhists of Ceylon, where you have formed the priests and laity alike into one organization for the purification and rehabilitation of their national religion. It is not too much for you to ask that at least those who undertake the duty of criticizing the society and its work, should first try to find out the principles on which it is based, and the objects which it has in view. The attitude of Europeans and natives alike is not complimentary to either the fairness or intelligence of the mass of the people outside our ranks. But to courageous souls, who have strong convictions to guide them, and the consciousness of pure motives as their support, such obstacles are never insurmountable. Even now we see the opinions of Anglo-Indians showing signs of a change. Take heart, then, and keep on without faltering. The right will surely prevail, if you only keep in mind the good old English advice, "Never say die."

Wishing the society every success, I am, my dear Olcott, always yours, sincerely and devotedly, Ross Scott.

The reading was frequently interrupted by the applause of the large audience.

Telegrams of congratulation were then read from several of the society's branches in India, and individual members.

The chair then introduced Col. Olcott, the president-founder, who, on coming forward, was received with a storm of hand-clappings. When silence could be restored, he proceeded to make the following address:

Mr. Chairman, Fellows of the Society, Ladies and Gentlemen: We meet to-day to publicly celebrate the Sixth Anniversary of the Theosophical Society. On its behalf I bid you welcome. I have here brought with me the original postal-card circular notice which convened the founders, in the city of New York, on the 16th of October, 1875, to vote upon the by-laws that had been drafted by the committee appointed at the preliminary meeting, on the 17th of September ante. Already our society has reached a development which gives historic value to this modest document. As the seed contains the germ of the full-grown tree, so that little card had in it the potentiality of the great movement that Theosophy has become

This is the third time we have addressed the Bombay public in this hall on our anniversaries. You now know us, and have had time to watch our movements and gauge our sincerity. We do not address you as strangers, therefore. We have got beyond the preliminary stage of polite phrases on both sides. You know just how we keep our promises, and we know what yours are worth. The scented garlands Bombay brought us in February, 1879, withered long ago, its complimentary speeches of welcome long since died away on the air. It seems far away —our first meeting. The three years that have slipped by have been, for us, so crowded with incidents that, though my feet stand on the same spot upon which I then stood, my memory hardly can realize that it is only three years. Such changes, too, as have befallen us! Dreams of hope blasted, what other dreams fulfilled; some who then pretended friendship turned into foes, and hundreds more, whose existence then we did not suspect, became our stanchest, most unselfish, and self-sacrificing friends. Some who stood beside me then have gone into the dark valley of death, and some—thanks to the innate nobleness of human nature—have been true as steel to our cause from first to last. But amid all these vicissitudes, what has been the net outcome as regards our society? Has it expanded or contracted? Is it stronger or weaker? Will it live and still grow, or die out, as visions fade?

I come, obedient to the public voice, to answer these questions. I am here to give an account of my stewardship. To meet you I left my work in the heart of Ceylon, whither I shall shortly return, after a round journey of three thousand miles. I shall tell you honestly what the Theosophical Society has accomplished within these years, withholding nothing that is not of a confidential nature. And then I shall ask you some questions in return. I want you to tell me how you hav done your duty—not to us, but to your conscience, your race, and your religion. For, understand, I hav made my last appearance to you as a suppliant for your kind alliance. The time for me to apologize for candor is past. I come to force the question home upon you whether you have as much right to your own self-respect as you had at the beginning of 1879, when first I appealed to you to recollect the glories of your forefathers and be worthy of the name of Aryan or Persian. The promises I made in my first address from this place have been, or are being, fulfilled. We can now point you to work done, schemes carried out, plans realized. Theosophy was then a new question, scarcely any one in India had heard of us; but now you may go where you like throughout India, and you will find that we are known, have friends and champions, and are exercising a positive and appreciable influence upon the thought of the educated classes. I do not ask you to believe this upon my simple statement, but upon the joint testimony of the public press and our enemies of all shades and degrees. The very abuse that has been showered upon us, when we take note of its authors, is a certificate of our usefulness. Bishops and archdeacons, sectarian or venal writers, bigots and pretended saints or reformers, do not waste their strength in attacking the insignificant. And where will you find a society that has been better abused than ours? No; our credentials are the work we have done, and the attacks upon us by the enemies of Hindoo, Buddhist, and Zoroastrian philosophies and sciences, for doing it. Because they hate your religion and would have you despise your ancestors, they have tried to put us down and stop our mouths. But they have failed. If we could survive your neglect, whose loyal help we had the clear right to count upon, we were not to be put down by their violence. We have preached nothing but truth, and it is against that eternal rock that these slanderers have been dashing their fists. Let them go on, and stand you by idle, as most of you have done hitherto, if you will; the Theosophical Society is a living fact, and it is fast becoming a power. I read you last May an extract from the letter of a well-known Bengali patriot, in which he says that we are now universally known and respected, and have also performed a miracle. "Only the other day," he wrote, "in a company of friends the question was raised how it was that the educated Babus in general now showed an inclination toward Hindooism. I said it was owing to the Theosophists, and it was admitted by all to be so."

So much for Bengal; now for North India. Says the London organ of the Church Missionary Society (the Church Missionary Intelligencer and Record), in its issue of last July: "In a recently-published article we gave some hint of the mischief which is being caused in North India by what is termed Theosophism. If we did not believe that this mischief was real, and a fresh hindrance to the progress of Christianity, it would not be worth while reverting to it. . . . From what we learn it is spreading, and if it extends much further it is likely to be quite as noxious as the Brahmo Samaj, about which so much learned nonsense is talked." Well, it is something at least to be abused in good company; but it seems a little queer to yoke the founders of the Theosophical Society, who do not pray with the Brahmo Samajists, who do—very much. Now the church missionaries ought to know whether we are doing anything in North India to strengthen the love of the natives for their own religion; and for my part I think their London organ has told the truth about it. But here comes the very Rev. Archdeacon Baly, and says at the recent Church of England missionary meeting that Theosophy is only a sort of new religion based on juggling tricks. "We have two religions growing up among us," he gravely remarks. "The first is Theosophy, of which you must have heard something. At present its principal developments seem to me to savor of a conjuring cleverness on one side, and an easy credulity on the other. . . . I fear it will never be able to convey any spiritual power to man, or endow him with any spiritual good, until it borrows and adopts, directly or indirectly, some of the beneficent principles of Christianity." For a layman this would be stupid, and show pretty clearly that he did not read the papers, at least not the Theosophist and the native papers; we might almost suspect him of being a subscriber to the Civil and Military Gazette, or the Lucknow Witness, or the Calcutta Statesman, or some other journalistic jewel-box of the sort. But for a learned and esteemed archdeacon, and a very very reverend to boot, to utter such nonsense is really lamentable. Imprimis, we preach no new religion, never did; always vehemently protested against being thought to do so. In fact, as I have reiterated in every speech I ever made in India, our society as a body has no religion. What we do is to preach the majesty and glory of all the ancient religions, and to warn the Hindoo, the Singalese, and the Parsee to beware how they depart from the teachings of the Veda, the Tripitikas, and the Avesta for any newer faith, before learning well what the older religions contain, and what the newer ones do not contain. Theosophy has grown to what it is, just because it teaches that this "spiritual power" and "spiritual good" can be obtained in only one way, and that the religious ascetics of the schools of Sakya Muni, of Zoroaster, of Patanjali, of Mohammed, as well as the mystics of Egypt, Greece, and Rome; of China, Thibet, and Japan; of the Aztecs and Toltecs, of Siam and Cambodia; all, all I say, had the key to the mysteries of nature and access to the only source of "spiritual power"—the boundless, eternal cosmic ocean of the Akas. There, in that infinitude of space, that cradle from which new-born worlds and new-born men equally come, that final cemetery of planets and their inhabitants—is the eternal Light. And he who would derive power or good must raise himself far up to the psychological state of the "divine" ectasy, in which the gods and narrow creeds and bibles of blind men are looked down upon, as the soaring eagle looks down upon the tiny speck of something black in the plain below, that calls itself a man, and may even be an archdeacon out for a walk. The strength of our movement is that it is built upon the strong foundation of universal brotherhood. This is no empty rhetorical phrase with us, but an accomplished fact. The missionaries, after a century of labor in India, and the expenditure of millions of money, have converted so few high-caste Brahmans that they can almost count them upon their fingers. But in three short years the Theosophical Society has taken into its brotherhood not only lay Brahmans of the very highest caste, and the most renowned among the Pandits, but it has taught them to work in fraternal unity with Hindoos of the lower castes, and even with Parsees, Buddhists, and Mussulmans for the spreading throughout the world of the ancient philosophies, for the world's spiritual good. Let Archdeacon Baly be more sure of his facts before he lectures again upon Theosophy.

But we have other and even better credentials to show of our success in North India. Mr. Baly spends his hot weather at Simla; what does he say to our new Anglo-Indian branch, the Simla Electric Theosophical Society? Are such noted men as compose it noted for their "easy credulity?" If so, no one ever discovered it before; and if men of that caliber among the Anglo-Indian community have joined us, and publicly announced the fact, you may be sure of two things, (a) that the original theory of the government of India that we were Russian spies, and the later one of the Saturday Review and the Palamcottah Missions, that we are "unprincipled adventurers," are equally stupid and malicious fabrications. Our good private characters have now been effectually vindicated, and whether they will or not, the missionaries, who are driven to their last ditch, must seriously go to work and prove that their religion is divine, and every other one diabolical.

In India we have, since I last addressed you—in the month of May, 1881—organized no less than ten branches of our society, viz., at Simla, Lahore, Rawalpindi, Bareilly (Rohilkund), Lucknow, Muddehpoorah (Bengal), Berhampore (Bengal), Allahabad, Bhaunagar, Tinnevelly. Other branches have been formed at Paris, the Hague, Jamaica (Danish W. I.), in Java, and Australia; and the Hindoo Sabha of Southern India, of which M. R. Ry. A. Sankariah, B. A., is president, is officially allied with us. Does this not look as though Theosophy had something more and better than "conjuring cleverness" to rest upon? I ask all fair men among the Christians if they do not think they have, perhaps, been a little mistaken about us, our motives and plans.

And now, have any of you read or heard about the circumstances attending upon the formal organization of our branch at Tinnevelly, Madras Presidency, on the 25th of October last? Do you know that it was marked by one feature of which the like has not been seen in India for two thousand years, an incident which proves more clearly and eloquently than words that our society is, in fact, as in name, a universal brotherhood? I allude to the planting of a king-cocoanut in the inner compound of the ancient temple of the Hindoo gods by a committee of our Buddhist members of our Buddhist branch at Colombo, Ceylon, amid the deafening plaudits of five thousand high-caste Hindoo idolaters. Let the Christians match that if they can. Our Hindoo Tinnevelly brothers received their Buddhist brothers with a procession and music, the temple elephant, gaily caparisoned, led the van, every native official came to pay his respects, and, as I said before, we planted the cocoanut—ancient emblem of peace and respect—within the temple inclosure where no profane foot had trod before.

I will say a few words about our work in Ceylon, and then give place to the other speakers who will address you. During our visit of 1880, the Singalese people en masse gave us a princely reception. We moved through the Island, from Galle to Kandy and back again, in almost a "royal progress." They exhausted their ingenuity to do us honor, as in the ancient days they had done to their kings. Triumphal arches; flags flying in every town, village, and hamlet; roads lined with olla fringes for miles together; monster audiences gathered together to hear and see us—these evidences of exuberant joy and warm affection astounded us. In India we had been so reviled by Christians, so frowned upon by the authorities with chilling disdain, and so given the cold shoulder by the natives, to stay with whom and work for whose welfare we had come so far, that this greeting of the Singalese profoundly moved us to gratitude. We felt a sincere desire to do something, even if only a little, to show them that we were not insensible to such kindness. During our short stay of two months eight branches —seven Buddhistic and one scientific—were organized by us. But when the popular enthusiasm had had time to cool, and our members forced the practical difficulties of carrying on so tremendous a reform as the one we had in view in Ceylon, they found they had not the needed experience, and begged me to return and help them. So I went there in April last, and stopped until mid-December. During those 212 days I gave sixty public addresses at temples, schoolhouses, colleges, and in the open air; held two conventions, or councils, of Buddhist priests; traveled hundreds of miles within the Western province; largely increased the membership of our society; wrote, published, and distributed twelve thousand copies of a Buddhist catechism; had translated into the Singalese language several Freethought tracts; and raised by national subscription the sum of about Rs. 17,000, as the nucleus of a national Buddhistic fund for the promotion of the Buddhist religion and the establishment of schools. Here is the photograph of one of the schools we opened last year by private subscription, before there was any such thing as a national fund thought of. You see here in this group about two hundred and fifty boys, every one of whom was being educated under Christian influence before we took them in charge. The missionaries have, as appears from the latest government report, about twenty-seven thousand children of Buddhists in their schools. As a general rule, they do not convert them to Christianity, but make them lose all faith in, and respect for, their forefathers' religion. Of these we have already recovered back about one thousand, and I can assure you that it is simply a question of time and money as to our getting the whole twenty-seven thousand children. Just here I wish to say one word in anticipation of the possible objection that it is a gross inconsistency that a society based upon the theory of absolute reciprocity in religious matters, should be thus helping to baffle missionary work in Asia. At a superficial glance this is a valid point, but that is all. Look twice at it, and you will see that we are working strictly within our stated boundaries. We demand reciprocity from the Christians for the Hindoos, Parsees, and Buddhists; it is refused; hence we take the side of the Asiatics, and treat the foes of their religions as our foes. Do they give reciprocity? Will they allow their children to be taught by heathen masters, out of heathen school-books, to despise the creeds and philosophies of their forefathers? Will they let Asiatic missionaries invade their homes, coax away their wives and daughters, make them outcasts by breaking the long-established social order of European and American communities? You know, and they best of all know, they would not do one of these things. Then why, I ask in the name of justice and fair play, should they expect the Indian, the Persian, the Singalese, or the Chinaman, to stand idly by while they are doing all they can to undermine the bulwarks of Asiatic social life? The cry of reciprocity is a very sweet sound to hear, when both parties utter it in unison. That is the attitude of the Theosophical Society; and from the day when the Christians will act up to their so-called golden rule—which they borrowed from India and China, where sages taught it before there was any Palestine, or any Jew in existence—you will never hear a word spoken or see a line written by us against the missionaries or their religion. For, if Christianity is no better, it is certainly no worse than some other popular faiths, and its morality is as sublime as that of other faiths, though not more sublime. We should and do respect the feelings of all who sincerely believe it, and practice its precepts. And this, by the way, reminds me of a proposal that appeared in the Bombay Gazette of the 10th inst., that my countryman, the Rev. Joseph Cook, now in this city, and I should get up a religious controversy. I disapprove of controversies as a rule; they are not apt to be convincing, and often excite angry feelings. It is the better way for each side to expound their views, supported by authorities, and leave an impartial public to decide. As regards Christianity, it, like all other religions, is now being melted in the crucibles of science and logic to separate its gold from its dross. That it is in mighty throes of pain; that skepticism is flowing across Christendom with the rush of the swollen Ganges; that Freethought books and newspapers are multiplying every day; that the church has had to revise the Bible to suit a more enlightened and critical public; that the late census returns and special canvasses of the sects of Protestantism show a marked falling-off in the ratio of conversions and attendance at churches—these all are so true that not even my gifted countryman, Mr. Cook, can deny it. That is the naked fact, and it cannot be covered up by all the flowers of rhetoric he can shower upon it. You have heard him discourse upon the support that science gives to Christianity, but if I may judge from what natives have told me, their acute logical intellects—and nowhere will he find minds more acute than here—reject his inferences while admitting his scientific facts. He is new to Bombay, and does not even seem to suspect that if he should succeed in uprooting those germs of Infidelity Western culture has planted in the Asiatic mind, the young men will not run out into Christianity, but run back into the religions of their fathers; becoming orthodox and continuing so. For Christianity is totally repugnant to the Hindoo mind. I heard his lecture in this hall on Tuesday evening, and enjoyed it as an oratorical treat. But I could see—as I thought, though I speak under correction—that whatever fruit he might shake from the tree of Materialism would drop into the basket of the Parsee Mobeds and the Hindoo Shastris. I shall not even touch upon his arguments, for I have not time; but perhaps your friend—also a countryman of Mr. Cook and myself—Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor and proprietor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, one of the greatest organs of the Western Freethought movement, who fortunately is here present, and, like Mr. Cook, is on a voyage around the world, may have a few words to say upon the subject.

But, to return from our digression: It was not enough to raise a fund in Ceylon; I had also to provide every possible guarantee that it would not be dishonestly appropriated, either while I myself was alive, or after my death. Taking advice, therefore, from counsel learned in the law, and the specially devoted and energetic members of our Colombo branch. I drafted memoranda for two separate deeds, of which one created a board of five trustees, to receive, invest, and keep invested the proceeds of subscriptions, donations, legacies, and profits on sales of publications; and the other a board of managers to select the objects upon which money should be expended, and draw the cash as required, by drafts upon the trustees to the order of the payee. As principal creator of the fund I was given a general supervisory power over the whole business, but without salary or remuneration of any kind. A commission was offered me, but at once declined; for until now neither Madam Blavatsky nor I have been paid one penny for our services to the society, nor do I expect that we ever will. If any friend of this our movement should henceforth hear us called unscrupulous adventurers, who are using theosophy as a means to make money by, I ask you only to repeat what the treasurer's report, just read, shows, viz., that theosophy has cost us thousands instead of paying us a farthing. And you may add, if you choose, that to us two it is "a pearl without price," for which we would give not money alone, but even life.

Now why may we not do something for India of similar character to that which we are doing for Ceylon. I could not undertake to give my whole time to the raising of an Indian National Fund just at present; but still I could do something, and after all the first step is the hardest of all to take in every serious business. After short visits to Poonah, Calcutta, and Madras, I will return to Ceylon, where I am under engagement with our Galle branch to deliver more than seventy lectures within the Southern Province on behalf of the fund. This will occupy a few months, after which I hope I may be free to work in India. My only difficulty is to know for what the Indian fund should be raised. I am most anxious to have sound advice upon the subject from our best natives throughout the country. I should stipulate that whatever the fund might be called, a portion of its annual income must be spent in promoting Sanskrit literature and the study of Aryan philosophy, arts, and sciences. I mean to help to strengthen the Indian national aspirations for a revival of Aryan glories, not to stifle or weaken them. I would make any sacrifice to cause the Hindoos to have a proper respect for the old Rishis, or for the Parsees to understand and imitate the learning and virtue of the ancient Magusthi; but I would not sacrifice the value of a chopatty or a hoppa to see created a whole generation of such intellectual and moral hybrids as are many of those who have been baked dry in the scholastic ovens of Elphinstone College, and turned adrift, with the imprint "B. A.," that was stamped into them when they were but on soft dough in the hands of a Materialistic or Christian professor. My dream for India is of a day when the pandit will come up to the old standard of moral, intellectual, and spiritual excellence as described in the Bharat; when he will be the true guide and exemplar of the people, and not a mere walking dictionary of Sanskrit Slokas, whose private character is oftentimes no better than that of the unlearned masses. Of a day when furnished with all the helps that Western scholarship can give him to compare his ancestral ideas with the progress of science, he will, as in the olden time, be revered as a philosopher and a guru; and when the students of Europe will gather about his feet, as once gathered the students of Greece and Egypt about the feet of the Yogis and Shastris of North India. Of a day when it will not be thought clever for beardless lads from college to smirk and sneer at those who affirm that Patanjali taught nothing but exact truth about Yoga Vidya.

Some wonder that I can so warmly and impartially labor with Hindoo and Parsee, with esoteric Christian and esoteric Mussulman, to promote the best interests of their so contradictory faiths, when I am with all my heart and strength working with the Buddhists for the restoration and reform of their religion. That I, in short, though a philosophical Buddhist, am yet endeavoring to equal the votaries of all these other creeds in zeal for their welfare. But man never yet made a creed that could bind me, as with an iron chain, when my brother man needed my help. My religion is the welfare of humanity, my help is pledged to every one who, like myself, is trying to discover religious truth. I would spurn and stamp upon any creed or bible that bade me love only my fellow-religionists, and hate all others; or that would forbid my allowing to my fellow-truth-seeker of any race, or color, or creed, the same right of private judgment that I claim for myself. I recognize the Vedas as the earliest of extant religious writings, the repository of the highest thought of archaic man, the spring-source of all subsequent philosophies; and I believe that if modern India could be brought to study and understand the true meaning of the Vedas, they would find in them so much that is noble, so much to satisfy the strongest spiritual yearnings of the national Indian heart, that not one young man, whether college bred or not, would be tempted either to lapse into Infidelity or fly off at a tangent into Christianity. Esoteric Buddhism satisfies my ideal of a philosophy, but though it is almost identical with esoteric Hindooism and esoteric Zoroastrinism, I no more expect my Hindoo and Parsee brothers to agree with my views upon that subject than with my likings or dislikes for certain foods and dresses. The world is wide enough for us all, if we will only bear with each other's prejudices; but, without charity, even the universe is too little for two litigious pandits or padris.

I should also stipulate, before attempting to raise our Indian National Fund, that it should be made clear to everybody, rich and poor, that neither I, nor my society, nor any one connected with it, should receive any profit or commission for raising the money. I must be able to face India as I am facing Ceylon, without a blush of shame for unworthiness of motive. Then I should require that in each presidency a board of trustees, comprising the most honored patriot names among natives, should be formed, and that their agent should go about with me to take account of the subscriptions and receive all the money on their behalf. I should, as in Ceylon, require that there should be a deed of trust under which the money should be invested on specified security, and the annual interest only be used on given objects, in definite proportions. All this is secured already in the Ceylon deeds. When these points are covered, then I will be ready to begin. I will go from town to town, and village to village, and, telling the people what Aryavarta once was, and what it may be made again by united effort, will ask them to give whatever they can spare, whether a rupee or a lakh. In Ceylon we made one rupee the theoretical unit of subscription. Those who are too poor to give a rupee at a lump give it by instalments of four annas, and we issue to such tickets representing values of four annas, eight annas, and one rupee. The names of subscribers of two rupees and over are printed in the weekly vernacular, owned and conducted by members of our Ceylon branch. Practically, we find that the wish to see their names in print induces many to giv at least two rupees who, otherwise, would have pleaded poverty. There is human nature as well as pearls in Ceylon.

The Ceylon fund is to be invested at the uniform rate of ten per cent on primary mortgages, in sums of Rs. 3,000 or less; no more than three thousand to be loaned on any one piece of property. Of the net income one-half is to be expended on education, one-fourth on publications of sundry kinds, and one-fourth on miscellaneous worthy objects promotive of Buddhism. And finally, not to take up your time with details that can be read in this month's Theosophist—both deeds provide that any trustee or manager who may be detected in taking a percentage or other pecuniary advantage out of the fund, shall be expelled from the society in disgrace, and his offense made known to all Ceylon.

Various schemes have been suggested to me by patriotic Hindoo gentlemen as proper objects for the raising of such a fund. A Madras pensioner, Mr. Naidoo, names the sending of clever but poor youths to Europe and America to learn trades and bring their technical skill to India. A Parsee gentleman thinks it would be well to grant a certain stipend to young men who would obligate themselves to attend one of the government colleges of agriculture and then to take up land and farm it. I have this note from him:

My Dear Col. Olcott: With reference to our conversation the other evening in regard to raising a national fund in India on the model of one you have raised in Ceylon, under the auspices of the Theosophical Society, and meant to be devoted to the material advancement of the masses, in proof of the practical interest the society takes in the welfare of the people of this country, I would sugest the advisability of devoting a portion of the fund, if raised, to the following two purposes:

(1) Young educated boys of poor parentage should be allowed a monthly stipend from the fund, provided they would join any of the agricultural classes opened by the government of India, and engage subsequently in the agricultural pursuit. One of the great wants of the country is a refined system of agriculture, and since the government has thought it right to devote its attention to this important subject by establishing an Agricultural Department, our young men would do well to acquire the art and thereby become the means of spreading a knowledge of the principles of the much needed refined system of agricullure throughout the land.

(2) Similar allowance may be made from the fund to young educated men who may be desirous of following the profession of any handicraftsmen in preference to mere clerkships in offices. In connection with this subject I would draw your attention to an article in the Bombay Chronicle of to-day, headed "Clerk vs. Handicraftsman," which I inclose. I trust you will take up these suggestions and mention them in your public address. We shall talk more about the subject when we meet. Yours fraternally, ——

A Poonah friend broached a scheme for the organization of a model village, a sort of Aryan Arcadia, where every want of the intellectual, moral and physical man would be thought of, and to a degree provided for. Your and my eminent friend, Mr. W. Ragoonath Rao, late Dewan of Indore, writes as follows:

Dear Sir: I think yourself and your society can render eminent and good service to India in various ways. You can rouse up people to establish schools, quite different from those now in use, which are absolutely necessary for the improvement of mind and hearts. You can induce people to open new industries, such as paper-manufacture, machine-making, etc., etc. You can make people attend to religions, to cultivate self-reliance, to become loyal and good citizens, to induce the English and the Americans to take more brotherly interest in the welfare of the Indian Aryans. I have no doubt that the society will use its influence in bringing about the well-being of us all. I remain, dear sir, yours, obedient,

3d December, 1881. W. RAGOONATH RAO.

This is highly complimentary, and I shall be glad if we may be found to deserve his good opinion. I have myself thought, among other things, of the endowment of a professorship of Aryan Technology at Benares College; the chair to be filled by the most competent man to be found. The lectures to include everything about the ancient Aryan arts, trade-rules, recipes, processes, etc., that can be extracted out of Sanskrit and vernacular literature. In connection with this chair, a technological museum might be opened at Benares, the one city of all India to which people are constantly thronging at all seasons of the year. However, all this is premature. As I said before, I will not even ask for a single pice towards the proposed fund, until all the preliminaries before noted have been amply provided for. My object to-day is to merely throw out the idea, and ask all true Indian patriots to favor me with the names of the seven or seventeen best men in each of the presidencies whom I ought to consult and co-operate with. The Theosophical Society is here, not for the sake of notoriety or show, but to do good, in all practical ways, to the country of our adoption.

The past year of our society was fruitful of sensations connected with phenomena of the kind which tradition always has taken to illustrate the intimate knowledge of natural law in the department of force possessed by the Aryan sages, and transmitted from generation to generation of their followers. Though some skeptics will deny it, yet a large majority—perhaps, we may say most—intelligent Hindoos regard this reaffirmation and substantiation of the truth of Aryan occult science as the most important fact in the history of the theosophical movement in India. Thousands who were predisposed to believe the Yoga Shastras true, had still lost heart, for Western science had declared such phenomena impossible and the Indian writings but the wildest fiction. Even the most learned pandits of Benares, as I was told by a very high Anglo-Indian official of the N. W. Provinces, had admitted that if ever such phenomena had occurred, their day had passed by, and no one now living knew the Yoga Vidya practically. But when we came and said that the old record was true; that these wonder-working powers are inherent in man; that discipline under proper conditions would develop them to-day as they had in the day of Gautama and Sankariah; and that to believe in their existence did not oblige one to believe in the possibility of miracle, but, on the contrary, made one realize that miracle is not possible—these doubters were rid of their perplexity. The other evening, my countryman, Mr. Cook, held up a copy of the Bible and declared that he did not fear the power of the combined science of the world to overthrow it. In like manner I challenge the whole array of materialistic men of science, of decorated Hindoo collegians, and of clergymen, padris, priests, bishops, cardinals, and gnastikas, to disprove the truth taught by Patanjali and a score more of Indian sages, and confirmed by the phenomenal demonstrations given by thousands of initiates, in many lands and among many peoples—that the ancient progenitors of your race and my race knew the secret laws of matter and of force, which Western science is groping after, but as yet without avail. And India, the unworthy but yet not quite effete successor of her Ayran mother, is the dusky casket in which the splendid secret has been locked throughout all these unhappy ages. Search, search for the key, ye men of modern science. Not in the ooze of ocean's flood, where your deep-sea dredges bring up quaint specimens of the busy life of the abyssal faunæ; not in the dust of powdered aerolites; not in the sporules of infection; not in colored cells of the vaunted protoplasm; nor, though you turn from the glass that magnifies the things of the little-thing world, to the Greenwich refractor that brings the seas of Mars and the moons of Jupiter within the range of the eye's most wondrous sweep, will you find out the secret of your being. No; but if you drag the depths of the ocean of human nature, if you study the laws of your own self, if you turn the eye of intuition to those profounder depths of natural law, where the demiurgic Hindoo Brahma manages the correlations of forces and the rythmic measures of the atoms, and the eternal principle of motion, called by the Hindoo Parabrahm, outbreaths and inhales universes—there will the golden key of this ineffable knowledge be found.

The Chair then called upon Mirza Moorad Alee Beg, a learned Mussulman gentleman, secretary of the Saorashtra Theosophical Society, to make some remarks; at the same time observing that his presence upon the platform, in company with Parsees and Hindoos, was a striking proof of the kindly feelings of confraternity imparted by the society to its members. Mr. Mirza spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Gentlemen, and Ladies: It may surprise many to behold me, a professed Mohammedan, now standing by the side of the president of the Theosophical Society. At first, nothing could seem more inconsistent to a superficial thinker or observer (ignorant alike of the deeper and truer significance of philosophy or history) than that an "Allah" worshiper—one of the religion which has been always regarded as pre-eminently the Monotheistic creed—should appear fighting in the ranks of those who have been styled the "Atheistic" Theosophis's. The fact has even, I believe, been turned (by some "charitable" Christian padri living not a thousand miles from this lecture-room) into a matter of personal reproach against myself as a "renegade." But, in reality, there is nothing extraordinary in the circumstance, for there is one great bond of union which binds all of us to the oriental religions in a necessary alliance against the so (and falsely) called Christianity and its representatives. We all believe in one great, omnipresent, all-perfecting, all-sufficient something, with the exception of which and independently of which, nothing can exist. It does not matter whether we call it "Allah" and give it a more anthropomorphic character, with the orthodox Mohammedans—or give it a less anthropomorphic character, and call it "Brahm" with the Hindoos—or deny it a personal character altogether and call it "Nirvana" with the Buddhists; nor does it matter what view we take of its operations or procedure—whether we consider it self-split up and dividing itself into Ormuzd and Ahriman with the Parsees, or differentiating into thirty-three crores of demi-gods with the Hindoos, or silently and imperceptibly pervading all things with the Vedantist, or as the "Kooh-Illah" or "Ism-Azem" on which heaven and earth is based—with the Mohammedans. It all comes to the same thing in the end. It is only the weakness and inadequacy of our finite faculties which makes us unable to comprehend or express the nature and operations of the infinite we all acknowledge. But in this we are all alike and stand by each other. We decline to admit of the second God which the Christians would force on us. We decline to believe that permanent duality is possible in the universe. Mathematically, traditionally, historically, scientifically, philosophically, all is one, and an eternal two is an absurdity. We refuse to accept the demiurge Jehovah, tribal deity of an obscure Semite tribe, in preference to the Mohammedan "Allah," the primeval deity of the whole Semite race, which, again, is both the "Zervana Akerana" of the Zorostrians, and the "Brahm" of the Aryans under another name. And, though Jesus may have been a wonder-worker, though he may have enunciated (as the gospels) pregnant eternal truths which the so-called modern Christians refuse to understand or accept—though he may have exhibited the highest ideal personal life (all of which have been and may be disputed, but the admission of which does not affect my present argument) we decline to admit him either as the sole representative, or as the co-eternal partner of the infinite. We, of Asia, from whom the primeval truths first went out to illuminate the world, decline to have these same truths, degraded, distorted, and absurdified, thrust back upon us, their originators, in a corrupted form. The source must be purer than the muddy outlet corrupted with the ordure of a thousand cities. Be our god what it may, it shall be the God of the universe—not the God of the children of Israel. It shall be the God of infinity and totality—not a half-god who is helpless from his passions and powerless to enforce his own degrees, and who must give up his son to the slaughter in order to propitiate himself. The God whose laws are ordained in the limitless Cosmos—not in a papal council or in a Presbyterian synod. We may dispute among ourselves—we may have our wordy wars, arising principally from the inadequacy of language to express the unexpressible, but we will never submit to the yoke of a narrow and self-contradictory and irrational theology, which is founded on a misapprehension of the ideas of the great sages of our past—the past which belongs to all of us alike, whether Hindoo or Moslem, Semite or Aryan. And it is as a representative of this grand union against the only really intolerant or really absurd religion, which yet strives to crush us all alike, because its very essence is persecution—and neither to deny, enforce, or discuss any similarity of my own belief to that of any other members of the Theosophical Society—that I stand here to-day. I am for "Allah" or "Brahm"—the God of infinity—against the half-god Jehovah—the god of cruelty, persecution, and death—and I am consequently fighting at this moment for Hindoo, Mohammedan, and Parsee alike. All the rest of theology is but secondary to this, which after all is the real meaning of the Mohammedan creed "La-illaha-il-Ullah!" There can be no gods but God. We refuse to go downward on the rungs of the theological ladder. We refuse to go backward on the path and investigation of knowledge. We refuse to accept semi-darkness instead of such light, perfect or imperfect, as we may severally have. If we are Mohammedans we prefer our own one anthropomorphic God to three more anthropomorphic than he. If we are Parsees we prefer our theory of the dual principle to another name of good and evil still more complicated and irrational. If we are Hindoos we prefer our own philosophy to one less spiritual and consistent. If we are Buddhists we prefer our own morality to one less rational and less perfect. If we are none of these, but simply Europeanized Infidels, we will take our stand on the latest results of science and refuse to barbarize our belief by going back to the cosmogony of Moses, or to base our ideas of future life and salvation on the poetical aspirations of the malcontent Jews.

And this, once for all, is the answer that we, Theosophists, in the name of all Asia, give to those who would "cook" us into Christianity. It is ours! You have stolen and dishonored it! We will not have it back torn, twisted, and defiled. Take it away!

Col. Olcott spoke a few introductory words to the effect that I am stopping in Bombay for a few days, while on a tour around the world, on which my numerous friends had sent me to write up an account of what I might see and learn of the ancient systems of religion and philosophy; the same to appear in my paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has a weekly reading of 50,000 persons. (Let me remark that the personal allusions to my own private matters were made at the suggestion of Col. Olcott, who, presumed that Mr. Cook, when he learned of my presence here, would take the pains to denounce me.) I spoke as follows:

Friends of Asiatic Blood: I wish to assure you that I am very glad to meet you on this occasion. I have for many years felt a desire to see this part of the world—to visit the countries whence the occidental nations have received their systems of religion and philosophy. This is the cradle of the literature, the religion, the philosophy, the science, and the civilization of the world; and I am glad to be here, to meet you, and to take you by the hand. I am also glad to be present at this anniversary meeting of the Theosophical Society. I am much pleased to find such an active and healthy organization in existence among you, and to learn of the great good it is effecting in uniting in a harmonious brotherhood the believers in the different ancient religions of this country. I am pleased to learn, from many sources, of the good work done by this society. I knew Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky in our own country, and knew them to be excellent people.

A strong proof that you are doing good work is the enmity you are stirring up in the ranks of bigotry and intolerance. While coming to this hall this evening to attend this meeting, I found that a scurrilous, slanderous, and false circular had been distributed about the doors by the enemies of this society. The circular bears my name, and contains the charges that have been acknowledged to be false, the misrepresentations that have been apologized for and withdrawn, but now picked up again and repeated in this anonymous, unmanly manner. This mode of warfare is not honorable, and may well be called mean and contemptible; but it is about what you may expect from those who oppose the work in which you are engaged. You may look for bitter enmity, and know that base means will be resorted to to oppose your efforts.

I know something of this sort of opposition. I know something of Christian love and charity. I have had an opportunity of tasting it. Two years ago this time I was in prison, sent there to perform hard labor for the term of thirteen months by a Christian prosecutor, a Christian judge, and a Christian jury. It was done under the pretext that I had circulated immoral and obscene literature. I was engaged, as you have been told, in publishing a paper called THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which I aimed to speak the truth in the best way I knew how, believing there is no better employment than a search after truth. I was also engaged in publishing numerous books, pamphlets, and tracts devoted to the same work, and these my Christian enemies wished to suppress. It was a question debated in the Young Men's Christian Association of New York city how my publications could be stopped. A man by the name of Comstock undertook the enterprise. He had procured the passage of a law in our national legislature, making it punishable by heavy fines and imprisonment to send any indecent or obscene publication through the mail, and under this law he believed he could secure my conviction. I was at first arrested for writing and publishing a small pamphlet entitled "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," in which I asked a good many questions to which I would have been glad to receive replies, and would be glad to receive the same to-day. When this pamphlet was brought to the notice of our government authorities at Washington, it was pronounced insufficient upon which to prosecute, and the case was ordered to be dismissed, and it was deemed that a person had a right to ask questions. But my enemy was angry that he had failed in his effort, and with the persistency of a bulldog he pursued me. He next caused my arrest for mailing a copy of a pamphlet on the marriage question—radical in character, but containing such arguments as an earnest, free man has a right to make. I am a bookseller, and sold that among other works. My trial was a very unfair one. I was not allowed to show by competent witnesses, authors, publishers, and literary men that the work was not obscene. I was not allowed to compare it with the works of standard authors—works to be found in every library—to show that this little book was no more objectionable. This was also denied me. It was a foregone conclusion that I must be convicted. The judge instructed the jury that if they "found anything in the work that they deemed might have a tendency to injuriously affect any individual into whose hands it might fall," they must find me guilty. The same ruling would condemn any bookseller in the world. This charge was sufficient. One of the jurymen, however—a Unitarian—not deeming me guilty, hung out for fifteen hours, insisting that I did not deserve imprisonment, but at length, wishing to go home, he gave way and joined the others. Let me remark that I was convicted as much upon the little pamphlet called the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," as upon the other, for that was held up before the jury and they were told I was the author of it.

After I was sent to prison, two hundred thousand of my countrymen, believing I was unjustly imprisoned, signed a petition to the president, asking him to release me. He examined the case; he read the work, and said I had done nothing worthy of imprisonment, and ordered a pardon to be made out for me. But my enemies of the Christian churches made a great remonstrance to this and used their utmost efforts to keep me in prison. The clergymen and the laity of hundreds of churches appealed to the president not to release me; and not being brave enough for the occasion he listened to their requests. Their influence was too much for me I served out my term, thus having a good opportunity for feeling the effects of Christian charity and love. Being a man of years, it was thought I might not survive the term of imprisonment, and that thus my publications might be destroyed. But this was not the case; my friends remained true to me, and my paper and other publications are more successful now than ever.

While in prison another act of meanness was done me by my enemies. Some private letters, not as discreet as they should have been, written to a female acquaintance, but not criminal—these were sought out and published by my enemies to do me all the injury possible, but this effort availed little more than the others. My friends retained confidence in me, and have now sent me on this journey around the world to learn what I can of the people of the various countries, and of their past and present religions. I have visited many of the countries of Europe, including Greece and Constantinople; I have been through Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and am now in this oriental land where I find much to interest me, much that is worthy of study. It is probable that but for the persecution I have received I would never have seen your country, nor have been able to meet you here on this occasion.

I listened a few nights ago to the address of Mr. Joseph Cook in this hall. It is suggested that I should make some reply to his remarks It hardly seems necessary, for there was not very much in them. His effort seemed to be to convince you that man lives beyond the grave, on the ground that the principle or force of animal life exists, and that human cells and tissues are produced from the elements around us. For this reason he thinks Christianity must be true. In the formation of cells and tissues, he imagines a superintendent or manipulator behind the operations of nature, which operator he terms "the weaver," the one who "moves the shuttle." According to my view, the various processes of nature move along in obedience to established laws, in cell-making, as in everything else, no invisible superintendent being necessary. Of course the process of building up cells and tissues is wonderful, as are all the processes of nature. Vegetable growth is nearly as wonderful as animal growth, but nature's laws accomplish one as easily as the other, and in the same natural way that all other operations are produced.

At one moment Mr. Cook credits nature with what she does, and at the very next moment he claims it for his invisible weaver. In appealing to the chairman of the meeting (a professor of anatomy and physiology) that nature's work is perfect, he said: "Nature does not work by halves, she does not make half a joint or hinge only; when she makes half a joint she also makes the other half." This is very correct; but why in the next breath does he attempt to deprive nature of this credit and give it to his imaginary weaver? Had he given nature the credit for building up the cells, and doing all the rest she performs, the same as with making the joints, he would have been more honest.

And if his invisible weaver is superior to nature, superior to all the operations that take place, and if nature is indebted to this weaver for her own existence, this weaver must be more wonderful than nature. Mr. Cook should have told you where this weaver came from and how he became possessed of such power. If he claims that the weaver always existed it is certainly just as easy, and probably quite as truthful, to say that nature always existed, and requires no weaver to effect the operations which she performs. I believe this to be the case. Nature is an eternal principle, or force, and is dependent upon no extraneous power; and it is a species of dishonesty to deprive her of the credit which is justly due to her. If nature requires a creator, how much more does Mr. Cook's "weaver" require a creator!

If life beyond the grave is a reality we owe it to nature. It must be in her economy to produce it, for whatever takes place is natural. Nature does nothing that is unnatural; and she does all that is performed. Without her, and her ever-present laws, nothing can be produced. I hope for a continued life as really as Mr. Cook does; I desire to continue to exist. But if he succeeds in convincing you that life beyond the grave is a reality, or at any rate may be hoped for, that does not prove Christianity to be true. Christianity has no right to claim the originality of the doctrine of immortality and a future life, for she was by no means the first to teach it. It is false to claim that Christianity is the first to teach this doctrine. So, I repeat, if Mr. Cook claims that the formation of cells and human tissues proves a future life, it does not prove Christianity. It would be equally true for Mr. Cook to claim that because the sun rises in the east, because the winds of heaven blow, because water runs down hill, and because twice two are four, life is continued beyond the grave, and that Christianity is true. They prove it as much as do the formation of cells and living tissues.

Christianity has nothing new to offer you; nothing better than you already have, nothing more than your country possessed many hundreds of years before Christianity was known in the world. Probably better morals have never been taught than were in the past ages uttered by the sages and philosophers of your country, and there seems to be little use in throwing them away and taking in their place about the same doctrines revamped over, or in adopting a later system.

But I will not continue my remarks further. I thank you for your attention.

Col. Olcott then stepped forward and said that, doubtless through modesty, I had suppressed the important facts that after my sentence had been served out, a public reception at one of the most respectable public buildings, Chickering Hall, in New York city, was accorded me, and upon my reaching London a public banquet was given me by the British Freethinkers, with Mr. Bradlaugh in the chair, These explanatory remarks of Col. Olcott were received with applause and cheers.

A New Song.

A most extraordinary refrain has been inaugurated among the religious people in some portions of Maine with a naïveté and spirit contagious enough to link together, in its accompanying dance or hop, persons not only of different sexes, but widely different sectarian creeds. When they meet on the street they giv forth the note, join hands and trip lightly, then part again in two seconds and are off. One evening it burst out in a ladies' sitting-room where about half the company were gentlemen, some up to 70 years old, and kept up its fire for half an hour. Probably the majority of the company were rank Catholics, one or two were Episcopalians, at least the oldest man of the company was; the rest were Baptists and Congregationalists. The burden of the chorus is composed of the following phrase exactly word for word: "Free love and dying grace," repeated over and over and over, etc., and the measure appears to be or sounds like 2–4. CABALIST.

Fanatics at Work.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The fanatics are making strenuous efforts to capture this county. The Sunday law is now their favorit weapon, and the way they dictate, or try to, to the Jews, the Adventists, and those that don't happen to believe in their infernal nonsense is a caution to all concerned.

The following resolutions were passed by the Christian Alliance at Hanford, Cal., April 29th.

Resolved, That we approve of the effort to enforce the Sunday law, and assure the Good Templars and other law-abiding citizens of our hearty co-operation to that end;

Resolved, That the ministers of this alliance preach upon the subject of temperance and the Sunday law the first Sunday in May; and

Resolved, That these resolutions be furnished the papers for publication, and that any minister failing to preach on the subject of temperance or the Sunday law shall be open to the censure of the alliance.

These resolutions will giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a smell of the breath of these dictators and religious tyrants, and will show them what the residents of Tulare county, and Hanford, especially, may expect in the near future. The first case of Sunday law violation that has come up in the Stockton courts for hearing since the late decision, resulted in conviction and the imposition of a fine of $10. OTIS WHITNEY.

Heredity.

The fourth, and last for the season, of the parlor meetings of the New York branch of the Institute of Heredity, held at 120 Lexington ave., on the evening of the 27th ult., was a success. Entertaining addresses were made by the president, S. P Putnam, Esq., Prof. Nelson Sizer, and Mrs. C. B. Whitehead. Remarks were added by Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, Dr. Foote, and Dr. C. S. Weeks. Mrs. C. B. Whitehead and Dr. E. B. Foote were appointed delegates to the Convention of the Members and Patrons of Heredity, to be held on May 30th, at Wesleyan Hall, Boston. The directory of the institute has had the good judgment to appoint our worthy old friend, Parker Pillsbury, general agent. His first speech for the cause was made at Malden, Mass., on the evening of April 28th.

A PARSON who had been in India had acquired a partiality for excessivly hot pickles. He had a brand of his own, composed of capsicum, cayenne, and the most pungent condiments, which he took about with him. One day an American, sitting at the same table d'hote, asked for the pickles. "These are my own, which I always keep with me," said the clergyman. "May I try them?" "Certainly," said the parson, with a grin. The American tried them, and it was his turn to screw his face. As soon as he recovered breath, after the biting torment of the pickles, he said: "Wal, I reckon you're a parson?' "I am in holy orders, sir." "Wal, I guess you preach hell and damnation, parson?" "It is my duty to teach those doctrins, sir." "Wal, you're the first of your cloth who I've known to carry samples."

A RAW-BONED Yankee, meeting a Jew hurrying up Broadway, deliberately knocked him down. Scrambling to his feet, the assaulted Israelite demanded, "What dat was for?" "Why," said Jonathan, "you are one of them fellows that crucified my savior, aint you?" "Oh, mine God! dat was two dousand years ago," remonstrated the unlucky Hebrew. "It doesn't matter a ——," retorted the imperturbable Yankee; "I never heard of it till to-day."

Deity—The Bible God and Nature.

During all historical time, the question of when, how, and from what source came the universe, has occupied the best thoughts of the best minds the world has ever produced.

It is natural, perhaps, that this should be so, but the exercise of common sense by intelligent persons should be sufficient to convince them that, from the nature of the case, it always has, and always will prove futil.

It may be well, in order to satisfy this desire, for some people, in their imagination, to fix up a "great first cause," and call it God. But, as taught in the Bible, where deity and all his attributes are more or less definitly pointed out and defined, mankind should be cautious about accepting it as veritable truth, especially when we see so much that is not in accordance with reason, is contradictory, and has been productiv of so many different opinions, causing more contention, misery, and bloodshed than anything else in the history of the world.

If mankind must and will hav a god to worship, they should hav a better one than the God of the Bible—one who, above all things else, is less selfish. What good can be the outcome, either to God or the creatures of his creation, for him to demand that all things should bow in the most servil and abject adoration to him? Does it not beget in mankind a propensity to require the same from all things under their control?

If it be true, as Bible religionists teach, that God doeth all things, and that "he doeth all things well," then the doctrin that "whatever is is right" is certainly correct.

Is it not, then, the hight of inconsistency for religious people to pray? If God is infinit in all his perfections, why will not those who believe in him be content to rest all things in his hands, and cease imploring him by millions of prayers to order things according to the peculiar ideas and notions of those who pray? We are constantly told that God not only knows what is best, but that he does it every time. Is it possible for intelligent, reasoning, thinking beings to believe anything more inconsistent? When we look back o'er the history of the world, we find that this question of deity has caused more disagreement, more contention, and bloodshed than anything else. The best thoughts of the greatest minds have for ages made this question a life-study.

And to-day, standing as we do in the blazing light of the civilization of the last quarter of the nineteenth century, having the benefit of all past history, we know absolutely nothing in regard to deity, a future life, and all other kindred, unknowable things, that hav agitated the world from earliest recorded history to the present time.

Why will not people cease their contentions over questions that the history of the world, reason, and common sense teach them are past finding out, and turn their attention toward learning the duties of this life?

If it be true that God is infinit in his perceptions, and that he is also omnipotent in power, that he has and does order all things for the best, then it was right for our first parents to eat forbidden fruit, and all of the so-called sin and misery the world has ever known are for the best. The wickedness that caused God to drown the world was the best thing that could hav happened; his failure in making his chosen people, the Jews, anything but a perverse and wicked set; and then best and greatest of all, his giving a part of himself, in the person of his son, to redeem the whole race; and that proving the most stupenduous failure of all, for according to the plainest dictates of Bible teaching, only a few are saved at last. Taking all these and many other things into consideration, this God of the Bible must be considered the greatest failure of anything in the history of the world.

As for myself, I am an Agnostic. I have no belief or disbelief in regard to deity. In my opinion, the first great cause, or creator, must ever remain unknown and unknowable; and therefore it is an utter waste of time and talent to endeavor to find out what ever has been, and, as I think, must ever remain a mystery.

Many Liberals are, as I think, as inconsistent in their ideas of deity as orthodox Christians. It is very unpopular for any one to admit for an instant that he has not some definit belief in a creator of the universe. Very many Liberals are as tenacious in their ideas of deity as either or any of the various religious votaries in the world. They tell us to behold the beauty and perfection of the works of the God of nature; the regularity and order of the change of seasons; the seedtime and harvest that the God of nature brings in regular succession, insuring reward to the humble tiller of the soil who puts his trust in nature's power to remunerate him according to his just deserts; the perfection with which nature brings forth and matures everything having animal or vegetable life. They say, Behold our perfect God, and you will see one that is not angry and that makes no mistakes. But in this they are just as much at fault as are those who hav made to themselvs any other gods for worship. Thomas Paine was a Deist; he firmly believed in God. And the only successful point that Bishop Watson made in answer to his "Age of Reason" was that Paine's God of nature had all the imperfections that he ascribed to the God of the Bible.

Let us rehearse a little of the perfect work of this God of nature. Is there a person who has lived to mature years that has not known and felt something of the misery that nature's God has brought upon the human family? Is there anything more horrible than the misery and desolation that mark the track of the tornado or cyclone? Are there not at times in our days floods that cause destruction, if not as wide spread as that of Noah, at least as productiv of misery and wo to thousands of human beings that deserve the fostering care of the God of nature? This God that such men as Thomas Paine worship does not exempt humanity from suffering caused by drouth, famin, pestilence, and all the catalog of ills and evils that cause so much misery and wo everywhere on earth, where nature's God rules and controls all things, as it is imagined by their votaries all other gods hav done and do.

In all probability the Bible God and all others that mankind hav ever worshiped are the products of their imagination—the legitimate outgrowth of ignorance and superstition, caused by what man has witnessed in the wondrous workings of nature.

One principal objection to the worship of imaginary gods is that it caused mankind to rely too much on the supposed power of their deity, and too little on themselvs.

I hav endeavored briefly to show that all our efforts to know anything of the first great cause of all things must necessarily result in great difference of opinion and always in ultimate failure.

This being the case, let us giv up speculating, contriving, and wondering in regard to deity, and all unite in one great, grand effort to learn how to liv aright in this world, which is the only one of which we can hav any real tangible knowledge; and for this life, whose duties may well employ all our time and talents, let us try to learn how we may best avoid the various evils that afflict mankind.

First and best of all, learn to be kind to each other and to all things. Endeavor to learn and understand the workings of nature and its general laws, that we may know best where and how to liv, and what to do to avoid the perils which, in the mysterious workings of nature's laws, so often cause sickness, sorrow, pain and death, that often might be avoided if we possessed the knowledge that may be obtained by persevering study of what may be learned. When such men as H. W. Beecher and George C. Miln gradually or promptly wean themselvs from the beliefs in which they hav so long been bound, they should giv the world the benefit of their influence, eloquence, and best thoughts, in teaching by precept and practice how all may grow wiser and better every day. By so doing, all will be happier in this life, and if there is a future life, if justice rules, we shall be in the enjoyment of all we hav earned.

Is Phrenology a Humbug?

In reference to phrenology I wish to state it as my opinion that it is one of the leading sciences. In starting out on this subject, some would say, What is phrenology—its meaning and its influence over the human race? to which I reply, Phrenology is very little understood by many; therefore they reject it as a matter of course, and call it a humbug. Must, then, everything be rejected because not understood properly? This mental science is indeed a wonderful study. Phrenology is the key to nature. And why? Because it unfolds the mystery of all human thoughts. It shows what superstition dwells in the human mind; what a wonderful work is man, with all his construction, organs, faculties, functions. This all phrenology shows. But it has been asserted by some that phrenology is based upon Christianity. What a childish idea! Do not Infidels possess a mind most similar to those of the Christians? Then why is phrenology based upon Christianity? Is it because most people hav a large share of veneration? Hav not the unbelievers in dogmas also a certain amount? Don't they worship the sublimity of nature. The Infidel worships a thing that is known to him, while, on the other hand, Christians worship a being that is unknown to either.

Does phrenology point out the existence of a God? In no way does it point out any such imaginary being. How can it? It is merely an idea that can not be shaken from the mind. And I say, No phrenologist can tell or say that it points out the existence of a god. Phrenology leads to reason and light—not to superstition. Only those believers in the science that are subject to a certain amount of superstition will say it is based upon Christianity. Even if it was the case, would that make Christianity more convincing? Would it make more believers in its dogmas? Nature is all there is for man to know and ever learn. And he can see it in this life, without waiting to know it in the next. But what does it matter to us human beings if there is another life? Does it promis us more happiness there if we liv in misery here? The time will come when religion will pass away, and science will step in her way for eternal truth.

Mr. Bradlaugh's Votes and Speeches on Ireland.

From the National Reformer.

Henry George, whose remarkable book on "Progress and Poverty" was noticed at considerable length in these columns long before it was dealt with by any other journal in this country, is now the Dublin correspondent of the Irish World. In the issue of the Irish World for March 25th, Mr. Henry George writes:

"A friend of mine, and a warm friend of Ireland—a gentleman who has rendered, and still is rendering, much service to the Irish cause—has written to me from Canada, where he now is, a strong letter on the Bradlaugh case. It was written upon receipt of the telegraphic intimation that the Irish members would probably vote against the admission of Bradlaugh, and he says that such a course would show a narrowness which would estrange from them the sympathy of many who looked upon Bradlaugh as representing the just claim of a constituency to select their own representativ. That the Irish members, by voting for Bradlaugh, would hav shown a closer adherence to principle, which has been outraged in the cases of Parnell, Dillon, and O'Kelly, is true, and it seems to me that that is the course they should hav adopted. But it must be remembered that Bradlaugh himself showed no respect for this principle in the case of Ireland. My friend, doubtless, forgets that when Bradlaugh was in the House (before the legal decision which deprived him of his seat), he voted steadily for coercion, and that, had he taken his place this session, it was certain that the government would hav had no stancher supporter of its policy of imprisonment and terror. It was this, and not any religious prejudice, so far as I can judge, which prompted the Irish members to join the Tories in administering to the government the check with which the session opened. And while two wrongs do not make a right, it is difficult, in view of Mr. Bradlaugh's attitude upon the Irish question, to feel any sympathy with him, or any indignation at the course of the Irish representativs; and the view I am inclined to take of the matter is very much that taken by Miss Helen Taylor—a lady who will certainly not be accused of religious narrowness. At a workingmen's meeting, where she had spoken in behalf of the rights of Ireland with the vigor and eloquence with which she always speaks, she was asked by one of Mr. Bradlaugh's supporters to use her influence with the Irish members to vote for Bradlaugh's admission. 'If you,' she answered, 'will influence Mr. Bradlaugh to oppose coercion in Ireland, and the arbitrary imprisonment of Irish representativs, then I will be inclined to urge Irish members to vote for his admission, but not till then.' Judged, however, upon its own merits, the Bradlaugh case is an outrage upon the right of a constituency to elect its own members, and it is destined to giv more trouble ere the session ends. In the mean time, whoever Mr. Bradlaugh may complain of, he has no right to complain of the Irish members. They hav but paid him back in his own coin."

I only saw the Irish World on Thursday, and at once sent the following letter to Mr. Henry George:

"20 CIRCUS ROAD, ST. JOHN'S WOOD,
"LONDON N. W.

"Sir: I hav had forwarded to me the Irish World of March 25th, in which you say that 'When Bradlaugh was in the House (before the legal decision which deprived him of his seat) he voted steadily for coercion.' Will you permit me to reply, that is absolutely untrue, so far as relates to the Peace Preservation bill. I opposed it by speech and vote; I opposed its introduction by speech; I actually formally moved its rejection, when Mr. Parnell neglected the duty he had elected to fulfil; I voted against its second reading; I voted separately against every clause, in committee, and I voted against its third reading. I did support the government on the Arms bill, as I do not think arms useful to starving men, if constitutional agitation is all that is meant.

"You hav doubtless been misled by persons whose personal malice induces the circulation of the misrepresentations as to my speech and conduct on Irish affairs. Miss Helen Taylor's misapprehension is less easy to account for, as I presume she took some personal pains to ascertain my actual conduct before she denounced it.

"As I was the first in England to giv the slightest publicity to your views in the National Reformer, I trust I hav the right to claim from you reasonable publicity for the correction.

"Yours obediently, C. BRADLAUGH.

"Henry George, Esq."

I shall be obliged if my friends in Canada and America will insure the widest possible publicity to my letter. It is a little too much that, at the election in 1881, friends of Mr. Gladstone, at Northampton, should hav refused me their votes because of my opposition to the Coercion bill, and that Irishmen should be so grievously misled by unscrupulous and untruthful persons like Messrs. Healy, "O'Donnell," and Redmond, into believing that I had supported it. I may add that the editors of this journal hav repeatedly protested against the imprisonment of men on suspicion, both in its pages and by speech at public meetings. C. BRADLAUGH.

A Sweet Bible Tale.

Imagin a meadow at the edge of a wood, through which runs a babbling brook. Autumn, with brush of light, is tinting the leaves from his rainbow palet. The sun with gorgeous train of gold and purple cloud, fills the arched heavens with the glory of an eastern eventide. The birds join in merry welcome chorus to the oncoming amorous night, and the zephyrs add their cadence soft and sweet, swaying the leafy choirs love-breathing.

Behold a troop of merry children come, laden with flowers, rending the air with joyous shouts.

"Turning to mirth all things on earth,
As only childhood can."

Some walk by twos, hand in hand, watching the great golden sun, wondering. Some, reclining upon the velvet sward, twine long garlands studded with flower gems. Others bathe their limbs in the cooling waters of the stream, or join with shouts of laughter in vain pursuits of the light-winged butterfly.

"Knowest thou," asked one child of another, whither the sun goes and where he rests?"

"Nay," answered the other, "I know not whither he goes, but I know that he always returns; for the sun-god loves the earth, and the trees and the flowers and the birds are their children."

"Aye," quoth a little one, "and the yellow butterflies too, for they are made of sunbeams."

Now, on the white and dusty road a strange figure approaches. An old man, bent with age, moving with an awkward hobble. A greasy garment hides from sight his withered limbs. Two small and restless eyes glow in his parched and shriveled face like hot coals in a bed of cinders. The cupola of his head, guiltless of hair, shines like the dome of a mosque, while a matted, tangled beard falls waist-low upon his breast. At every step he kicks out behind his tattered cloak as if to shake the dust from off his sandaled feet.

At this sight, the little ones, with childhood's keen sense of the ludicrous, shout with laughter, and cry out at the fanatic, "Go up, thou bald head." The prophet pauses, and his eyes gleam with hatred. The little ones start back affrighted, half crying at the strange gestures and curses uttered in the name of the bloody Jehovah. But, look! From out the wood come two strange forms, and now the air is rent with piteous cries as limb from limb the childish form is torn. With reeking entrails 'round the earth is strewn; the brook runs red with blood, as monsters lacerate the white young flesh. Each flower drinks up a drop of blood and holds it trembling for a mother's tear. The sun in horror sinks to other worlds. Night with its black mantle cloaks o'er the deed, and demons, sons of darkness, sweep through the heavy air, and shrilly laugh to see themselvs outdone in crime by man's divinity! G. F. D.

Byron Disagrees with Horace.

From the Jewish Times.

"These (priests and churches) are opposed to mental freedom, substituting therefor authority and submission, and of course are unnecessary among a free people. Catholicism, Protestantism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, Mormonism, every ism which sets up its authority over the human mind is a species of mental despotism."

We take the above quotation from an editorial in the Boston Investigator of April 12, 1882. Our courteous and venerable contemporary will, we trust, strike Judaism from off the list of isms which set up authority over the human mind for the purpose of establishing a mental despotism. Let us treat the question from a purely intellectual standpoint. It seems apparent to us that our good and noble friend Seaver, who for nearly a quarter of a century has edited the Investigator and boldly advocated mental liberty, does not rightly understand the spirit and teachings of Judaism. As we are of the earth earthy, and as we believe that this life should absorb all our attention to make it more beautiful and bright for human habitation than it is, the Investigator cannot charge us with living in the clouds or reveling in an imaginary heaven. What the eternal has in store for us after this life we do not know any more than a little child, and so far as our life and aspirations guide us, we believe in that sententious sentiment of the eloquent Ingersoll, "Help for the living; hope for the dead." This quoting from Ingersoll is the first evidence that we, as Jews, believe in mental liberty, and the humblest Jew living can take this sentiment of Ingersoll's, based, as it is, upon reason, common sense, and inspired by a beautiful hope, and enshrine it within his heart or adorn his walls with this grand and simple expression. There is no church authority, nor rabbinical authority, to hold a mental despotism over him in so doing. The editor of the Investigator has heard of that peerless genius, George Eliot. She was a believer in mental liberty; she hated shams and despotisms of all kinds. She was not a Jewess, yet no Jewess has ever lived who is dearer to the heart of Israel than is George Eliot in name and memory.

The Investigator has heard of Thomas Paine, whom the Christian church has cursed and vilified. Now the columns of the Jewish Times will bear evidence that the Jewish people admire the immortal author-hero of the Revolution for his heroic devotion to political justice; for his magnificent labors in behalf of civil and religious liberty. Paine declares in his will his belief in one God and in doing good to his fellow-men. This is sound Jewish doctrin. This, in fact, is the eternal truth of Judaism. Every intelligent Jew has read "The Age of Reason." There are many things in it to which the Jew can subscribe, but there are also many things in it which the Jew knows to be errors. But the Jew does not liv who does not believe and think that Thomas Paine had the perfect and absolute right to express and publish his honest conviction on religious and all other subjects. Is this the doctrin of mental liberty? If so, it is sound Jewish doctrin, and it is the very foundation-stone of American institutions, and they are sacred in Jewish sight.

Again, will the Investigator name any organization, any rabbinical authority, or any individual rabbi who dares to hold the lash of mental despotism over the Jewish mind? Will our contemporary please note that our rabbis are simply teachers of the law, and as they are good, noble, and charitable they are revered and honored; otherwise not. The rabbi can giv no absolution for wrong or sin; can grant no passports to purgatory, paradise, or heaven. And in that solemn hour when the Jew is upon his death-bed he bends and quails not before man, recognizes no priest (as the Investigator might term a rabbi), but looking into and within the eternal, goes out from human sight like a man.

The Jewish Times has honestly, openly, and boldly advocated universal mental liberty; it has proclaimed the grand doctrin that the Jew is a Freethinker, for had he been a slave-thinker he would hav been absorbed into an ecclesiastical despotism, worshiping a trinity and blindly obeying an "infallible" earthly power. The Jew is not made of that material, and if he were, there would be no Judaism on the face of the earth to-day.

Finally, we should like to see any organized authority or any individual influence in Judaism that would dare to lay its hands upon the humblest Jew and crush out his inherent and inalienable right to exercise mental liberty. No, friend Seaver, there is no such thing as mental despotism in Judaism.

A Great Scriptural Difficulty.—Old Things Revived.

The Bible is thought to endure no little under the questions raised by the new translation. But all that is as nothing compared with a question sprung not long after the Reformation, and bittely disputed till as late as the year 1700. Our skeptics hav let it sink out of view, to the delight of the priesthood. It was stated by a learned rabbi and others, among whom were Grotius, Capellus, and Scaliger, that "the shapes of the points, accents, and vowels in the Hebrew scriptures were invented by the learned Jews of a place called Tiberias, as late as A.D. 500."

There the subject rested for a long time. As there were no skeptics to refute, it did not matter. After half a century, the question became important in the controversies between Rome and the Reformers. "You hav no infallible judge of controversies," said Rome. "We need none but our Bible," said Reform. "Ha! ha! ha!" laughed Rome; "your Bible! You mean the Infidel Jews of Tiberias. What is your Bible without the points, accents, and vowels? You know that it is nothing—a mere nose of wax, without them, and means anything or nothing. They, you know, made them; therefore, when you appeal to your Bible, you really appeal to the Jews of Tiberas."

Here was a dreadful accusation. Made to-day, it amounts to little, because there are so few men really learned in the languages among theologians. Made then, when all who discussed and read it were posted, instead of that universal shallowness there was either dense ignorance or profound learning, it produced a terrible sensation. That the Tiberian Jews had invented the shapes, etc., no one had thought of doubting. What then did the retort mean? To understand it requires a slight inquiry into the constitution of the Hebrew.

The retort, if true, showed them they really had no Bible, but merely an invention of some cunning Jews.

Was the Hebrew ever a spoken language? It is not at all likely. It seems to hav originated among a priesthood and been employed solely for preserving their mysteries. Philo says, "The laws (meaning thereby the Septuagint translation) were originally written in the Chaldee language, and for a long time preserved in that language alone, until their reputation for excellence caused their translation into other tongues." (See vol. iii, p. 79, of his works. Bohn edition.) Philo was a priest and the foremost man of all the Jews in the world in his day, and especially remarkable for his learning in scriptures as in other matters.

Josephus, speaking of the translation of the laws by the seventy 270 B.C., says the book of law was sent by Eleazar the high priest, from Jerusalem to Ptolemy the king, with directions to carefully return it when the translation was completed. So much care was taken about this book it is plain there was but one. Philo says that this was in Chaldee. He also states what is undeniable, that Abraham, the founder of the Jewish race, was a Chaldean.

What language, then, did Moses use? We know the Hebrews went down as seventy persons, and remained in Egypt two hundred and seventeen years, much of the time as slaves. Very little, if any, trait of their language was left when they came out. Moses had been educated as an Egyptian, and Egyptian was his tongue, as it was of all the other Hebrews. That language was Semitic, and one of Chaldee dialects.

Now, as to the Bible, we must bear in mind it was a growth. The first and only scriptures had by the Israelites were the Ten Commandments, graven on stone. Later some few ordinances were added by Moses, and doubtless also marked on stone. That Moses wrote any book no intelligent man who reads the Pentateuch will claim. When the Almighty wrote on stones, and Moses later put his ordinances on stone, it is too much to contend that even one of Moses's books was written on parchment or papyrus. That art had not, in Moses's day, been learned by the Egyptians from the still older civilizations of Arabia and India. Moreover, there are numberless allusions and accidental remarks in Moses's books showing that some person compiled them near the date of the captivity. Much had, no doubt, been kept as tradition, just as Homer was kept. It was kept and recited as Moses's laws, ordinances, psalms, prayers, etc. How such an idea as that Moses wrote them and delivered them to the Jews originated is inconceivable to any one who reads them.

Let any soldier read about the march of these million people, with their cattle, their crossing the Red Sea, and resting under the seventy palm-trees, after drinking out of the twelve wells; their encampment, the duties of the three priests, when so many thousand daily sacrifices were required, and he will say no man who ever saw a regiment in motion could hav made such blunders. There are a thousand expressions used in the books that were impossible to Moses, as "shekel of sanctuary," before any sanctuary or shekel was; "Gilgal," whereas Joshua first named it so after Moses's death; "Gilead to Dan;" "Before there reigned any king over Israel;" "he, now called prophet, was beforetime seer," says Samuel, yet prophet is the word used in the Pentateuch; monuments are spoken of as remaining to this day; Moses's death and burial, etc., etc. These remarks apply to Joshua, Samuel, and Judges, also. Learned theologians, without exception, admit that some later writer first compiled the works in book form. When was this done? Here, as ever, the Bible is our best authority. We are told in Kings that until Josiah's day no book was known. A book of the law was then found in the temple. It seemed to surprise the high priest as well as the king. It is certain that this book was no more than the Ten Commandments, and some ordinances of Moses. Whoever reads will see that there is a constant strife and jealousy between the priests of the Jews and those of the other tribes and petty states around them for supremacy.

Until about the time of Josiah, there was no more literature among the Jews and their neighbors than there was in England before King Alfred's day. The Old Testament is about all the literature the Jews ever had up to Ezra's time, or 500 B.C. It had evidently been compiled within his time. Literature had slowly dawned upon that race. The "Book of the Wars of the Lord," written ages after Moses's day, referred to in Deut. xxi, 14, and quoted there, is a very good indication of the date of the first compilation of the Pentateuch. Late as Jeremiah wrote, it is evident there was no Pentateuch, as we hav it, with its endless directions about burnt-offerings, seeing he declares God did not speak to the Hebrews of the Exodus about such things, but only said, "Obey me" (Jer. vii, 22).

He who is familiar with the most striking and sublime chapters of some of the prophets—Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel—will be struck occasionally, in reading the Pentateuch, at some passages precisely in the best vein of those prophets—thus, Balaam's prophecy is one instance. Daniel's, it is admitted, was mostly in Chaldaic. Philo, surely, is a great authority, and he says it was all in Chaldee. But illiterate tribes, living isolated, soon get a dialect of their language peculiar to themselvs. The Hebrew, if ever spoken, is a dialect of the Chaldee, adopted by the priests and retained by them long after it was lost to the people. Repeating Her Old Tricks.

The death of Charles Darwin, and his burial in Westminster Abbey among the so-called great and wise men, hav caused the church to begin thus early to set up her claims to the honored dead. It is characteristic of her. When she has fought every idea of progress as hard and persistently as she can, and yet sees it lifted by public opinion to the plain of an established truth demonstrated by indisputable fact, she turns around and says she knew it all the time and has been helping it along. But a few years ago a minister in church council said, "Darwinism is Atheism." Now the Independent says he would be a bold man who should say that. This means that now, the doctrins taught by Darwin having stood the test of time and criticism, and being generally accepted by scientists, the church must claim them as her own.

Darwinism, being an attempt to explain the law of evolution, is a part of it, and if evolution is at variance with Genesis then must Darwinism be also. Genesis says that man was made in the image of God, and Christianity says we are the descendants of Adam, who was that image. The theory of evolution is that man has ascended from lower forms of life as the result of an immense series of changes. Darwin himself says that "man is descended from a hairy quadruped, furnished with a tail and pointed ears, probably arboreal in its habits, and an inhabitant of the Old World." Genesis says the earth was created about six thousand years ago; science shows that millions of years hav elapsed since the world was young. Genesis says that all things, vegetable as well as animal, were created by a fiat of God. Darwin's theory is that the different species came by natural selection, that nature uses to produce variety much the same means that man does in crossing cattle. The change that vegetation and animal life are undergoing is constant. As Prof. Huxley put it in his New York lecture: "The great service which has been rendered by Mr. Darwin to the doctrin of evolution in general is this, that he has shown that there are two great factors in the process of evolution. One of them is a tendency to vary, the existence of which may be proved by observation in all living forms; and the other is the influence of surrounding conditions upon what I may call the parent form, and the variations which are thus evolved from it. The production of variations is a matter not at all properly understood at present. Whether it depends upon some intrinsic machinery, if I may use the phrase, of the animal form itself, or whether it arose from the influence of conditions upon that form, is not certainly a matter for our present purpose; but the important point is that, granting the tendency to the production of variations, then whether those variations shall survive and supplant the parent, or whether the parent shall survive or supplant the variations, is a matter which depends entirely upon surrounding conditions. If the surrounding conditions are such that the parent form is more competent to battle with them and to flourish with them than the derived form, then in the struggle for existence the parent form will maintain itself, and the derived form will be extirpated. But if, on the contrary, the conditions are such as to be more favorable to the derived form than the parent form, the parent form will be extirpated and the derived form will take its place. In the first case there will be no progress, no material advance of type through any imaginable series of ages; in the second case there will be modification; there will be a change of form. Thus we see that Mr. Darwin's view of the matter puts us in such a position that the existence of these precedent types of life is no obstacle in the way of the theory of evolution at all. In fact, the rightly considered theory of evolution requires that such forms should be communicated. These scorpions to which I was referring just now. No doubt, since the carboniferous epoch, conditions have existed such as existed then, in which scorpions flourished, in which they find themselvs better off, more competent to deal with the difficuties of their way than any kind of variation from the scorpion type, and for that reason the scorpion has existed and has not been supplanted by any other form, and there is no reason in the nature of things as long as this world exists—if there should be conditions more favorable for scorpions than for any of the variations which arose from them—there is no sort of reason why this form should not exist as long as the universe itself exists."

These theories of Darwin and Huxley are in direct contravention of scripture. The writer of the Pentateuch knew nothing of the law of selection, of variation, of survival of the fittest. The attempts now being made in the interests of the church to reconcile the Bible with any scientific theory are utterly futil and abortiv. Huxley says that it is absolutely impossible to effect any kind of community, any kind of parallel, far less any sort of reconciliation between the two. And in his New York lecture he used this sarcastic language:

"In the first place, it is not my business to say what the Hebrew text contains, and what it does not; and in the second place, were I to say that this was the biblical hypothesis (creation in six literal days), I should be met by the authority of many eminent scholars, to say nothing of men of science, who in recent times hav absolutely denied that this doctrin is to be found in Genesis at all. If we are to listen to them, we must believe that what seems so clearly defined as days of creation—as if very great pains had been taken that there should be no mistake—that these are not days at all, but periods that we may make just as long as convenience requires. We are also to understand that it is consistent with that phraseology to believe that plants and animals may hav been evolved by natural processes, lasting for millions of years, out of similar rudiments. A person who is not a Hebrew scholar can only stand by and admire the marvelous flexibility of a language which admits of such diverse interpretations. Assuredly, in the face of such contradictory authority upon matters upon which one is competent to form no judgment, he will abstain from any opinion, as I do; and in the third place, I hav carefully abstained from speaking of this as a Mosaic doctrin, because we are now assured upon the authority of the highest critics, and even of dignitaries in the church, that there is no evidence whatever that Moses ever wrote this chapter, or knew anything about it."

To quote as supporting Christianity what was and is now by strict orthodox people denounced as Atheism is the very hight of absurdity and duplicity. Darwinism is anti-ecclesiastical and un-biblical. It is inconsistent with the traditions of creation and the fall, founded upon the acceptance of the Mosaic narrativ as an infallibly accurate historical and scientific record. No man has done more to undermine the doctrin of verbal inspiration, and of the scientific and historic infallibility of the Old Testament records. Darwin's researches and conclusions, "whether contained in his own works or taken up and applied by his followers to every class of facts and phenomena in the social and political world, as well as the material, hav been chiefly instrumental in bringing about the spread of Agnosticism."

Darwin, of course, was not the originator of the theory of evolution, but his works hav given the strongest possible support to the theory. The "Origin of Species" has been the subject of innumerable pamphlets and books by theologians who hav tried to refute it. They hav warred against it to the best of their ability, and now to turn around and claim its author as a believer in and supporter of the biblical account shows a "marvelous flexibility" of ideas to be found nowhere but in theology. It is a moral somersault impossible to honest men.

Speaking of Darwin's death, the Banner of Light says: "Darwin's boldest stroke was his attack upon the infallibility of the scripture account of the creation. In this he found an able co-worker in Theodore Parker, who in this country presented from the pulpit what Darwin threw from the study of the scientist in Europe as a bombshell of truth into the camp of the theologians. The two were, in fact, the pioneers in directing the public to a rational consideration of the subject, and in convincing the people that they had a right to think and judge for themselvs upon this as upon all other matters. As might be expected in such an event, an excitement ensued. The clergy became indignant, and they, as their predecessors had done for centuries, opposed every indication of the advance of the people toward freedom of thought by ridicule and anathema. Despite these, however, Darwin lived to witness, even among churchmen themselvs, an acquiescence in the views he advocated. He subsequently gave to the world other works, for the most part upon subjects correlativ with the two we hav named, and in support or explanation of points not given in his mind sufficiently clear therein. He has finished in a form visible to mortal eyes his labors on earth; but the present and future generations of men hav and will hav, in their enjoyment of freedom of thought and an assurance of eternal progression, reason to be thankful that Charles Darwin once lived in this world."

The foundation of evolution was laid before Darwin began his labors, but he laid many a brick in its solid wall. To him naturalists owe more that to any other man. To him Huxley and Haeckel are indeed deeply indebted. They hav gone beyond him, but his labor was indispensable to their success, and he performed it in a manner that must ever command the gratitude of the world. After fighting him and his doctrins all his life, the church cannot now claim the credit of his discoveries as her own.

Ralph Waldo Emerson.

The death of Ralph Waldo Emerson, which occurred on the 27th ultimo, removes still another from the ranks of poetry, philosophy, and science, recently thinned by the loss of Longfellow, Darwin, and Zöllner, and not long ago by the deaths of Channing, Bryant, and Carlyle. Mr. Emerson's death was not unexpected, as he had for some years suffered from a mental disability known as aphasia—a condition in which the brain of the sufferer loses control of the organs of speech, and the latter are subject to a wandering exercise, inarticulate and desultory.

A descendant of a line of clergymen in eight successiv generations, it was natural that Mr. Emerson should hav taken the pulpit; and, a man of reflection, of education, of honor, and of progressiv ideas, it was equally natural that he should hav resigned from it within three years after his ordination. In his younger days he won numerous prizes as essayist, poet, and orator, but he never was what in a narrow and technical sense is termed a scholar. The first literary effort which gained him distinction was a pamphlet, published in 1836, entitled "Nature," a book that took twelve years to gain a circulation of five hundred copies. This work marked a new era in American thought. It was attacked with sharp criticism by conservativ thinkers, and hailed with applause by the religiously free. The works which followed "Nature," particularly "Method of Nature" and "Literary Ethics," began the intellectual movement which its enemies stigmatized as "Transcendentalism," and for which its advocates hav never had any definit and generally accepted name. This movement is thought to include Free Religion, Ethical Culture, Metaphysics, Intuition, Academic Philosophy, Self-Culture, and other more or less prominent phases of modern thought and speculation. The author was a teacher in the Concord School of Philosophy and a vice-president of the Free Religious Association.

Mr. Emerson also identified himself with the anti-slavery agitation, and although somewhat averse to public speaking, addressed several meetings of Abolitionists. With his wife, Lydia Jackson, he signed the call for the first National Woman Suffrage Convention. He was an overseer of Harvard University, and received from that institution the degree of doctor of laws. He was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, of the American Philosophical Society, and of the Massachusetts Historical Society. He was not a Christian, yet his exact religious standing would be hard to define. "He took the position," says T. W. Higginson, "once for all: 'The assumption that the age of inspiration is past, that the Bible is closed, the fear of degrading the character of Jesus by representing him as a man, indicate with sufficient clearness the falsehood of our theology.'" But he declared his belief that "there is a sublime and friendly Destiny by which the human race is guided." He wrote grand poetry, and yet acknowledged that as a poet he was a settled failure. Though he numbered scientific men like Prof. Tyndall among his warmest admirers, he lacked the system of the scientist. His writings are more talked of than read by the general public, and perhaps more read than understood. He went farther in sociology than Herbert Spencer. As a poet he at times rivaled Longfellow in majesty of thought and quality of rhythm. With Goethe a prophet of self-culture, he did not hold himself aloof, but mingled with the public in the agitations of his working day. He made a revolution in religious thought, as Darwin did in the domain of natural science. He traveled all the avenues of learning and taught as he went. The Positivist quotes him as a pure humanitarian; the lower order of social reformers can adduce phrases from his writings supporting their theory of "giving all to love." The great body of Freethinkers will point to him as one of the most eminent of men, who was at the same time an apostle in their own cause. Orthodoxy found in him less an implacable enemy than an indifferent friend. He doubtless died without having made an enemy by the advocacy of any set of religious views, while his contributions to the literature of human liberty hav made him friends the world over.

The grateful tributes of Freethought to the memory of this great man may be drowned in the pretentious laudations of hypocrisy, but as time goes on and the teachings of Emerson bear their legitimate fruit, we shall find that in the end they make for righteousness rather than for religion.

Round the World.

The first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" has now been mailed to the subscribers to the fund. We are glad to announce that the first edition has more than been subscribed for, and that we hav already had to issue a second. Since the list of names was first stereotyped we hav received many new ones. All wished to be enrolled, but being too late for the first edition, to accommodate them and many others we hav concluded to put them in the second edition of the first volume, and also open a list of subscribers to appear in the second volume, which will probably be completed in another month. This will giv all an opportunity who may wish it, and also aid in paying expenses. The volumes will be sold separately for $2 per volume, and the three for $5 if taken before the volumes are completed. We would very much like a larger list to greet the traveler with on his return home. The books will be very cheap at $5—much cheaper than any other publisher would get them out.

The additional volume of course increases the expense of publishing by a third, and we need many more names, with the "V's," to meet the cost.

The following persons hav paid five dollars each (except where otherwise specified) to help take THE TRUTH SEEKER editor round the world, and their names will appear in the dedication of the second edition of Vol. I., which is already printed and in the hands of the binder:

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I hav been here in this great metropolitan city for ten days, and intended to hav kept you posted as to all I saw, felt, and experienced. But though woman proposes, yet the fates dispose, and the powers that be so arranged it that I took a heavy cold and had a bilious attack which kept me in bed five days. I'v had the best of care and kindness and weathered it through as comfortably as possible, and am now once more ready to see the sights.

I hav seen the holy place from whence comes our precious TRUTH SEEKER, and where presides Mr. Macdonald as its head and guiding star. I saw dear Mrs. Bennett too, the quiet little wife of our absent hero. Her cosy, cheery little room looked very pleasant and home-like, though one could but long for the presence of the absent truth seeker himself to make the picture complete. I'v attended the Liberal Club there at Science Hall, and seen Stephen Pearl Andrews and other notables and heard them talk. I'v been to Barnum's and seen the mighty mountain of meat, old Jumbo, and to convey a little idea of his immense size in comparison with that of common elephants, I will say that as I passed on after seeing him to go and look at the baby elephant I really took the mother of the baby for the baby itself, so small did she look in contrast with Jumbo. We saw the fat woman, the Chinese giant and his wife, the wonderful tattooed lady, and all sorts of curiosities, and some of the wonderful circus performances and shows, all of which were sights to be remembered for a lifetime. I went to Madison Square and had a pleasant interview with Train, who greeted me with a cordial smile, and even talked some through the mediumship of a little girl, and wrote some scraps of conversation in his note-book. And last, but not least, I got to hear the great orator Ingersoll on Sunday, April 23d, he kindly sending me four free tickets for myself and friends. It was a treat, indeed, to hear him speak the gems of eloquence that I had so often admired on paper; to hear them fresh from his lips and see the great crowds on all sides of him cheer him so enthusiastically and earnestly. It seems to me that speech was the grandest thing I ever heard, and it seemed to thrill the whole of that immense audience as with a single soul. I firmly believe had a vote been taken on the spot for him as president of the United States he would hav received nearly every vote in the hall. One such tribute of applause as he won that afternoon is well worth years of labor and toil. May he continue to go onward and upward and be a light and a guiding star that shall lead the world to truth, to love, and real happiness.

New York, N. Y., April 30th. ELMINA.

Science Baffled and Man Baffled.

I do not wish to have a controversy with my friend A. Allen Noe on the question of Spiritualism, but rather a conference, for I hav an idea that in the main we agree. He seems to think that in the domain of immortality science is baffled; then I say that man himself is baffled, for science is our only method of arriving at truth. There may be truth beyond science, but only so far as science reveals the truth can it be truth to us; and if science cannot reveal immortality, then is immortality no truth for us.

My brother Noe is very much mistaken if he thinks I do not understand the philosophy of Spiritualism. I acknowledge that the thinking class of Spiritualists are essentially Materialistic; that is, they believe that here and hereafter the mental life must hav a physical basis. They revolt as much as I do against the old-fashioned, orthodox idea of a "disembodied spirit," for such a spirit is absolutely inconceivable. We can only conceive of spirit as working in an organized body. In this respect there is a profound agreement between the philosophic Spiritualist and the philosophic Materialist. This agreement I hav always recognized.

What I deny as proved is the existence of this subtler physical body in which our spirit shall locate after it has left this body. This is a very beautiful idea, and may be true, but it has not been demonstrated. The proof is lacking, although I admit there is some evidence, but not enough to make a scientific certainty. It is a matter of faith, not of knowledge.

My friend asks me to prove that there is not such a spiritual body. I frankly admit that I cannot do this. It is impossible to prove a negativ. This is one of the first principles of logic, and of all evidence. No one is bound to prove a negativ. If a man accuses me of stealing a horse, I am not obliged to prove that I didn't steal it; I am presumed to be innocent until I am proved to be guilty. Millions of innocent men could be convicted if they were always bound to prove that they are not guilty. It is the affirmativ, every time, that must be demonstrated.

If one asserts that there are men who wear their heads beneath their shoulders, I cannot prove that there are no such men. The burden of proof rests with the man who makes the assertion, not with me, who denies it.

So with the Spiritualist; I cannot prove that he is wrong, it is for him to prove that he is right; and, until he does so, I am justified in refusing to believe anything in regard to the matter. So far, there has not been sufficient evidence to show that there is a spiritual body, and, therefore, I hav the best of reasons for rejecting the theory, namely, the lack of proof. We are not to believe anything without proof, are we, brother Noe? I am not bound to prove that the Bible isn't inspired, or that the pope isn't infallible. It is the business of those who assert the truth of these things to produce proof. I can't prove that there isn't a spiritual world, but by all the rights of the human intellect I refuse to believe that there is one until I hav evidence enough to convince my mind that there is one. Do you go back on this, brother Noe?

Perhaps I might hav put my thought into better words, and hav said a little differently, thus, "I do not think that any well-disciplined mind cares to believe in immortality;" but let me explain, and then I guess brother Noe will allow my sanity.

I distinguish between desire and belief. They are different states of mind. Belief is the result of evidence, but desire comes from the human heart, and on the faintest evidence becomes winged hope. Now the desire and the hope of immortality are universal and are beautiful and noble. I confess to this mighty desire. I do not wish to surrender this individual being. I wish to meet with loved ones again in some immortal sphere; but while I so deeply desire I cannot believe. Why? Because I hav not evidence; I must be true to my intellect no matter what my heart demands. I desire wealth, but I do not hav any belief in the matter. I hav very little evidence that I shall ever be rich, and therefore I throw any credo about it to the winds. Even so must I act on the question of immortality; having no evidence, I can hav no belief.

What do I mean by well-disciplined. I do not mean a cultivated mind, or a loving mind, or a soaring mind; all these can believe in immortality; but by well-disciplined I mean a mind subject to the facts of nature and willing to take what nature givs, and not fret and worry about the beyond and above. I hav made up my mind to take nature as it is; and nature so far has not revealed immortality, though she is full of wonders—wonders equal even to the wonder of immortality—and so immortality is forever a possibility and an endless hope. There may be immortality, but if there is, our wise Mother Nature has concluded not to tell us of it. If it is a truth she keeps it in her innermost breast; I shall not tease her about it; I shall not fret and worry over her reserve. She is beautiful enough and bountiful enough without that jewel, and if she decides to keep it hidden in unknown deeps, I submit to her infinit wisdom and put myself into obedience to the present day and all its glory. Sufficient unto the day is the joy thereof as well as the sorrow. What we hav now is enough to inspire our manhood to its sublimest exercise, and what we shall hav to-morrow will be equally brilliant and noble.

This is what I mean, and I guess brother Noe won't think it is so very bad; and as we agree on the main points, namely, that there is no "God" in the old sense of the term as an infinit personality, and also that all mental and spiritual life must find its home in some sort of a physical organization more or less fine, I am sure that we won't quarrel much about the other things. It is a matter of evidence, and when the evidence comes we shall think alike. I am glad that brother Noe's criticism has enabled me to make fuller explanations on this all-important subject. London "Freethinker" Profane Jokes.

AN old minister, a clergyman of the church of Scotland, well known for his eccentricity and wit, was taking a walk one day in the outskirts of the town, when a couple of young lads descried the minister, and thought they would hav some fun with him. The ran up to him and shouted: "Eh, meenister, the deil is dead!" The old man stopped, turned round to the lads, and looking pitifully at them, said in a sorrowful voice: "Ah, then, I'll just gang awa' hame, and I'll down on my knees, and pray for twa faitherless bairns!"

A WELSH minister, after an evening with a jovial friend, returned home rather tired and less under the influence of the holy spirit than that of his entertainer. Instead of his usual lengthy prayer, he aggreeably surprised his family by contenting himself with the following: "Got pless us, Got shave us, Got shent us a good night's rest! Few worts is pest. Goot-night, Got Almighty, goot-night!"

THE DEVIL IS IN IT.—A clergyman of "indefinable" character, going to say prayers, had great difficulty in putting on his surplice. "I think," said he to the clerk, "the devil is in the surplice." The astonished clerk stared till he got it on, and then exclaimed, "I think he is, sir!"

A WOULD-BE prophet declared that "he was sent to redeem the world and all things." Whereupon one of his audience sent up his little bill with the remark: "Perhaps you'll kindly redeem that."

"WHAT did the Puritans come to this country for?" asked a Massachusetts teacher of his class. "To worship in their own way, and make other people do the same," was the reply.

PARSON, to boys playing on Sunday: "Boys, do you know what day this is?" "Heigho, Billy, here's a lark! Here's a cove as has been out all night, and don't know what day it is."

SOME good people hav a custom of teaching their children to think of a text as they drop their pieces of money into the contribution box. A little girl up at High Bridge recently saw the box approaching and began to search in her memory for a text. She hesitated for a few moments, dropped the dime in the box, and exclaimed triumphantly: "A fool and his money are soon parted."

Christianity.

From the Boston Herald.

At last a Christian divine has come to the rescue of the "Christian religion" in the North American Review, and occupies fifty pages. He is a scholar and a gentleman, and stands high, if not at the top of New England othodoxy. What he says is richly worthy of study. Every Freethinker will thank him for saying it. He is simply a Fisher of men, and does not attack Ingersoll, as Jeremiah, the "policeman," did with his club. Indeed, this Christian gentleman says, at the outset, that he is not ambitious to be a malleus hæreticorum. He is not going to maul heretics—not even Atheists. This is good, and shows how Christianity has progressed. It used to burn them.

Prof. George P. Fisher, in the first of his fifty pages, expresses the opinion that the heretics are straw that has been "already well threshed," and further controversy is needless. Then he goes on to say: "In truth, it is remarkable to notice how many of these objections were made by Celsus, as early as the close of the second century—for example, the objection from the alleged discrepancies in the gospels—and were successfully disposed of by Origen, the great Christian scholar of that day."

To the Atheistic or Materialistic scholar of this day, three or four remarks suggest themselves. First, granting that Origen successfully disposed of such objections as he quoted, since the work of Celsus has perished, we cannot be sure he disposed of all. Second, the habit of the church militant of burning all heretical books leads us to suspect that the early Christians destroyed Celsus's manuscripts because they were not quite satisfied with Origen's answer. Third, Origen himself was regarded as heretical, because he did not believe St. Mark (xvi, 15), the very foundation of orthodox Christianity, in all the subsequent ages, down to that of the distinguished Yale professor himself, and this is, perhaps, the reason why Origen never had "St." prefixed to his name. Fourth, if all Christian gentlemen were to act as Origen did in qualifying himself for the Christian ministry (see Matthew xix, 12), Christianity would soon cease to be hereditary, if it did not cease altogether.

In his fifty pages, Prof. Fisher gives away his whole cause by making divine revelation exceedingly gradual, by making, in fact, God as well as man, Darwinian. He divides his argument into nine heads. Under his fourth head, he asks, "What is Christianity?" and answers his own question by saying, "It is composed of facts and doctrins." His facts, as he goes on to propound them, are first, the imperfections, animosities, and unhappiness of men and women—which are undeniable; and second, alleged miracles or supernatural occurrences, of which human literature, whether we call it sacred or profame, is full. These miracles are questionable. Indeed, the professor himself repudiates the greater part of them. The tests by which he distinguishes the genuin miracles from the spurious or imaginary do not seem to be, like chemical tests, effectiv and reliable. But, suppose they were perfectly satisfactory; supposing his miraculous or supernatural facts were not manufactured to support the "doctrins" which he propounds under his eighth head—it is still an open question whether the doctrins hav had any influence in promoting or ameliorating that deplorable class of natural facts which are admitted on all hands to be real and genuin. It is quite unnecessary to notice more than one of the specially revealed facts, which the professor assumes; to wit, that the first created man fell from an estate of holiness and immortal health by eating a forbidden fruit, which is said to hav had the natural and inevitable effect of making the eater know the difference between good and evil, and thus brought death into the world. The professor had only to step into the geological cabinet of Yale College to see satisfactory evidence that this fundamental fact was the work of sheer imagination. He seems to hav confined himself to the theological cabinet of that venerable institution. Observation and science hav at last revealed the fact that man, instead of falling from a perfect state of holiness or innocence at the modern date assigned to Adam and Eve, had existed for æons, ages on ages, before, and been gradually rising from the pristin mud. Prof. Fisher admits that, since Adam and Eve, by their reckless ambition to know what the gods knew, fell to a miserably low condition, both morally and physically, the race has been gradually rising to its present position under the Christian and the "wild growing religions." He attributes this rising since the fall of Adam to the gradual divine revelation. To what does he attribute the rising before that epoch?

The professor's grand fundamental assumption—for at the close he expressly disclaims any attempt to prove it—is delayed into his eighth head. There he says:

"We leave the gospel history to glance at Christianity on the doctrinal side. [Observe, it is bad grammar to begin gospel or Christianity without capital letters.] Christianity is the religion of redemption. It rests on the presupposition of Theism, and stands or falls with it. The being [personally (?)] of God being acknowledged, the one postulate of Christianity is the doctrin of sin.

Now, Prof. Fisher, if he will be candid, must admit that no Atheist or Materialist, so called, has denied the being of a something which, by a figure of speech, may be called God. What has been denied by the acutest minds of whom we hav any knowledge is that, in that being, there is any personality, or any conceivable analogy to any human person. They never did and never will deny their own consciousness, nor that there exists distinct from it, pervading every atom of matter outside of it, a principle of life—mysterious, unfathomable life—they only deny that this existence of life touches the individual on the moral side. There is in every individual, sentient or thinking, a physical partnership whith a universal something which throbs in every artery and tingles in every excited nerve. But to say that this something, as a personal or individual will, by authority, advice, or suggestion, makes itself a partner in the moral conduct of individual life, is contradicted by the observed facts of all ages. God, if we are to call the something so, has thus far been a silent partner in this matter. If that impersonal being imposes any moral rule or lesson upon individual minds, nothing like unity of purpose or suggestion can be attributed to him, for individual minds widely differ, and no two think alike. All think according to their infinitly varying circumstances and surroundings. God, whatever his being may be, has not been the same for different races, nor for different ages. Prof. Fisher's article really amounts to nothing less than a confession of this.

But suppose we take the Christian definition of God, "as a being without body, parts, or passions; of infinit power, wisdom and goodness—three persons of one substance." Our theologian may then well say, "The one postulate of Christianity is the doctrin of sin." No rational mind can possibly grant that postulate, so far as sin against God, as thus defined, is concerned. Sin, of course, there may be against a finite person, whether superior or inferior. Such persons may hav a moral as well as physical relation to each other. But the finite cannot even conceive of the infinit, and an infinit being "without body, parts, or passions, with infinit power and wisdom," is, by the very terms, incapable of suffering or injury. He cannot be sinned against.

So, if the postulate of sin be granted, sin can mean nothing but a violation or disregard of certain abstract principles, defining the utilities or happiness of sentient beings, principles to which God himself must be subject, if he existed as a person, and to which he necessarily is subject, whether he exists as a person or not.

Probably, as to practical effectivness, Prof. Fisher's fifty pages may be reduced to this one sentence of his, the substance of which has been uttered millions of times:

"One should look at the state of things which would ensue if religion and the Christian religion were swept away, and men were left to be born, and toil, and liv, and die, 'having no hope and without God in the world.'"

If, instead of the scripture text which he quotes, Prof. Fisher had closed with these words, "Basing their hopes on what is knowable, instead of what is not," his problem would be more fairly stated. The real question is, whether the safety of society depends on suppressing what little truth we know, and preaching as truth what we only imagin to be so.

The human race, being naturally gregarious, has always, in proportion to the development of the mental faculties, recognized as moral law the principles of reciprocity, justice, and fraternity. But, unhappily, the mental faculties always hav been, and probably always will be, unequally developed, they are so dependent on material organization, which admits of almost infinit variety. With the natural love of power, this lays the foundation of that mental and physical tyranny which has hitherto been exercised through the theology of all religions—the Christian being unmistakably the worst.

Prof. Fisher labors pantingly through fifth pages to prove that the race owes to the Christian theology all its civilization, refinement and deliverance from degrading and other brutal vices, as if there were no other elevating force than that, as if the Christian church threw away its thumbscrews, racks, and fagots of its own accord, without any regard to such men as Beccaria or Voltaire. As if Calvin put out the fires of the holy Inquisition. As if Christian believers, and nobody else, ever regarded rightful authority or preferred universal good to narrow self-interest. Can Prof. Fisher point to a single Atheist who ever persecuted a fellow-mortal for his honest belief?

Prof. Fisher remarks that "the gospel was brought into the world in a way to pour contempt on human pride. There is no pomp of any sort attending its advent." The pity is that th is praise is pretty much confined to its advent. Pomp is by no means the worst thing in the world or the church. But that which was kept up for ages by a holy dynasty that wore a pyramid of crowns, as vicegerent of almighty God, and whose present potentate is whining for the loss of his temporal power, has cost mankind a world of ignorance and poverty.

It is particularly cheering to know, from this champion of orthodox Christianity, that it "seeks to mold society according to justice and love. It seeks to infuse into government and legislation the spirit of equitv." I shall begin to believe this when the churches come forward spontaneously and ask the civil authorities to tax their property in houses of worship as other property—mine, for instance—is taxed, and not a moment before. Christianity, in shirking taxes, repudiates the express injunction of its alleged founder, and casts upon him the imputation that his professed humility was only the means of vaulting into supreme power. In saying this I do not undervalue the character of Jesus, so far as I can gather it from the gospels. Neither do I confound the mass of Christians with their creeds. The former are worthy of great respect for their practical virtues in this world, while the latter are simply nuisances—unburied ghosts of ideas—at the very best, they are no better than owls in the daytime. They are monuments of centuries of time wasted on a future world which no God has ever been pleased to reveal to us, and which might hav been profitably employed in making this world better.

I contrast these tolerant, if not genial, utterances of Prof. Fisher of Yale with those of Prof. Phelps of Andover, in the Congregational organ, in which he deplores the growth of modern Spiritualism, and counsels the restoration of respect for that "divine" commandment found in Exodus xxii., 18, not that he would burn or hang the Spiritualists as witches—for that might cost our forests more for fagots and gibbets than the railroads do for ties—but he would restore a holy horror of any intercourse with another world through any other medium than a professional and duly consecrated priesthood. I can hardly account for the difference between these two Christian professors, except by the absence of a well-stored geological cabinet at Andover. I would most respectfully call the attention of the faculty of that seminary to the fact that geology is fast undermining theology. Would it not be well, in order to keep the latter pure and simple, to admit no candidates for the ministry who hav been corrupted by it? And, if it will not shock them too much, let me suggest, since the failure of national praying in the late experiment, that public prayers should be much shortened. Jesus, as is well known, discouraged these long addresses to deity in public, and recommended the shortest form, then in general use, to be offered privately. I would also suggest that, if any are disposed to adopt the recommendation of the founder of Christianity, of blessed memory, and find their private devotions too brief, they should add to the Lord's prayer this petition: "O Lord, wilt thou graciously prevent me from unconsciously making a donkey of myself in public? Forever, amen."

Jeffersonian Democracy.

[The following letter is addressed to Hon. C. F. Black, president of the Jefferson Democratic Association.]

I accept with gratitude the honor done me by the Jefferson Democratic Association of York inadding my name to their list of honorary members. I thank you, also, both for the documents accompanying your letter, and for the agreeable manner in which you communicate the action of your association.

For many years I hav wished to see the Democratic party re-created in the spirit of its illustrious founder, and of his worthy colleagues, Madison and Gallatin. I hav, nevertheless, voted with the Republican party from its organization, and I do not doubt that an immense majority of its members and of its leaders are honest and patriotic men.

On every national issue except one (the extension of slavery) the Democratic party seems to me to hav been substantially right; but, in the course of time, that one issue became all-important, so that every other interest had to stand aside until it was settled. Happily, by the union of patriotic men of all parties, that terrible question is forever at rest, and the time seems now ripe for a revival of the simpler and august principles which triumphed in 1800.

Not that we should follow Thomas Jefferson, or any other man, with thoughtless devotion. Jefferson and his colleagues were sufficient for their own day; but no man, and no group of men, can be sufficient for all days. New questions are upon us, new dangers, and new difficulties; and we hav to ask ourselvs, not merely what Jefferson did in his time, but what he would be likely to attempt or advise if he were now present among us.

I think, for one, that he would be a Civil Service reformer, because the spoils system is not democratic. It savors of personal government, which he hated. I think he would be a more positiv and sweeping Free Trader even than he was in his own lifetime; and yet he would probably not desire to precipitate Free Trade, and unsettle in a moment the work of sixty years. He would wish rather to proceed cautiously but unswervingly, having in view the total but not sudden extirpation of the protectiv system.

I think, too, that he would endeavor to remedy an inconvenience from which every president of the United States has suffered; an inconvenience resulting from the inadequate compensation of the higher officers of government. A king can get any man to serve him, because a king can offer to the most valuable man his market price, while a president of the United States, representing the richest employer in the world, has an extremely limited range of choice, because he cannot make it possible for poor men to accept difficult situations without doing violence to their own interests. When President Jefferson asked James Monroe to proceed, upon short notice, to Paris, to negotiate for the purchase of Louisiana, he lamented that he could not offer him just compensation, such as a merchant or a corporation would giv for a private service of corresponding importance. When the negotiation was at an end, by which the United States obtained an acquisition of territory more important to it than any country has ever yet permanently obtained by conquest, Mr. Monroe returned only to render other gratuitous services, and to end fifty years of arduous public life in insolvency and dependence. How different the fate of the negotiator employed by the Emperor Napoleon for the few days' service rendered by him without leaving home! For that single act Napoleon made M. de Marbois a present of nearly forty thousand dollars.

Thomas Jefferson never contemplated a government either of millionaires or poor devils; nor politics controled by bosses assisted by pugilists and bar-keepers. He wished to see at the head of governments the flower of the human race. He wished to see cities governed by men who had proved their capability by having succeeded in business for themselvs. We can tell with certainty what kind of men he would now wish to see in office, whether federal, state, or municipal, by recalling the men chosen by himself when he held the appointing power. Every member of his cabinet was a liberally educated man, and he chose persons of proved ability for employments demanding men of business.

He hated the heredity principle because, as he said, "IT HEAPED IMPORTANCE UPON IDIOTS." The boss system does the same, and hence I am bound to conclude he would hav hated that if he had lived to see it developed.

I wish your society great prosperity and success. Thomas Jefferson bequeathed to us immortal principles; it is our humbler part to create methods for giving those principles effect. The nation has not become corrupt; it has simply grown very large and very rich. We hav to adjust our politics to larger conditions, and apply Jeffersonian principles to the government of a vast and growing empire. In this arduous work I trust your society will bear a part.

Respectfully yours, JAMES PARTON.

Darwin in Westminster Abbey.

From the New York Sun of April 26th.

To-day the author of a book, which twenty years ago was denounced from every English pulpit, will receive the honor of interment where Sir Isaac Newton rests, in the consecrated earth reserved for England's great ones. The earth moves, said Galileo, and perhaps the most impressiv proof of the fact ever exhibited will be offered to men's eyes when the body of Charles Darwin is buried in Westminster Abbey.

There were many names on the Continent, and not a few in England, which carried with them more weight and authority than Darwin's, when, in 1859, the author of the "Origin of Species" propounded a theory which had been repudiated by Buffon, by Cuvier, and the accepted leaders of biological speculation; which ran directly counter to the prepossessions of most contemporary naturalists, and which gave a grievous shock to the traditional opinions, not only of professional theologians, but of all readers of the Bible. The scientist who assumed with Cuvier that each species in the animal and vegetable world was the outcome of a distinct and separate act of creation, and the humble Christian, who believed that man was brought forth at one stroke with all his noble attributes, a little lower than the angels, were equally revolted by a doctrin which announced that the innumerable species, genera, and families of organic beings with which the world is peopled hav all descended from common parents, and are, indeed, the lineal offspring of animals and plants which lived long before the Silurian epoch.

Darwin's hypothesis was mind-shaking and revolutionary, not because it was wholly new, but because it had never been so forcibly presented, and, above all, because the hour was ripe for the promulgation of the truth. There is no doubt that both Lamarck and Treviranus, more than half a century before Darwin and Wallace, had suggested the main thesis of the doctrin of evolution; and it is certain that the theory of natural selection, or survival of the fittest, had been put forth by Wells in 1813, and elaborated by Matthews in 1831. Indeed, there is reason to believe that more than two hundred years before the formulation of the Darwinian hypothesis, Descartes held that the physical world and all things in it originated by a process of evolution, due to the continuous operation of purely physical causes, out of a primitiv, relativly formless matter. But these foregleams of the truth were transient, isolated, steril; and it is indisputable that Darwin was the first to proclaim it with conviction and authority, and to challenge for it the reluctant recognition of the world.

As it was, more than ten years passed before the bitter and unscrupulous opposition encountered by the "Origin of Species," at the hands of scientists no less than of theologians, had given place to a calm and respectful consideration Nor was it until the last ten or twelve years before his death that the solidity and splendor of the author's triumph were unmistakable. Ere he died, however, Darwin knew that his influence was traceable in every field of biological inquiry, that the foremost men of science in every country were avowed champions of his doctrins, or had gradually refrained from disputing them, and that the theory of evolution, to one side of which alone he gave expression, had obtained a firm base of operations from which to essay the conquest of the whole realm of nature. Darwin, for his own part, confined himself to the discussion of the causes which hav brought about the present condition of living matter, assuming it to hav once come into existence. But he lived to see the principles he had accredited applied by Spencer and Haeckel, and a host of younger investigators, to the problem of evolution in its most complex and recondite aspects, philosophical, sociological, and cosmical. In short, there is not to-day a writer on any subject able to command the ear of an intelligent audience—there is not a reader competent to balance evidence and decide for himself—whose fundamental notions touching man's place in nature, his origin and his destiny, hav not been materially affected by the revolutionary movement of which Darwin must be acknowledged to hav been a chief promoter.

After all allowances are made on the score of the circumstances under which Darwin announced his discovery—for although the theologian knew them not, and even the scientist had not yet recognized their import, many kinds of scientific data had been accumulated, which it was impossible to reconcile with the old hypotheses of catastrophic geology and specific creation—the luster and far-reaching consequences of his achievement cannot be exaggerated. If man's greatness should be measured not by the force expended, but by the result attained—not by innate quality of the impelling intellect, but by the range and durability of the impulse imparted—if above the artistic skill which deals with the forms of things soars the scientific insight which reveals the fundamental verities—if it be a work of transcendent difficulty to uplift an epoch-making doctrin from the scorn attaching to a heresy into an almost superstitious veneration—if it be a consummate proof of power to shake religions, found philosophies, and revolutionize man's attitude toward his fellow-man and the rest of the animal creation—then neither Bacon, nor Newton, nor Boyle, nor Harvey, nor any other scientist on England's roll of honor can be placed on the same high plane with the author of the "Origin of Species." Among all the great ones buried in Westminster Abby there is not one so great as he within his special field—we had almost said in any field of labor.

Lee and Paine.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Major-General Charles Lee, second in command to George Washington in the Continental army, and second to none in every point going to make up a military commander, was in his day continually persecuted on account of his outspoken expressions on the subject of Christianity. He was outrageously treated by the followers of Henry VIII. and Calvin, and by one of the most infamous congeries of things called men in the way of a military court, he was suspended. This fact was really the cause of his premature death, which took place Oct. 2, 1782. The undeserved disgrace evidently troubled his mind to the last, if we may judge from an extract taken from his last will and testament. After disposing of all of his effects, he closes his will in the following words: "I desire most earnestly that I may not be buried in any church or church-yard, or within a mile of any Presbyterian or Anabaptist meeting-house, for since I hav resided in this country I hav kept so much bad company when living that I do not choose to continue it when dead. I recommend my soul to the creator of all worlds and of all creatures, who must, from his visible attributes, be indifferent to their modes of worship or creeds, whether Christians, Mohammedans, or Jews; whether instilled by education, or taken up by reflection; whether more or less absurd, as a weak mortal can no more be answerable for his pernicious notion, or even skepticism in religious, than for the color of his skin, and I do appoint the above-named Alexander White and Charles William Thurston executors of this, my last will and testament, and I do revoke all other wills by me heretofore made."

General Lee was known to be a frank, out-spoken skeptic, and a disbeliever in Christianity. And among others, this fact was known to Franklin, as evinced by a letter from him, introducing Thomas Paine, in which he says to General Lee: "The bearer, Mr. Thomas Paine, has requested a line of introduction to you, which I giv the more willingly as I know his sentiments are not very different from yours."

This was just prior to the Declaration of Independence, and none did more to bring about that independence than the great and good men who were then and now stamped as Infidels.

I will giv you another instance of the sound indorsement of Infidelity in those dark days. I quote from Charles Botta's "History of the War of the Independence of the United States," translated by George Alexander Otis, a three-volume edition published in Philadelphia in 1820, as follows: "At this epoch (1776) appeared a writing entitled 'Common Sense.' It was the production of Thomas Paine, born in England, and arrived not long before in America. No writer, perhaps, ever possessed, in a higher degree, the art of moving and guiding the multitude at his will. It may be affirmed, in effect, that this work was one of the most powerful instruments of American independence. The author endeavored, with plausible arguments, to demonstrate that the opposition of parties, the diversity of interests, the arrogance of the British government, and its ardent thirst for vengeance, rendered all reconciliation impossible. On the other hand, he enlarged upon the necessity, utility, and possibility of independence He omitted not to sprinkle his pamphlet with declarations calculated to render monarchy odious to the people, and to inspire them with the desire of a republic. The excellency of the English Constitution had never, till then, been called in question. Paine criticised it very freely in the part which relates to the royal power; but praised its other institutions. He pointed all the calamities which had weighed upon England, notwithstanding the much extolled goodness of its Constitution, especially since the reëstablishment of monarchy; thence he inferred that it contained some essential vice which opposed the happiness of the people, and this lurking defect, he affirmed, was royalty. To this he attributed intestin discords, and the frequency of foreign wars. He congratulated the Americans that he ever had placed it in their power to create a Constitution that should embrace all the excellences of that of England, without any of its defects, and thus again he intimated the exclusion of royalty.

"The success of this writing of Paine cannot be described. The vehemence of opinions redoubled in the minds of all. Even loyalists were seen to declare for liberty; a unanimous cry arose for independence (b. 4, vol. ii, p. 83).

Thus we see that from the most reliable sources comes the honest announcement that Paine was an indescribable power for good. Yet from the pulpit and the preachers we hear him denounced, while the characters that would disgrace the James family, described in that inspired and holy book, are held up to us as worthy of imitation.

MARSHALL O. WAGGONER.

Internal Planetary H at.

The theory that the internal heat of planets is caused by the pressure of gravity was first propounded, so far as I am aware, by Dr. James Milleson of Indianapolis. In 1877 he wrote a series of articles for the Boston Investigator on what he called the "Embryonic Theory." The two main points of his theory were: 1. That planets grow by meteoric accretions; 2. That internal heat is caused by the pressure of gravity. In 1878 he republished his essays in a book of 104 pages, which he sells for one dollar. This book I commend to D. W. Smith, the writer of an article on the subject in the last TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav myself written brief articles on the subject for the New York Sun, some of which THE TRUTH SEEKER has copied. Several abortiv attempts had been made to controvert the theory. The last one was by one Geo. Hendrix, in November, 1881. I looked for his name in the New York Directory, but it wasn't there. But soon afterward he was arrested for defacing the André monument. I am only sorry he didn't blow up the damned thing. W. H. B.

Mr. Dana Corrected.

From the Sun of April 14th.

To the Editor of the Sun, Sir: You ought to be careful about indorsing historical errors. The Hebrew observance of the Passover is not 1,300 years older than the last supper of Jesus. Bishop Colenso has proved that, until the discovery of the "book of the law in the house of the Lord," in the reign of Josiah, 624 B.C., the Jews were gross idolaters, knowing no Sabbath nor Passover, nor other holy days. This is apparent enough from the absence of all notice of those holy days in the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and the earlier portions of Kings and Chronicles.

But, though the Jews knew no passover till about 624 B.C., it was doubtless a very ancient institution among other civilized nations, and probably had its origin in the worship of the sun, moon, and stars.

MR. EDITOR: Wishing to be a helper in the cause of Freethought, and to see the star-list grow, I inclose $8 for the Round-the-World volume as my share in helping that fearless champion of Freethought, D. M. Bennett to meet the expenses of his great work. I desire the volumes bound in morocco, as I believe in the gospel of good books well bound.
Truly yours, MARIUS HEIGHTON.

OGDEN CITY, UTAH, April 18, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: My subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER expired over a month since, but it still comes regularly, for which accept my sincere thanks. I hav been somewhat short financially, and unable to send the wherewith for the continuation of the paper, which I so anxiously look for; hav managed to accumulate a "V," which I forward for the three books—hope I am in time—"A Truth Seeker Around the World." Must ask your forbearance for a while longer for the supscription price of the paper.

W. W. Scholes, of Barnesville, Ohio, is to be pitied for being so weak-minded; it is no fault of his that the psalm-singing and the cooing of the nice young ladies hav made a Christian of him. Let him go where the woodbine twineth and the whangdoodle mourneth for the loss of its first-born. Liberals want no such men in their ranks, but men and women of sterner stuff, those who hav an opinion of their own, and dare to maintain it, let the consequences be what they may. As Davy Crockett said, be sure your right, then go ahead, like a tongue down hill with the sled out. There are a number of Liberals here, but are as sound asleep as the noted seven sleepers, and the orthodox devil and his imps, with Gabriel and his horn, could not rouse them. The trouble is they feel too secure, which is all wrong; it is necessary to hav an organization, and hold meetings once a month, at least. The churches hav their tea-parties, socials, fairs, etc. Let the Liberals, in every town, do the same; charge a small fee, and donate the same to some worthy object; it will promote good fellowship, and be a source of amusement for the young and old as well. A great many fear to act, on account of their business; my friends, it will not hurt your business half so bad to be honest, straightforward, and sincere in your belief, as to cringe to orthodoxy. Uphold your principles, and if you lose by it in the long run, I agree to join a church; yea, the Baptist, and be ducked thrice for the sake or Christ., Selah!

May you liv long to flourish the pen for the good cause of mental freedom, is the wish of
ED. HOFFNER.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., April 22, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: For over thirty years I hav looked upon the old Bible and Testament as the most dangerous, pernicious, and untruthful books ever published on this earth. With those volumes no crime that the human mind could conceive of but is attributed to the character of what is termed God, or the Lord, or the meek and lowly Jesus—a pack of the most silly inconsistencies that can be imagined. Of of the hundreds of thousands of theological sermons preached throughout the world, no two agree in their definit beliefs, while each giv their own opinions, put their own construction on what they assert is the word of God compiled in those two books, which I view as a tissue of lies, fables, obscene, and no better than what, if reports be true, is enacted and uttered in brothels and houses of ill-fame. I am heart and soul opposed to polygamy, but how can the Bible Christian censure the Morman who, with the Christian, takes the Bible as his guide? The latter teaches his offspring in their youth that the Bible is all true, that David and Solomon, the two greatest libertins that ever lived, were the men after God's own heart in wisdom and in power, and yet Christians curse the poor, oppressed, and despised Jew, while they swallow the entire Jewish Bible wholesale, and teach their children that concubinage, murder, theft, robbery, adultery, rape, drunkenness, in fact every crime known to man, was ordered, sanctioned, and approved by the Jewish God.

I repeat, that the inconsistency of the Christian religion is revolting and demoralizing, inasmuch as it teaches the infamous absurdity that no matter how great the crime committed, only pray to Jesus and he will take the murderer into his heavenly abode. No class of idolatry on earth can cope with the Christian idolatry of to-day. Look at the condition of every Christian army that wages war against an other, both professing to be the chosen children of one God; both proclaiming that he is a God of love, charity, peace, good will to his children, impartial and forbearing, etc., while each army has a chaplain, who falls on his knees and prays that his flock, the soldiers, may slaughter all and every one in the other army, and citing the infamous lies of God raining fire from heaven after prolonging the slaughter by Joshua for twelve or fourteen hours. Such infamous lies hav never been put in print in any book on earth. Then to hear it asserted that every advancement in science and improvement is taken from the Bible is ridiculous. If so why should eighteen hundred years hav passed without a railroad, telegraph, steamboats, and millions of other improvements that hav been put into operation, never been brought about, as has been done within the last sixty years, and nine-tenths of all hav been the work of the Freethinker; in fact, but few of our inventiv geniuses believe in the horrible fables of the Bible, from the fact that nature teaches the reflectiv mind that they cannot be true. And as to prayer, no jargon on earth is more nonsensical; no prayer on earth was or ever will be answered except by man or woman; the application of the word he or him makes a personality of what is termed God; hence, if a personality, how is he to distribute his form over the universe into countless millions of churches, temples, halls, sanctuaries, etc. No man ever saw or ever will see a personal God. Such does not exist. But it is laughable to see how Jesus could divide the devil that was in one man so as to put a devil into each poor hog, and yet cross over that little lake and bring seven devils out of Mary Magdalene. Perhaps she had gone slaughtering business, and eaten the pork, and got all of those devils out of the meat that contained that division of devils, as certainly there must hav been a slicing up to a devil in each hog. Poor things, to suffer such misery from the meek and lowly Jesus; it was an inhuman act; but as it is and ever was a horrible lie, the hogs were not tormented any, nor did Mary Magdalene ever hav seven corporeal devils in her.

If not too late, please accept $5 for the Round-the-World books. I hope to see that noble man Bennett.
Yours truly, M. WILLIS.

YATES CITY, April 25, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I feel glad all over to notice there is a movement in progress for the relief of Jeremiah Hacker. A man that has devoted a lifetime to the emancipation and disenthralment of his fellow-man from mental bondage deserves a better fate than the almshouse. He was in the lecture field at a time when it was not popular to say aught in favor of freedom of opinion against the dogmas of the Christian religion. He has traveled thousands of miles on foot, lecturing in schoolhouses, in the open air, or wherever he could gather together hearers to listen to him.

For what did he do this? For gain or self-aggrandizment? No! He wanted human beings to become men and women. He desired they should reason and think, and he was furnishing the food for thought, that they might be enabled to break the shackles that were fettering their minds. Liberals (can I call you such?), are you aware that to such persons as Jeremiah Hacker you owe your freedom of thought and deeds? Do you ever think and consider had it not been for such as he that you would now be compelled, directly or indirectly, to contribute to the support of the church at least tenfold what you now pay for the dissemination of Freethought principles or be ostracized from society? I believe it. We are reaping where he and others sowed. Whilst he trudged wearily on foot from place to place, at times sleeping in sheds or out-buildings, and sometimes without supper at that (as he writes me), we are enjoying the benefits resulting from his privations by an enlarged plane of freedom of thought. He is now past eighty. He has always been true to the Freethought cause. Shall we let him want in his old age? I hav been in correspondence with him for the last eighteen months; hav accidentally or otherwise let something slip into the letter I wrote him that would gladden his heart, no matter how much, but if necessary he will tell you if one in twenty of the professed Liberals of the country will giv him one-quarter as much he will not want for the necessaries of life. I, for one, shall still giv when I hav anything to spare. I hope to hear of many tens rolling in to him. Those that are not able to giv ten make it less. Hoping all may giv, and trusting many will, Yours truly, C. L. ROBERTS.

MR. EDITOR: Miss Maria L. Follett, of Le Claire, has been appointed assistant secretary of the Iowa Liberal League. During my absence from the state please address all correspondence touching League work to this most energetic worker. It is likely the annual state convention this year will take the form of a grove meeting, sometime during August. We hope also to utilize July 4th at several points in the state. If we knew for certain the time of Mr. Bennett's return, we should arrange for one or more meetings along his line of travel across the state, in accordance with friend Kinser's suggestion. May do something of the kind yet. Let our assistant secretary hear from the friends upon this matter. What say you all? E. C. WALKER.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA, April 20, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Having failed to see any notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER from this portion of the "moral vinyard," I will send you a brief report of the Liberal sentiment of this city and vicinity, so far as my knowledge of the same extends. We hav a live, activ, and growing city whose citizens are mostly Liberal, and many of them outspoken and free to express themselvs as such. But as we hav no Liberal League or other organization, few lectures are given, and but few Liberal papers are circulated, consequently most of our Liberals who are in business think it to their advantage to patronize the churches, none of which, except the Catholics, could be sustained if the financial support of the Liberals was withdrawn. Our city is also fully supplied with saloons and houses of prostitution, but as they are supported chiefly by the Christian element, the withdrawal of the patronage of the Liberals would not appreciably affect their prosperity.

I hav been preaching the gospel of universal mental liberty in a sort of "missionary manner" to those of my Christian friends who were not afraid to listen to reason, and much of the "seed" has fallen on "good ground" and promises a goodly harvest for truth. I find the people are hungering and thirsting for common sense Liberal literature, and devour it in much larger doses, and more eagerly, than the ancient inhabitants of the land of Yahweh did the doctrins taught by a fellow who, it is claimed, fattened several thousands men, women, and children on five little biscuits and two herrings to prepare then for hell fire.

All the TRUTH SEEKERS, tracts, papers, and Liberal books I get are passed around until worn out, and yet they cry "more." I shall send you several new subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER soon. And now I want to mention another matter of interest to the cause, viz: Here in northwest Iowa, southern Minnesota, Dakota, and Nebraska, is a good field for Liberal lecturers to work successfully. Many of the people are Liberal, and I believe several of our good lecturers would be well received and sustained in this territory. We hav been making some effort to get Col. Ingersoll for a lecture here soon, and hope we may succeed. We shall also endeavor to hav Mr. Bennett stop here on his way home should he come by this route.

Mr. M. K. Wilson, formerly of Michigan, has recently located here in Sioux City, and will respond to call to lecture at any point in this region if expenses are guaranteed.

Although age and ill-health hav prevented Mr. Wilson from lecturing much during the past two years, he is now restored and eager for the work. His series of lectures on "Catholicism" and on the earlier history of Christianity and the crime, frauds, and bloodshed employed to establish it, are unsurpassed as weapons for the extinction of orthordoxy, and in my judgment the best introduction Liberalism can hav where lectures hav not been heretofore given.

Four or five years ago H. L. Green, recognizing the fact that many "good" people lost considerable sleep wrestling with doubts as to whether their names were recorded above in the "Lamb's book of life," thereby insuring their salvation, resolved to remove all such fears from the minds of the "ungodly" by opening a lamb's book of life here below, where all Freethinkers who desired could hav their names recorded, and a certificate of record issued to each in proof of the fact. Mr. Green had the book with him at the Hornellsville Convention in 1880, and I enrolled my name and received my certificate, as no doubt many others did, thereby saving much valuable time which might otherwise hav been wasted in prayer and anxiety.

I understand Mr. Green finds the list of names and addresses thus obtained valuable in travels on lecturing tours, and in organizing Leagues, conventions, etc.

I wish to procure the names and addresses of every Liberal, whether Spiritualist, Materialist, Deist, Secularist, or Agnostic, to be entered in a book I hav provided for the purpose of a "Freethinkers' Register and Directory of the Northwest," the object of which will be to aid in promoting the cause by extending acquaintances, organizing Liberal Leagues and societies, procuring lecturers and engagements for lectures, etc. No fee or expense will be attached, and I hope to receive the aid and co-operation of every person in the northwest interested in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty, and freedom from Comstockism. Send me your names, age, occupation, and address on a postal card. Those who desire may be recorded as belonging to either branch of the Freethought army. When the list is sufficiently large I will hav it printed at my own expense, and a copy mailed to all who are recorded, and will keep the book constantly open for a reference for all who desire to use it as such. Yours fraternally,

N. N. E. WOOD, M.D.

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE MOVEMENT.—AN APPEAL FOR ORGANIZATION AND ACTIV WORK.

MR. EDITOR: In my journeyings through the West during the last winter, I hav learned that the great mass of Liberals are in favor of the Liberal League movement, and all agree in the opinion that this organization is worthy and deserving of the support of all who favor the secularization of the state. The proceedings of the last Liberal League Congress was such that it virtually united all Liberals who were disposed to be reasonable, and, as I believe, it placed the League movement on the high road to success. All that is now necessary is for the Liberals everywhere to wake up and go to work to make the next Liberal League Congress that meets in St. Louis, in September, a great success. The secretary or president of each auxiliary League that has not held regular meetings of late should at once call together the members of the League, and take measures to increase its membership and prepare to be represented at St. Louis. And in the thousand places where Liberals hav for the last few years been talking of organizing a League they should at once meet and organize, and order a charter of Secretary Leland. I can hardly think of a place of the one hundred or more towns that I hav visited during the last winter where they hav no League, but the friends hav informed me that they intended to form one soon. Now this is just the time to put all those good intentions into effect. Before the 1st day of July we can hav one hundred new, activ, chartered auxiliary Leagues if every person who desires an auxiliary League formed in his or her locality will at once move in the matter. It is not necessary to go to great expense or much trouble to form a League. Let some earnest, activ Liberal draw up a petition to the secretary of the N. L. L. for a charter for an auxiliary League; then pass around the town and procure ten names, and fifty cents from each person, which will make up the $5 (charter fee). Then mail the petition with a post-office order for the $5 to T. C. Leland, Sec. N. L. L., 744 Broadway, New York city. The person who gets up the petition will be considered the temporary secretary until the League is fully organized. So soon as the charter is received a meeting should be called by the temporary secretary to protect the organization. The organization can be perfected by the election of a president, secretary, and treasurer and board of directors.

Friends of state secularization and Freethought let us now go to work as we never hav before, and push forward the League movement. After the 1st of June I shall devote myself most exclusively to this business in the state of New York if our Liberal friends in that state will aid me in the work.

We must go up with a hundred delegates from the Empire state to the St. Louis Congress. There should be as many delegates to this congress as attend a Presidential Nominating Convention. Shall Liberalism hav such a "boom?" H. L. GREEN.

REVIVAL AT WEST PAWLET.

MR. EDITOR: The Baptist church at West Pawlet, Vt., hav just been having what they call a revival. Rev. Mr. Earle, of Massachusetts, has been with them six days. He is an old hand at it. He has been a minister for fifty-two years, and preached 2,300 sermons. He came here well recommended, and the enthusiastic religious fanatics who got him to come here supposed he would convert the whole of West Pawlet in about fifteen minutes. He had been at Hartford and Greenwich, N. Y., and had converted almost everybody and everything, and all thought that West Pawlet would be but a mouthful for him.

But, oh, how different! His preaching consists of stories and yarns about somebody dying without hope in Christ and going to hell. These stories disgusted the intelligent, thinking people of this place, who hav long ago given up the idea of endless punishment. He told about a man dropping dead up in Maine, and seventy-five people found Christ during the excitement. He told of a young man who died of a sore throat, and, although Earle was there and prayed for him for half an hour, his last words were, "Too late, too late." He told of a man who said when he got to heaven the first thing he would do would be to find his mother. Then he would beg to be excused and go and find Jesus, and he would sit down and look at him for a thousand years. Suppose that one half of the people who hav died are in heaven watching Jesus, it is estimated that Mr. Earle will be unable to get within five miles of the object of his love. Just how clear a view he will get at that distance can be imagined, while the rattle-to-bang of the harps and songs of praise, worse than a thousand brass bands, will render visiting impossible. He said God could not save a sinner; the Holy Ghost could not, as he had no blood; all the angels could not; man could not, his blood was poison. Nobody but Jesus could save from hell.

He advocated all the threadbare doctrins of our pilgrim fathers, such as original sin, foreordination, immersion, a gold-plated heaven (for "our folks"), a double-back-acting, three-headed, compound God; a bloody salvation for a few, and hell and damnation for the millions.

Parties that heard him at Manchester, Greenwich, and Hartford say that his sermons are a mere repetition of the same stories. Let him tell it, and it was down in Greenwich, over in Maine, down South, up North, out West, and down East where he did "big" things, but, alas! he could do nothing here.

He gave the family that entertained him a public hit for not having what he termed a "family altar." His back ached, and he felt sick and discouraged because the ladies did not come up and shake hands with him as they did at Hartford. He was short and touchy, and blowed up the janitor for adjusting the lamps or windows during the sermon. He told the Christians to go nowhere where they could not take Jesus with them. This was a cool one for many who hav attended dances and shows all winter, and when the very church he was preaching in was partly paid for by theatrical performances, kissing-parties, and heavenly restaurants, oyster slops, and egg sociables. Mr. Earle asked that the places of business, stores, shops, etc., be closed during the hours of his meeting. His wishes were almost universally disregarded. He told the people not to be anticipating too much about meeting their friends who hav died in heaven, as many of them were probably somewhere else. He told of a man in Syracuse who had three layers of ice in his heart (it must hav been that cold summer of 1800 and froze to death) and he got it melted out by attending three of Mr. Earle's red-hot prayer-meetings.

His converts were some dozen of girls and children, of the intellectual capacity which is usually seen in converts who are prayed, sung, teased, and scared into heaven. They prayed for nearly all the unconverted and visited some of the business men, but failed to make a single convert among the intelligent, well-read people.

As Mr. Earle is called a "big gun" and second only to Moody, the Christians should giv up the idea of having another revival unless they can get Jesus Christ himself to superintend it in person. Mr. Earle received his pay by people putting five-dollar bills or larger into envelops and handing them to him. It was urged that they giv him nothing less than $5 each. To close the last evening Mr. Earle and two ministers stood up, and the audience were requested to pass around and shake hands with the three. Only about two-thirds of them viewed the remains. It is almost the universal opinion that Mr. Earle injured the church more than he helped it. Perhaps there are revivalists who can convert the whole of West Pawlet, but they are yet to be found. Bring on your next! SELAH.

AN OPEN LETTER TO JOHN JAMES, PRESIDENT OF THE NEW TEMPERANCE SOCIETY OF LA CROSSE.

LA CROSSE, March 6, 1882.

SIR: I want to make a few suggestions, right here, about your "New Temperance Alliance." I see by the Morning Chronicle, of the 25th ult., you had a mass meeting in the opera house, to take into consideration the best course to pursue to stop selling liquor and lager beer on the Sabbath (do not you know there are Sabbaths for every day in the week?). Now, I want to say right here, and I am very sorry to hav to say it, that in my opinion, you are fighting the effect instead of the cause; for instance, if there were no liquors drank, there would be none made.

You are aware that, in the Bible, it is stated that Noah, directly after the deluge, got drunk, and was "uncovered within his tent." You know, also, that Lot got drunk, and his two daughters went and lay with him. And you also know, if you hav read the Bible, that Paul says, "Take a little wine for your stomach's sake." Now, if these holy men of God were old topers, what can you expect from sinners of the present day? Paul asks: "Hath not the potter power over the clay to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor?"

Now, if what Paul said be true, had not God power over the clay to make man good and intelligent, or bad and wicked, just as he saw fit? God made man to become a drunkard, or he never would hav been one. Why, God, the very first pop, put a tempting tree in the Garden of Eden as a snare and temptation, and then got his back up about it. It is no use saying he gave man a free will to eat or not to eat, for that makes the matter ten times worse, for he knew he would eat in spite of it; he had made him so. I tell you, if you intend to make prohibition a success, you must kill the appetite for intoxicating drinks. All the prohibitory laws you can pass will never produce anything but mischief, in spite of anything you can do to the contrary; and as long as there is a demand for intoxicating drinks they will be manufactured, in spite of all you can do to prevent it. Why, they will tell you they know more in one minute than you can learn in a year. There is a law against horse stealing; does that prevent the stealing of horses? Are people to stop keeping chickens because thieves hav a desire to steal them? Are we to do without money because some people will steal it whenever they get a chance? Because some people will jump their board-bill are we to hav no boarding-houses? I am satisfied you will never succeed in your temperance theory unless you can destroy the appetite for intoxicating drinks.

Now, in order to commence reform, you want to put away that old smutty Bible; then I will help you all I can, but not till then. And the next thing to do will be to giv the rising generation a good, common sense education. But that you never will do the way you are proceeding, for the whisky and lager beer pressure will be too strong. I guess you will find that neither hell, brimstone, nor damnation will fetch them, as they are proof against all these. They know that your Christ made wine and got drunk at a marriage-feast, and got others drunk as well. So they are satisfied if they believe that, at the last trump, your Christ will save them, for so he said. So the sinner will come out all right in the end anyhow. How handy it is to have such precious saving grace at last, as it givs encouragement to all villainy and crime.

I am the well-wisher of the human race.

J. PETTY.

MOOERS, N. Y., March 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed piece, which I clipped from the Pittsburg Sentinel, is probably no news to you, as it has appeared in the Troy Times and other papers, but I don't wish it to escape your notice. You will see in the last paragraph of the article that the Methodist clergy would hav us believe the reverend offender innocent, though you may, like myself, be at a loss to know how long they want us to wait for the decision, whether in this real world or in their fancied next; whether they will judge from the color of the child's hair or hav us wait till he adopts a profession to see if he is a born minister. However, members of his congregation here, who hav known him well, don't seem inclined to believe him innocent, for I hav heard several of them express a great contempt for him. "He ought to be shot like a dog," and such like. But the most amusing remark I heard was made by an old deacon of the same church. "I feared as much of him," said the old church dignitary, "but what I liked of him was his style." As the above remark was the first I overheard of the conversation, and the people of this neighborhood seldom speak of anything but horses, I imagined they were talking about a four-legged stallion until further conversation revealed the fact that it was a two-legged one, and a disciple of the meek and lowly Jesus at that, that was so admired for his style in spite of his apparent inclination to evil. Please giv the case as it appears in other papers, and let readers decide as to his guilt or innocence—and his style.

Yours for truth, style or no style, CHAS. LAPERCHE.

"A DISTRESSING CASE.

"Miss Dora Forbes, aged twenty-two years, a daughter of C. P. Forbes, of Ticonderoga, died at a hotel in Rutland on Thursday of last week, under very painful circumstances. Since the failure of her father, who was formerly a large manufacturer of sash, blinds, and doors, she has been employed by a milliner establishment at Brunswick, N. Y. Before her death she gave birth to a child, of which she charged that Rev. W. L. Smith, a Methodist clergyman, of Brunswick, was the father. Heartbroken and almost crazed by grief and shame, the young woman died from nervous exhaustion. Her parents are of the highest respectability.

"Mr. Smith admits having sent $50 to her while she was ill, but denies the truth of her charge. A number of letters written by him were found in her trunk.

"Mr. Smith has been acquainted with the family several years, having been pastor of the Crown Point Methodist church for two years. Five years ago he was stationed at Mooers. It is only just to say that the Rev. Mr. Smith has heretofore borne the highest reputation, and has been looked upon by his charge and his brother ministers as one whose character was above reproach. The Rev. Fred Widmer, presiding elder of the district in which the accused pastor labors, says that Mr. Smith was one of the most conscientious and careful pastors in the district, and that he is confident that Mr. Smith has been terribly maligned and that he will be able to clearly establish his innocence when the proper time arrives."

DALLAS, TEX., April 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: How strange it appears to one who has been mostly taught by nature that man should agree so well upon the merits and near approach to perfection as are the workings of the telegraph, telephone, locomotiv, and steam-boat in all their mechanical devices, and then differ so widely about the merits, perfection, chastity, and wisdom in the word of God. If you want the contrast properly amplified take a small Bible, as I hav done, and seat yourself beneath the shades of some great oak near some prairie, where you are free from all the magnetic influences of man, and watch some western-bound passenger train as it speeds before the wind. Watch the engineer, and see if he don't look proud, confident, independent, noble, and wise as he stands or sits with his hand upon the throttle, as he measures out a known amount of steam to each mile in a certain amount of time, and you are bound to exclaim, How wonderful, how grand, how beautiful, how great are these works and plans of man! Then pick up your Bible, and perchance you may, without thinking, open it, as I did, at the thirtieth chapter of Genesis, and read the whole chapter; and after you hav found out the occupation of Jacob and Rachel, Bilhah and God, you are apt to exclaim as I did, How rude, how filthy is this plan, these words of God! And you will be apt to close the sacred record, as I did, with disgust, exclaiming that there is more wisdom, justice, and sublime sentiment in the make-up of a modern, intelligent, liberal-minded, scientific man of the present day than there was in the great Jehovah of the Jews. D. C. MITCHELL.

An Agnostic Orphan.

BY MRS. E. D. SLENKER.

There is a God, so I am told,
But, oh! he must be far away,
Else would he shield me from the cold,
And giv me bread to eat to-day.

'Tis said he clothes the tender lamb
And covers with long hair the goat,
But see! how poorly clad I am,
With none to mend my tattered coat.

'Tis said that heaven is filled with joy.
How can it be? Could mother dear
One moment there forget her boy
Who shivers, starves, and suffers here?

'Tis said God hears the raven's cry,
And pitying sees the sparrow fall,
If so, then why, oh! tell me why
He doth not deign to hear my call?

Say, father God, is it designed
That I, an orphan, here should be
To sanctify some saintly mind
By sight of my sad misery?

It's all a mystery to me,
And o'er my mind the thought will creep
That God in heaven we ne'er shall see,
But death will be an endless sleep.

And why not rather so than be
With angels round a heavenly throne,
While suffering friends on earth we see,
Yet cannot help a single one?

To My Enemy.

BY ALHAZA.

Forget thee—can the dying rose
Forget the balmiest breeze of even,
Or dew within the lily's cup,
Forget the purest star in heaven?

If ever music soothes thy heart,
The breathings of the far-off lute;
Or incense from the sleeping flowers,
When twilight's holiest voice is mute;

When fleecy clouds with angel tread
Pass lightly o'er the amber sea:
And every wo from earth seems fled,
In that blest hour, think not of me.

But if the storms of dark despair,
Upon thy pathway should descend,
Remember in that hopeless hour,
Thou hast on earth one constant friend.

Hate if you will; let me dream on.
"I loved you once"—no fiend can sour
The nectar of the rose's heart,
Nor steal from me that spell of power.

One word of thine is sweeter far,
Than perfume from a spicy tree;
One breath from thee is lightly blown
From richer balm than Araby.

When wind-harps from the forest deep
Have charmed away the tempest's wrath,
The thought of thee comes o'er the sea,
And seems an angel in my path.

A Dream.

I hav often heard of an age of gold,
With a sun all love-light beaming,
And this is an age of iron, we're told;
But it seems like an age of dreaming.
Tom dreams of poverty, Dick of pelf,
Or whatever's the ruling passion;
And I had a dream t'other night myself,
So dreaming, I think, is in fashion.

I thought my spirit had left its clay,
And o'er that delectable mountain
Of which Bunyan raved I thought I lay
By the side of a beautiful fountain.
It seemed a clime of perpetual spring,
Where flowers in beauty were blowing,
And bright plumaged birds did round me sing,
While my bosom with rapture was glowing.

I felt not hungry, nor thirsty, nor faint,
Nor weariness, although reclining,
And whether I'm counted a sinner or saint,
I cared not nor thought of repining.
Anon I could see in the distance afar,
A rude wall, with huge gaps in the center,
The hingeless old gates had tumbled ajar,
So that Tom, Dick, and Harry could enter.

And this was the wall, and those were the gates'
We've been told were all sapphires and rubies,
About which priests and poets hav addled their pates,
Like silly contemptible boobies.
From the base of the cliff on which stood that rude wall,
Far, far as my vision extended,
Were huge hills of sulphur and mountains of coal,
With mounds of rich minerals blended.

Midst the hum of machinery and puffing of steam,
Rose the voices of artisans singing,
There were boats swiftly gliding o'er Styx's old stream,
And hammers on anvils were ringing;
Scientists here, expounding their views
Before a large health commission.
There, unchristened youngsters, hollering the news,
"Hell Banner, the sixtieth edition."

All seemed prosperous and happy down there,
I heard neither weeping nor wailing;
'Tis a much better place than heaven, I fear,
For up there some spirit was railing.
T'was a queer-looking chap, bound round by a cord;
I judged from his garb t'was St. Peter;
He was in a big stew, for his ear-cropping sword
Was flashing about like a meteor.

He seemed to be fighting with nothing at all,
But anon I could see a poor specter,
So meager and shadowy, thin and so small,
He seemed scarcely aught but conjecture.
Said Peter, "Confound you, clear out, go below,
I'll be blowed if we'll hav you up here, sir,
We'v enough such as you, I'd hav you to know."
Said the shade, "I'v skedaddled from there, sir."

Then Pete called a cherub (he looked like an owl)
To go down below, and inquire.
He went and found Satan just teaching a soul
How to lay an electrical wire.
When he'd stated his errand the devil got mad
And said, "Blast that confounded old Peter,
He would like to palm on me instead of the bad,
Every sniveling darned sanctified creature."

His sooty old tail uncoiled like a snake,
As he shouted, "Now this I'll hav seen to;
The wicked alone I will willingly take,
But not both the wicked and mean, too.
There is not a hound ever followed the deer,
Can match that darned rascal in keenness;
And although as wicked as aught we hav here,
He rivals e'en heaven in meanness.

"I ordered my imps, if he came here at all,
To hunt up the mean soul, and bind it,
And bring it to me; but, by God, 'tis so small,
We had not a devil could find it.
His praiseworthy labors, suppression of vice,
From my domain surely should save him;
And if he's not fit for your old Paradise,
I hope you don't think that I'll hav him.

"No, take him and plant him in heaven's old wall,
Along with your favorit strumpets.
Let them sit without breeches in sight of you all,
And blow your damned two-penny trumpets."
The poor little cherub trembling flew
Away on his rapidest pinion,
And left Satan swearing till all had turned blue,
And raising all hell's wide dominion.

Though rejected by heaven, and hunted from hell,
The specter regained his serenity,
And went for some mail-bags; he seemed to know well,
Where to search for his favorit obscenity.
I saw several saints taking sly little nips,
From cups of the rudest simplicity,
I saw heaven lighted by primitiv dips,
Though the devil had got electricity;

I saw hell's artisans working up there,
And building a lot of new jails, sir;
And Satan himself does often appear,
Attending the sheriff's forced sales, sir.
Now I got quite confused, for it seemed to grow dark,
And I heard a most horrible screaming;
'Twas the milkman who woke me, instead of the lark,
When, lo and behold! I'd been dreaming.

Cresentius.

Behold him as he stands—
The chains upon his hands,
The noblest and the knightliest one
In all the Roman lands!

On his black charger he
Has led to victory
Ten thousand thousand Romans through
The battle's din and dree.

Then streamed his war plume white,
Gleamed in the golden light
His mail and helmet, bearing deep
The dints of many a fight.

Now cruel rack and wheel,
His flesh is made to feel,
But, lo! his true, unmurmuring
Lips no secret will reveal.

Behold his quivering frame!
Behold the proud, calm flame
Within his eagle eye, the while they taunt
His naked shame!

And break his battle sword,
That for themselvs hath poured
The blood of foemen where the flag
Of Rome imperial soared!

"Step forth!" The headsman leads,
And, though each fiber bleeds,
Cresentius goes with grand, high
Mien, to die for noble deeds.

With bright, unbandaged eye
Doth he the ax defy,
While bending to its bloody stroke,
. . . A mad, quick tiger-cry

Leaps from the people there—
Rage, pathos, and despair
Are blended in the awful wail that Breaks upon the air.

Thus, in a devil-age,
Was the historic page
Splashed with the blood of men
Who threw at tyranny the gage.

Thus did they dree and die,
On block, or cross-tree high,
Because the hell-whelps on the Thrones they boldly did defy.

And though the rack and wheel,
And though the headsman's steel,
No man within our boastful land
Hath yet been made to feel.

Still, if we dare defy
A mailed and mitred lie
Of church or state, its tools will Hate and hound us till we die.

The Monsters of Ancient Times.

"Jumbo wasn't a circumstance to the elephants that used to stamp around this country," said a professor of natural history when asked by a reporter of the Sun whether the beast just landed was of extraordinary size. "In 1866, while excavating in Cohoes, N. Y., workmen broke into what seemed to be a big pot hole or well, such as is seen sometimes in the rock bed of rivers. It was full of muck and peaty soil, and at the bottom were found the chief bones of an immense elephant. It was determined that the animal had been washed into the hole when New York state was covered with glaciers hundreds, perhaps thousands, of feet thick. That condition of the country can explain the number of pot holes, from ten to sixty feet in depth, near the Mohawk River. They were formed by water from the surface of a glacier, falling into crevasses and forming cascades, often a thousand feet in hight. The Cohoes elephant was half a million years ago, perhaps, entombed in a great mass of moving ice, and when thawed out was washed into the hole in which it was preserved so many years.

"In the collection in Rutgers College is a fragment of a tusk that is worn down and polished on one side, showing plainly the peculiar glacial striæ. A tusk in the collection of the Philadelphia Academy of Sciences shows similar markings. The American elephant was probably exterminated by the glacial drift. A famous place for these elephant remains is the Big Bone Lick, in Kentucky. In Warren county, New Jersey, some farmers, in cutting peat in a bog, found the remains of six animals less than ten feet below the surface. The most perfect specimen was discovered at Newburgh, N. Y. The skeleton is now in the British Museum. It is twelve feet in hight, and the tusks are ten feet in length. The animals roamed the western parts of the United States and Canada, and along the line of the Andes from five degrees north latitude to forty degrees south, and remains hav been dug up at Quito, nearly two miles above the level of the sea. Their tusks are often plowed up by farmers in St. Catherines, Canada West, western Ohio, Alabama, Mississippi, and Vermont. In Nebraska there was a smaller species. Compared to those animals the elephants of to-day are pigmies. The Newburgh elephant was twenty-five feet in length and more than twelve feet in hight, and its feet were two feet across. So perfectly was it preserved that the remains of spruce and hemlock branches that it had eaten were found in the position of the stomach.

"Those elephants rarely ranged further north than the latitude of St. Catherines, but beyond this ranged a hairy elephant, a third larger and nearly three times as heavy as an elephant of to-day. From the end of the trunk to that of the tail it was thirty-five feet in length. The enormous tusks that reached out in great curves were from ten to sixteen feet in length and thirty inches in circumference at the base.

"All along the borders of the Arctic Sea the remains of these monsters are found, and within a few months an interesting discovery has been made. A company of men started from Sitka, intending to search for the remains of ancient elephants on account of the ivory. They followed the shores of the Polar Sea for two hundred miles without finding a bone or a tusk. When almost discouraged, disheartened, and determined to abandon the search, one of the party in crossing a glacier broke through the ice and disappeared. As the mass of ice was more than one thousand feet thick, he was given up as lost, the nature of the crevasse being well known to the rest. One of the party, however, volunteered to learn the fate of the man. All the rope and cord in the party was bound together, and the searcher was lowered into the hole. When about one hundred feet down the line slackened, and a hail was heard. The searcher was hauled to the surface, and he explained that that the crevice was an enormous room in the glacier, and that the incline was so gradual that with but little work steps could be cut and the bottom reached. The line was made fast, and, armed with axes, five of the party were lowered into the chasm. They found a foothold, and soon reached the bottom, where the body of their comrade lay. He was only stunned, and was soon restored. It was then, their eyes having become accustomed to the darkness, that the nature of their surroundings became apparent. The room was about five hundred feet in circumference. Against the walls of ice dark, irregular-shaped masses appeared. Each minute they became more distinct, until the men saw high above them the indistinct form of a gigantic animal standing erect in the icy mass. Below it, but further in, and fully inclosed, was another, and in a short time they traced the forms of thirty-five entombed monsters. Some were standing erect on their massiv legs, others were lying on their backs as if they had fallen into a crevice and become wedged in, while one huge monster had his head down, with the body thrown over as if it had fallen headlong into the icy pit. One of them was partly thawed out, and the massiv head and tusks hung down. From the ponderous trunk depended large icicles, reaching the floor and forming a column for its support. The bodies were entirely covered with a thick hairy coat resembling jute, but frozen so firmly that it could not be cut. An entire herd had been entrapped in some manner, and was gradually moving in the body of the glacier toward the sea, to be some day cast up on the shore. Not one of the creatures, nor even a tusk, could be obtained without months of work, and the men reluctantly abandoned them.

"Early in the century a fisherman living near the mouth of the Lena River, in Siberia, discovered one of these monsters protruding from an ice-cliff on the shores of the sea. The trunk, tusks, and head were in full view twenty feet above him. For five successiv years he visited the spot, and was finally repaid one spring by finding the huge body on the sands below. It had been partly devoured by bears and wolves, and the flesh was so fresh and well preserved that the meat was cut away and given to the dogs. Even the brain and the eyes were well preserved, although, according to geologists, these animals hav been dead hundreds of thousands of years. The skeleton is in the Museum of Natural History at St. Petersburg. About the same time a gigantic hairy rhinoceros was found in the ice, but it was destroyed by bears before it could be saved."

HISTORY

OF THE

CHRISTIAN RELIGION

TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

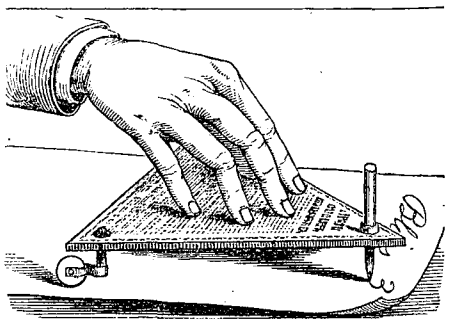
Verdict of European Scholars.

This work has received the indorsement of the Society of Critical Historical Theology of Zurich, Switzerland. The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religion Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupf rschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hoogkass, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."



One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

BLISS'S
Electro-Magnetic Planchette,

A wonderful and mysterious little instrument that combines electricity and animal magnetism in assisting Spirit intelligence to communicate through it with mortals. It has been in the market a little over two years, and during that time thousands of skeptical persons, yes, downright Materialists, hav been convinced that this Planchette has been MOVED BY A POWER independent of themselvs while their hands hav been placed passivly upon it.

WHAT BLISS'S ELECTRO-MAGNETIC PLANCHETTE WILL DO.

It will answer either mental or spoken questions; giv communications from departed friends; tell correctly past, present, and future events; warn persons of coming danger; tells you who are your friends and enemies; develop writing and other phases of mediumship; will write for Materialists (if they possess the least mediumistic power) as readily as it will for mediums or believers in Spiritualism, etc.

It is a great source of amusement, as well as instruction, in the family during long winter evenings, and a desirable companion at the summer resort. It is not only the best, but it is the cheapest Planchette in the market.

SKEPTICS, TRY IT, and you will never be sorry, for you cannot fail to be convinced that death does not end all; but, on the contrary, spirits survive the death of the body and can communicate with mortals.

THE ADVANTAGES CLAIMED OVER OTHER PLANCHETTES.

First. A paste-board top in place of oiled, stained, or varnished wood.

Second. Five miniature batteries upon the top of each Planchette, upon which the fingers rest.

Third. Each Planchette is separately magnetized and assigned a band of developing spirits.

Price, Fifty Cents Each.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroberated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

which is the doctor's latest and greatest discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of these were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinery deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be a pale or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed, for three cent stamp, containing an Essay on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its exciting causes, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Gems of Thought.

TRUE glory consists in doing what deserves to be written, in writing what deserves to be read, and in so living as to make the world happier and better for our living.—Pliny.

WITH regard to what is commonly meant by intemperate discussion, namely, invectiv, sarcasm, personality, and the like, the denunciation of these weapons would deserve more sympathy if it were ever prepared to interdict them equally to both sides; but it is only desired to restrain the employment of them against the prevailing opinion; against the unprevailing they may not only be used without general disapproval, but will be likely to obtain for him who uses them the praise of honest zeal and righteous indignation. Yet, whatever mischief arises from their use is greatest when they are employed against the comparativly defenceless; and whatever unfair advantage can be derived by any opinion from this mode of asserting it accrues almost exclusivly to received opinions.—Mill's Liberty.

"ATHEISM does not explain the origin of existence." Perfectly true, but neither does Theism. Nothing explains it. Origin of existence is unthinkable, even as annihilation is. The Theist believes in a self-existent god, of whom he knows nothing; the Atheist believes in a self-existent universe of which he knows a little. To regard the universe as created, and God as self-existent, is not to explain the origin of existence; it is only to cover the difficulty up in a wrapper, and to write on the wrapper, "God." In the old fable, to the question, "On what does the world rest?" the answer comes, "On an elephant," "And on what does the elephant rest?" "On a tortoise." "And on what does the tortoise rest?" "It is self-supporting." Would it not be simpler to make the world self-supporting at once? Theism names the "tortoise" God, and plumes itself on its superior knowledge.—Besant's Gospel of Atheism.

THIS green, flowery, rock-built earth, the trees, the mountains, rivers, many-sounding seas—that great deep sea of azure that swims overhead, the winds sweeping through it, the black cloud fashioning itself together, now pouring out fire, now hail and rain; what is it? Ay, what? At bottom, we do not yet know, we can never know at all. It is not by our superior insight that we escape the difficulty: it is by our superior levity, or inattention, our want of insight. It is by not thinking that we cease to wonder. Hardened round us, encasing wholly every notion we form, is a wrappage of traditions, hearsays, mere words. We call that fire of the black thunder-cloud "electricity," and lecture learnedly about it, and grind the like of it out of glass and silk; but what is it? Whence comes it? Whither goes it! Science has done much for us; but it is a poor science that would hide from us the great, deep, sacred infinitude of nescience, whither we can never penetrate, on which all science swims as a mere superficial film. The world, after all our science and sciences, is still a miracle (i. e., a thing to be wondered at); wonderful, inscrutable, magical, and mere to whosoever will think of it.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

IT is an open fact that men going to new places to set up in business—young lawyers, physicians, merchants, teachers—often seek an elegible church relationship in order to secure a good business constituency, just as shopkeepers seek a good stand for their trade. A young lawyer goes to New York to begin his professional career; ambitious, determined to win a position, not very scrupulous concerning the means after he has hung out his sign in Wall street, he hires a seat in one of the up-town fashionable churches, and takes a class in its Sunday-school. He does it, as he does not hesitate to say, not because he has any faith in the religion there taught, or in any religion, but to advertise himself and get the entree of New York society.—W. J. Potter.

THERE is one practical question which I wish President Porter would answer, and it seems to me of far greater importance than whether there is a personal God or not: What is to become of society in this world if the million dollar churches of the rich are to be untaxed, and the poor are to be left to multiply in cellars beyond the possibility of having sound minds in sound bodies.—Elizur Wright.

THERE are thousands of Christians who hav never examined the evidences of the resurrection, piece by piece; they are incapable of estimating it, if they did examin; they know nothing about the laws of evidence; they hav had no experience in balancing the value of testimony; they are neither lawyers nor philosophers, and yet those simple Christians, etc., etc.—Fred W. Robertson.

THE simple believeth every word: but the prudent man looketh well to his going.—Prov. xiv, 15.

IF a man's practice be vicious and injurious to his fellow-creatures, what religion he professes imparts little more to his moral character than the shape or color of his clothes. What matters it in point of religion, to detest the violences and persecutions of Rome, if men still continue lovers of violence and contention? What matters it in point of truth to hav rejected the unintelligible doctrins of Rome [or any other church], if men still continue fond of unintelligible notions? What matters it in point of virtue and real goodness to hav departed from the superstitious practices of Rome, if men will still be fond of superstious practices?—Dr. Samuel Clark.

HE little knows woman's nature who thinks her will, spirit, and resolution can be broken by a few weeks' confinement and a diet of bread and water. Any woman that is at all womanly in her feelings will suffer to the last extremity before she will giv up the man she loves and marry one she loathes and detests. Suffering only makes her the more resolute and determined. A girl may love her God and adore her savior, but she idolizes her lover, and places him far above all gods in the sanctuary of her affections, no matter how pious she may be Her God and savior only become reflections or idealized images of her lover, and in loving them she really loves him.—E. D. Slenker.

PRESBYTERIAN blue is the latest shade in that color. But Presbyterians are not blue any more. O dear, no. They keep up their end of the circus with the best of them.

WHEN the editor of the World was asked whether it was true that his brother was dead, he replied that he was too busy to say anything about the matter. Business before grief.

HENRY WATTERSON plays the piano and poker. Plays poker best. But Henry's favorit "harp of a thousand strings spirits of Kentucky bourbon made perfect" is "a tariff for revenue only." Piano and poker are merely amusements.

HEAVEN is losing its reputation faster than any place we ever heard of. With the exception of Sindram, every murderer who has been hung for years has publicly asserted that he was going straight there on a cut ticket.—The Judge.

"How profoundly still and beautiful is the night," she whispered, resting her finely veined temple against his coat-collar, and fixing her dreamy eyes on the far off Pleiades, "how soothing, how restful."

"Yes," he replied, toying with the golden aureola of her hair, "and what a night to shoot cats."

PUT away our Johnnie's trousers,
Those his mother patched with care,
Though the patches sure were rousers
On the part that rubbed the stair.

Up in heaven now our Johnnie,
Fled for aye his worldly haunts—
Gone to meet his brother Lonnie,
Never more to wear patched pants.

A WESTERN editor offered a prize of $50 and a year's subscription for the best written proposal of marriage from a lady. He picked out a nice proposal from a beautiful and wealthy widow, answering it, accepting the proposal, and with the threat of a breach of promis suit actually captured her. Editors may not acquire wealth by writing twenty-three hours a day, but when their genius takes the right shoot they procure the persimmons.

"WHAT shall we do to entertain our girls," says a religious exchange. A man who needs advice as to now to entertain his girls is not fit to edit a religious paper. We suggest that he should take one of them out buggy-riding in the afternoon, tell her what a daisy she is, and how insipid and fixed up that other girl is. Then he should take "that other girl" out for ice cream after supper, and tell her confidentially how very uninteresting and awkward that buggy-riding girl is. When the two girls meet the religious editor can depend on their entertaining each other without his personal assistance.—Texas Siftings.

THE other day a colored lady of standing, Mrs. Jimpson, purchased a Gainsborough, and visited Mrs. Fennel. It was evident that Mrs. Jimpson possessed a few airs which she wished to display over Mrs. Fennel.

"My husband," said Mrs. Jimpson, "wanted me ter git a finer hat den dis, but reflectin' dat de twenty-dollar bills in de bottom of de drawer was gettin' sauter scace, like, I concluded to content myself wid a fifty-dollar hat."

"Wall, yer was savin'," remarked Mrs. Fennel, and then, stepping to the door, exclaimed: "Tildy, take dat thousand-dollar bill away from dat chile. He tore up two yesterday. Dar ain't no sense in allowin' chillun ter 'stroy money in dat way."

Mrs. Jimpson retired, realizing that her hat was a failure.

IT had taken some little time to bring his tongue in full accord with his mind, but he finally stammered out:

"Will you—will you wander down life's path, your hand in mine, while the goddess of love sings siren songs to us? Oh, will you be my own, my angel?"

"Well. well, wouldn't I look well as an angel? See here. If you want me to marry you, to make life happy and home pleasant for you, to keep the house slicked up nice, to cook you relishable meals, to preside at your table and at the piano with equal ability, to care for the children and bring them up bright and smart, and help you to make the most of yourself in this world, I'll jine hands with you."

"That's just the practical sort of an angel I thought you were. 'Jine.'"

I'M AN ASS.

(AIR: "I'm Afloat." Specially arranged for the Brooklyn Tabernacle.)

I'm an ass, I'm an ass, I'm an ass of the church.
With a habit of braying and talent for smirch.
When I let myself out you will fully agree
That the world contains nothing so asinin as me.

I'm an ass. I'm an ass—'tis my joy to bray loud
On subjects that tickle the tab'nacle crowd;
Any topic that fools odoriferous find
Is the theme apropos to a jack of my kind!

I'm an ass, I'm an ass, with an aspect unfair—
Not another such one you will meet anywhere,
Though you travel from Maine unto Texas remote.
I'm an ass, I'm an ass of the Balaam cahoot!

I'm an ass, I'm an ass, I'm an ass with a wheeze—
And don't you forget it, Bob Ingersoll, please.
In season and out, amid husks or in grass,
Forever as now—I'm an ass, I'm an ass.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volnmes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been mahy books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

BY A PHYSICIAN AND SANITARIAN.

"The virtues of men and women as well as their vices may descend to their children."

"There is nothing Utopian in hoping for the time to come when men and women will consult a wise sanitarian before entering into the marriage relation."

The Southern Clinic, a journal of medicin and surgery, says: "We took up this book with prejudice, but soon saw the author was a physcian, and a good one too; a sound physiologist, an instructiv writer, and a man of high moral sense;" and adds, "A race of vigorous, beautiful, sweet-tempered people would be the result of the observance of its principles."

The Home Journal, Boston, says: "We earnestly commend it to all. Its influence can be only beneficial. The author has a thorough mastery of his subject.

Demorest's Family Fashion Magazine says: "It contains enough sensible hints to set up a family."

The Alpha, edited by Dr. Winslow, says: "We like the book thoroughly." And adds: "Send for it, fathers and mothers, for your own good and for the sake of your children, who are to fill your places when you are called up higher."

The Buffalo Express says: "Whoever buys this book will find it a paying investment."

The Scientific American says: "Books on this subject are usually written by 'cranks,' but this is radically different; it is scientific, sober, clean, and worthy of conscientious consideration by every possible parent, and particularly by the young."

Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, writes: "I hav read all of your works, and feel I must study this one. Your contributions to sanitary and social science hav all been imbued with the spirit of sound conservatism and earnest conscientiousness, all too rare among reformers. Whoever gods over this book will find himself on sacred ground. It is the most valuable of your many valuable books."

Prof. N. S. Townsend, of Ohio University, writes: "I am greatly pleased with this work. I hav loaned it to some of my pupils, who express delight with it. I hope every thoughtful young man and woman will read it."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 9. No. 19. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, May 13, 1882. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Evangelical Alliance of St. Louis voted not to discuss the question, "What doctrins of Evangelical Christianity, if any, hav been modified by science in the nineteenth century?"

THE Cleveland minister who married Edward Marshall to Annie Hellan was very near-sighted. That was his excuse for failing to see that the bridegroom was a boy of 14, while the bride was 26. The latter is now under arrest on a charge of perjury, as she swore, in taking out the license, that Eddie was of age.

CARDINAL NEWMAN says there is no place in Europe where the pope can set his foot. Europe is a cramped up place, anyhow, but if the pope's foot is bigger than the whole country, he had better move the Vatican to the plains of Texas, or rent his foot for a bridge across the Atlantic, or let it out in sections for cattle-ranches, or giv it to the Irish for a farm, and charge them no rent. Perhaps Barnum would buy the big toe as a curiosity. Just advertise it, Mr. Pope, and some enterprising American will take it off your leg.

IN his last National Reformer Mr. Bradlaugh says: "The Philadelphian folk do not exactly wish me to be made bankrupt by the common informer, so a committee has been formed in the City of Brotherly Love, and I hav received an invitation to deliver one hundred lectures in various cities of the United States, for which the committee are ready to pay £2,000 cash, besides my traveling and hotel expenses to and from Europe, and while lecturing. Unfortunately, until the fight is over, I dare not stay away from England during the four months these lectures would occupy."

THE death-bed of Lanza, the Italian statesman, has become as great a scandal as that of Littre, the great French critic and lexicographer. Lanza cared no more about the church than he did for the chemical composition of faith; but, when he came to die, an officious nephew introduced a priest to his bedside. "You repent of your last sins?" said the agent of the church. "Yes," replied the dying man, feebly. "You repent and retract all you hav done against religion and the holy church?" Lanza looked up to the priest with the utmost scorn and contempt, and did not deign to reply to what he considered an insult. The priest, however, gave him absolution, and proclaimed that Lanza had repented. The truth is, Lanza had nothing to repent of, and died, as he had lived, an enemy to Catholicism.

A SOMEWHAT impecunious church which has for a long time been humiliated by being compelled to worship in a shabby old frame house of worship recently announced its purpose of building something more commodious and stylish. A neighboring dominie, astonished at the state of financial ability indicated by such a step, congratulated the pastor on the improved prosperity of the church. The pastor accepted the congratulations gracefully and thankfully. The neighboring dominie then ventured to ask as to the amount of cash on hand, if it were sufficient to finish the building and hav it free from debt. "Well," said the pastor, "I can hardly say we hav enough for that; you know our people are poor, and we hav not been able to raise much cash, but we are rich in faith." "And will faith put up your new church?" the neighbor asked. "Well, not exactly that," the pastor replied, "but we hav money to begin with, and we hav faith to believe that somehow or other we shall get the balance." "Then," the neighbor remarked, "you mean to say that you are going to build on a little cash, run awfully in debt, and get Bro. Kimball or somebody to help you out of it." The pastor admitted that possibly there might be something of the kind. "Then," the objecting dominie replied, "you had better worship for fifty years in your shabby little church rather than run in debt for a house you cannot pay for." And there was a coolness between these two servants of the Lord.

IN his last Sunday lecture, George Chainey paid his respects to the people who charge the Liberals with being destructiv, and their orthodox ally, the Index, as follows: "You hav heard much said about destructiv and constructiv Liberalism. The truth is, there is no such thing as destructiv Liberalism that can be separated from constructiv. It is only orthodoxy that destroys without building. Liberalism builds grandly for humanity with every denial it makes. Next Sunday the destructiv nature of Col. Ingersoll's lecture will be spoken of in many pulpits in Boston. This cry is constantly raised against him both by the pulpit and press. And yet no man living to-day is building better and fairer homes for coming generations than he. From his almost matchless imagination are being shaped ideals of liberty, truth, and love, of fireside joy, of a regenerated and happy humanity that shall people this fair earth when no one shall arrogate to himself any right he does not accord to every one else. Any man or woman who proclaims against such work as he is doing as destructiv alone has no more an idea of what he or she is talking about than a parrot. This same charge has frequently been made against the work we are doing in this lecture society. The editors of the Index—who, from their professions, ought to rejoice in what we hav done and are still doing—hav several times made this foolish charge, and quite recently hinted that this audience is of too low an order of intellect to appreciate anything but negations. Why they should write of us and our work only in this way, I cannot imagin, unless as an excuse for their own dulness and flatulency. I should be much obliged if the Index would point us to any affirmation they ever made that has not been made in these lectures. I dislike to speak against those who claim to be engaged in the service of liberty. But he who wears your colors, and professes to fight on your side, and then turns his sword against you in the thick of the fight, is the most cowardly and meanest of all traitors."

J. H. MCVICKER recently addressed an open letter to Rev. Herrick Johnson, in reply to his published charges against the theaters of Chicago. The vigor and directness of Manager McVicker's reply may be inferred from the following extracts: "I request that you select from the recognized theaters of Chicago—those regularly advertising in our daily papers—any one, naming it and its manager, and then charging it with the crimes you hav laid at the door of all in such a way that the case may be taken into our courts, and I will guarantee to convict you of slander, or pay $1,000 to any charitable institution you may name. I make this request because I desire a test case. You say 'constant theater-goers by the score' hav admitted your charges to be true. I want to put them on the stand. I desire to see the people who will admit they go constantly to theaters to witness 'murderous assaults upon all that the family circle holds most holy and sacred.' So let us hav a test case. You and I may 'bandy words,' as many hav done before us, and arrive at no conclusion; for each will claim to hav proved his side, and there is no umpire to decide which is right, for in such matters the public is a myth. So, my dear sir, select your theater, and in a proper form present your unquashed indictment. . . . In your unchristian-like dealings with your fellowmen are you so blinded with ancient theological dust that you cannot see the position you will soon occupy, if you do not occupy it now? During my day in Chicago, several ministers of the gospel, with paralyzed ideas such as yours, hav come to the surface and for a time barked at the moon, so to speak; but not one of these who adhered to his charges, claiming that he had proved them, can boast to-day that he has the respect and confidence of the community to whom he promulgated such slanders. . . . You say there is not a 'dramatic house that has stood the test of time without allowing filth on its boards—there is not one on earth—not one;' and, after this sentence, you sign yourself, 'Respectfully, Herrick Johnson.' You should hav signed yourself, 'Slanderously, Herrick Johnson,' or 'Maliciously, Herrick Johnson.' If you will apply that assertion to McVicker's theater in such a way as to get it before the courts, I will agree to convict you of libel or pay $1,000 to any charity you may name. That 'dramatic house' has stood the test of time, under the same management; and, if report can be believed, it has never allowed upon its boards a tithe of the filth that emanated from your pulpit in your 'plain talk about theaters.'"

BUT few lawyers hav examined the provisions of the new criminal code, and those who hav emphatically condemn many of its provisions. In the legislature a strong and determined effort was made to pass an act providing that it should not take effect till May, 1883, while a prominent senator proposed to make the date 1983, but through the efforts of the advocates of the code a disagreement was occasioned between the two Houses, and on the day before the code was to become the sole criminal law of the state a compromise was agreed upon postponing the time at which it is to go into effect till December 1st next. This act was signed by the governor between four and five o'clock in the afternoon of the 29th of April, the last legislativ day before May 1st, when the code would hav been in full force. Among the provisions of the new code is one upon the subject of "profane swearing." The one in force now is bad enough, but the new code goes much farther and does much worse. It defines profane swearing to be "any use of the name of God or Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, either in imprecating divine vengeance upon the utterer or another person, or in trifling or irreverent speech." It will be noticed that the language is very broad. While it closes the mouth of the skeptic, of the Freethinker, of the Infidel, of the Agnostic and Atheist, it puts a quietus upon the Hebrew, the Unitarian, and the Free Religionist. In view of the fact that the fundamental law of the state guarantees to every citizen toleration upon all religious subjects the policy of this definition of "profane swearing" well may be doubted. The chapter containing the above section is entitled "Of Crimes Against Religious Liberty and Conscience." It may be inferred that this part of the act is "a crime against liberty and conscience." The next two sections provide for the punishment of the person who may be convicted, substantially as in the present statute, except the code adds these words, "and in addition to the fine above prescribed (that is, the justice, mayor, recorder or alderman) impose imprisonment in a county jail, not exceeding ten days." Now we wish no person to understand that we favor, countenance, or approve of any profane swearing, but we look at the facts as they are. Every one who knows anything of men, knows that profane swearing is a habit, we may say almost universal among the people, from the chief executiv down to the lowest official. And they further know that if such a statute could be enforced, about all officials, judges, lawyers (editors, we are sorry to say), and two-thirds of the doctors would be in jail to-morrow; while additional prisons would be required to accommodate the people in general. Profane swearing cannot be got rid of by such acts as this, neither should the state of New York place upon its statute book an act which places the liberty of every citizen at the absolute mercy of every petty justice, mayor, or recorder, or alderman, either of which officials under the penal code may "without other proof" than his own hearing, even though the charge be false, commit our most distinguished citizen to the common jail for ten days. A bill has been introduced in the Assembly repealing these sections, and in our opinion it should pass, because they are grossly unjust under our Constitution, and because they place in the hands of an irresponsible class of officials the personal liberty of the people.—Poughkeepsie Daily News.

GUITEAU'S sister, Mrs. Scoville, has been lecturing in New York. She was advertised to speak in a theater here last Sunday evening, but as only forty-one persons appeared in the way of an audience she declined to address them, and their money was returned. Mrs. Scoville's lectures are mainly upon religious subjects, and are uninteresting in the extreme.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Experiences in Bombay.

The last speech of this eventful occasion was by Kavasji M. Shroff, Esq., a Parsee Fellow of the Theosophical Society, and secretary of the Bombay branch of the National Indian Association, and of the Bombay Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. In substance, and impressiveness of delivery, it was one of the best and most effective efforts of the day. He is the same intelligent person who visited America some seven years ago, and made a speech before the Liberal Club on the Parsees, which was very well received. Mr. K. M. Shroff said:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: John Stuart Mill, in one of his admirable essays, says, "To suppress an expression of opinion is to rob the human race." Elsewhere it is said, "Error in opinion may safely be tolerated when reason is left free to combat it." Encouraged by such sentiments, emanating from noble minds, I venture to stand before you here to-day, regardless of what the educated men of my age and class may say, to give expression to my views as a stanch Theosophist, inasmuch as I have been intimately connected with the society for more than three years. I say more than three years, because my connection does not date from the time of the society's arrival in Bombay, but much prior to that period. I had an opportunity of corresponding with the founders of the society when they were in America; and long before the Bombay society was formed, my friend Col. Olcott having heard of my travels in the United States, as I was subsequently informed, had gone down from Boston to New York only a day after I left the latter city for Bristol, in 1874, in order to have a talk with me about India and its people. Most of you are aware that during the society's stay of three years in Bombay, its indefatigable organizer and worker, our learned lecturer of this evening, gave many public addresses, both here and in connection with the Arya Samaj. But I purposely refrained from giving utterance to my thoughts on any of these occasions, because I believed it would be then considered premature, and I wanted time to make myself sufficiently familiar with the society. Now that a period of full three years has elapsed, during which time I had the best opportunity of watching the intentions, motives, and work of the movers of this grand national cause, I fearlessly but humbly face you to-day as a warm friend and ardent admirer of the society. The conviction is carried home to my mind—and I wish you to share that conviction—that the society has been founded on a purely philanthropic basis, and is one of the needed organizations for the regeneration of India. To make use of the happy language of Mr. Grant Duff, adopted in his eloquent and very interesting address delivered recently at Madras at the opening of the Agricultural College, let me tell you that the society has passed through two phases. The first was the "Russian spy" phase, when, soon after their advent in India, Madam Blavatsky and Col. Olcott were greeted as Russian spies, and some designing fellow or fellows had so far succeeded in befooling the local authorities that these two personages were closely pursued and watched by police detectives from day to day, and from one town to the other, until the authorities were undeceived, and in consequence of more sober second-thoughts were compelled to give up their wild-goose chase. Then followed the second phase of "money-making impostors." I regret to say that some of my young, educated, but unprincipled and ungrateful countrymen, instead of being thankful to Col. Olcott and the talented lady for their work in behalf or our country, most shamefully turned round and maligned them, called them adventurers, and the columns of an Anglo-Vernacular newspaper were disgracefully soiled with any amount of rubbish, purposely meant to prejudice our friends against the people and lower them in their estimation. But as truth always prevails, our friends toiled on, notwithstanding all hostile and bitter opposition, until the enemies are all now disarmed, and the righteous cause is not only applauded throughout the land, from Ceylon to Simla, but under the banner of Theosophy are enlisted some of the best minds in the country, and more are likely to join ere long. To attempt to give you anything like a clear idea as to what is Theosophy, or to convey to you a convincing proof of the science of it, or of the Yoga Vidya, in the existence and power of which the founders of the society firmly and not unreasonably believe, would be considered as a presumptuous task on my part. To obtain information in regard to it, I would refer you to the first few numbers of the monthly publication bearing the name of the Theosophist, the organ of the society, which publication is in itself a sufficient proof of the earnestness of the disinterested efforts of the founders of the society. But nowhere can you find in a small compass a more lucid explanation and more cogent arguments in favor of the objects and work of this body, and of the Yoga Vidya in particular, than in that most able production of Mr. Sinnett, "The Occult World," a book which does great credit to its author, and which has elicited voluminous criticism of varied nature in Europe. The appearance of that book marks an epoch in the brief history of the Theosophical Society. Mr. Sinnett is the editor of one of the most influential and widely-circulated journals in India. He is, besides, a gentlemen of sterling abilities and high moral character, and is greatly respected alike by the official and non-official European classes in the Northwestern Provinces, where he is better known than on this side of India. When such a master-mind as his has taken up the serious and most puzzling question, and discussed it with uncommon merit, and when he has shown laudable courage in giving to the European world a book guaranteed with his name, it is but natural that all scoffers, and those penny-a-liners who endeavored to cavil at the good work of the society, should hold their tongues, bow in submission, and confess their inability to fathom a purely psychological subject, of which they had never before heard or read anything, although it was studied and acquired thousands of years ago in their own country by their own countrymen.

Gentlemen, while, on the one hand, we are thankful to our rulers for allowing us to taste the fruits of Western knowledge, and creating a general enlightenment in the country, the result of which has been the introduction of new ideas, with the unceasing force of which the country has been making an onward, material progress, we have to deeply deplore, on the other hand, the patent fact that there is a total absence of any provision for the moral well-being and spiritual aspirations of the educated classes, whose number is rapidly increasing. Whatever good English education may have done in India, you will readily admit that its tendency has been to make many of us Infidels and Atheists. While it has supplied us with enough of intellectual food, it has left uncultivated the moral and spiritual nature. We educated men are as so many hybrid productions of the British rule in India, if I may be allowed to use the expression. Parsees are neither entirely Parsees, nor are they Europeans in their tastes, virtues, modes of thought, and habits of life. Hindoos, even, do not fare better in this respect. The old, pure Zoroastrinism exists in its mere skeleton form, or is dying or dead. The ancient and sublime Hindooism and Buddhism are almost extinct. The hitherto praised systems of Eastern religion and philosophy, which once made India and Persia great in the eyes of the then existing nations of the world, have been partly obliterated, or are fast fading from our view and knowledge; and we, children of the once powerful people, are dwindled down to insignificance among the modern nations of the world, since, in the hurry of life, we are only taught to devote our attention and energy to the mere acquirement of a miserable monthly stipend for our livelihood, for the obtaining of which ends we are impressed from our very boyhood with the importance of looking upon the meager education we receive at schools and colleges as the means, and through whose instrumentality only we are left to plod on in after life without any moral support. Under this state of affairs we know not what port we have been drifting to. With the exception of a few spasmodic attempts made in Bengal some years since, by men like Baboo Keshab, Chender Sen and others, no systemic efforts have been made on a grand national basis for the moral and much-needed spiritual elevation of the rising millions of the educated young men. One of the great necessities of the country is to demolish those caste distinctions, and false, injurious practices, and ignorant, superstitious beliefs of the people, which only tend to keep them separate, and, consequently, weak. Since it is no policy of the government to do it, as it keeps itself generally occupied with works intended for the material welfare of the people, any movement for the regeneration of India should be spontaneous on the part of the people, and should originate with and be conducted by them alone. When the disinterested, zealous founders of the society felt for the moral degradation of the people, and at an enormous personal sacrifice left their happy homes in distant lands and more congenial climate to come and live and labor in our midst; what has been there reward, gentlemen, but to be treated in harsh terms by Anglo-Indian and native newspaper writers, who are incapable of appreciating genuine disinterestedness which is incompatible with their own practice of working for the good of the people with the sordid object of making money for themselves? The questions are often asked: What do the Theosophists want to do? Why have they come to our country? What do they live here for? What do they want us to believe in? Let me answer you briefly that the Theosophists—I mean the founders of the society—do not want from you anything for themselves; they feel for our country—for our morally neglected condition; they are persons of rare attainments, uncommon energy, untiring industry; they, like wise beings, can look below the surface of things, as they have existed for generations, and their far-reaching sight enables them to picture to themselves the not very bright future that is in store for us, if we career on for a number of years in the same manner as we have done in the past; the founders of the Theosophical Society do not preach any fresh doctrines, nor propound any new theories, nor do they want to make converts of us to their beliefs; they do not ask any communities to forsake their religion and to follow theirs; they receive with open arms persons of all castes, creeds, beliefs, and shades of opinion; they attempt to revive the study of the ancient religions of India, and from their vast erudition and extensive knowledge of the ancient Eastern religions and philosophies, they only, month after month, lay open before us in the pages of their monthly publication stores of their learning, scientific facts, and literary productions, for which India had been famous time out of mind; they only want us to open our eyes to what existed in our country ages ago, and they try to point us out the stupidity of our hankering after the hollow modern civilization, protest against the importation into India of European vices and evils, and particularly that of drunkenness, which saps the national foundation; the Theosophists, in short, offer us, to accept without reservation, the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, and teach us to unite together as one nation, and forming one harmonious whole, stand on one common platform of reciprocity, and work in combination for the good of India, under the benign influence of the British rule. This is what the Theosophical Society are endeavoring to do. These are its aims, and these its objects.

But, gentlemen, ours is a practical and utilitarian age. Oftentimes it is discussed in our council that the society should not only confine itself to the measures I have just described, but should undertake something for the material advancement of the country. The founder of the society, himself a most practical man, coming from one of the most practical countries in the world, the United States of America, had this fact in view from the very beginning. If you refer to the files of the Theosophist you will find what practical suggestions have been made therein and steps taken to bring about the desired object. If the efforts have not been successful in that direction, the people on this side of India have to thank themselves for the lukewarm interest they have hitherto evinced in this cause. We have heard with delight and attention the interesting address just delivered, and, from our friend's work in Ceylon for seven months, we are in a position to ascertain how much good could be effected when there is earnestness and perseverance on the part of the worker, plus the cheerful co-operation of the surrounding people. It is for us to take up the ideas and develop them and assist in raising a national fund to give effect to the proposals for the amelioration of the condition of the masses. Accustomed as the inhabitants of this country have been to raising subscriptions for any common good in large sums from the limited upper classes only, I am afraid they do not believe in the admirable system of collecting small sums from the people at large as a national subscription, which system obtains in some of the countries of Europe and America. I have no doubt, however, that, if strenuous exertions are made, the plan would be feasible. Here I would particularly draw your attention to one thing out of which those uncharitable writers not favorably disposed toward the society are likely to draw inferences to the detriment of the good cause and the prejudice of the body. I apprehend they will now say, "Look here; the Theosophists are trying to touch the pockets of the people and hoard a fortune for their own gain," etc. Nothing of the sort. The lecturer has distinctly enunciated the scheme upon which he proposes to work. The fund, if raised, will be lodged in the names of a few respectable men in the country and will be utilized at their direction. The society has never attempted to gain money. It never will. How praiseworthy is its object and how philanthropic its work, that though these two personages have lived in this country for three years they have maintained themselves at their own cost. This is what we should call true benevolence and philanthropy. We are often told that the efforts of the Christian clergymen and missionaries in this country are philanthropic, that their self sacrifice is great, their devotion exemplary, their perseverance inimitable. Now, let us examine how far this assertion is true. While talking on this subject, I wish it to be clearly understood that I am by no means unfriendly to the missionaries. I am not so narrow-minded or fanatic as to pass any sweeping remarks on their good work or condemn it in toto. I admit that, since the advent of the British to this country, the missionaries have exercised a wholesome influence throughout the land. I admit that the missionaries have been the pioneers of English education in Hindostan. I admit they have been instrumental in bringing together the rulers and the ruled by their having first studied the native languages and native character and brought the beauties of the same to the notice of the Europeans. But when the epithets, "disinterested" and "philanthropic" are applied to their work, they seem anomalous. And why? Simply because the clergy class and the missionaries are paid for their work, and amply paid, too, from the coffers of the state and from the various foreign missions respectively. Such of you as are in the habit of glancing at the items in the Annual Indian Budget must have unfailingly observed that there is an item of more than sixteen lakhs of rupees on the debit side of the budget marked as ecclesiastical expenditure. Now, this large sum of sixteen lakhs of rupees drawn annually from the tax-paying poor of the country goes to enrich the British clergy class; and Sir Richard Temple in his very valuable book, "India in 1880," says this is by no means a large sum spent after the spiritual welfare of the ruling race in India. I agree with Sir Richard, and do not grudge the ruling race this large sum. But what I want to maintain is that if efforts purchased at the expenditure of sixteen lakhs of money belonging to the ryots are called "disinterested" and "benevolent," it is simply ridiculous and anomalous. Furthermore, do not for a moment believe that these sixteen lakhs, though in itself a large sum, suffices for all the wants of the ecclesiastical servants of the country. In addition to this large sum from the Indian treasury, several Christian denominations have been in the regular receipt of large grants annually from the various foreign missions in Europe and America. All this money goes to keep the British clergy and the missionaries in a dignified and happy condition of life. Every missionary here has a spacious bungalow, carriages, horses, and servants at his command, a happy household consisting of a beautiful wife and chubby-looking children, a comfortable salary, with occasional opportunities of sojourning to the hills and periodically going home on furlough. With all these sublunary blessings, his efforts and devotion are styled disinterested and benevolent, as if by his work he has left the people of India under an eternal obligation without receiving from them a pice or receiving from Europe and America any money.

With all their past glory, I am afraid, the days of Christian missionaries are numbered in India, say what Mr. Joseph Cook and others may. We welcome Mr. Cook to our country as a distinguished visitor. We appreciate and admire his high scholarship, his great oratorical power, his matchless eloquence; but we cannot accept his Christian teachings. He must know that the intelligent Indian mind awakened by the secular education given by the government is abroad in search of truth and is not likely to fall an easy prey to the teachings of the missionaries. He must remember that the progress of science has already given a death-blow to Christianity in Europe. Only a few days ago certain facts were given in the local English papers, and it was shown from statistics taken in some large cities in England and on the continent that an infinitesimal portion of those large populations were church-going people, and fewer still were true Christians at heart. Christianity is not the religion for India. Give sons of India education; let education reach those utterly neglected classes in the interior of the country; let the government adopt measures to dispel that wretched and abject poverty that characterizes the land, and I maintain, without fear of contradiction, that the people instead of accepting any religion of later growth will revert to the study of the ancient religions of their forefathers. As long as they strictly confine their operations to spreading education among the people without interfering with their religions—which it is doubtful they would ever do—the Christian missionaries are welcome; but in other respects they have no sphere for their work in India. All money spent upon them is wasted.

Having taken up so much of your time, gentlemen, I do not feel justified in detaining you a minute longer with these desultory remarks. However, before we part this evening, let me assure you that our friends of the Theosophical Society are not impostors, nor have they come here to make money. They ask you merely to join them, feel their influence, assist them in your own work without parting with any sums of your money that shall go to their pocket or be spent after their comforts. In evidence of what I say the statement of income and expenditure of the society laid before you to-day speaks for itself. Let me also assure you that if any of you join the society with the avowed object of witnessing those occult phenomena, to gratify any vulgar curiosity, you will be sadly disappointed. It is to be regretted that the Indian public should have identified the founders of this society with jugglers or conjurers. To view an exhibition of that kind one had better go to those caterers of public amusements, who every now and then come to Bombay. But let me declare here that Madam Blavatsky, the authoress of "Isis Unveiled," a book justly styled a "monument of human industry and learning," and Col. Olcott, of versatile literary talents, are persons far superior to any jugglers or conjurers who have ever trod the Indian soil. They have come to India, not to seek for gold or to enrich themselves with any profitable pursuit, which is the end of most of the people who come from Europe, but they have come here to live till the natural period of their existence, and labor for the cause of science and truth in India, and die in harness in this very country of their adoption.

At the conclusion of Mr. Shroff's remarks the meeting broke into a grand burst of applause. Many respectable Parsee and Hindoo gentlemen crowded up on the platform to express their compliments and thanks to Col. Olcott and the other speakers. I was cordially greeted by many persons. This meeting of course brought out the ire of Mr. Cook and his friends, and the most slanderous reports were published against the society and myself.

At a special meeting of the Bombay branch of the Theosophical Society, held at the society's hall in Breach Candy, on the evening of January 15, 1882, the following resolutions were, upon motion of Dr. Pandurang Gopal, seconded by Mr. Tookaram Tatya, unanimously adopted by acclamation.

Resolved, That the scandalously unfair and misleading report of the anniversary meeting of the parent Theosophical Society, held on the 12th inst., at the Framji Cowasji Institute, which appeared in the Times of India of January 14th, deserves public condemnation. We recognize in this as well as in the previous scurrilous attacks of a like character upon themselves and ourselves in the Calcutta Statesman and other Anglo-Indian and inspired native journals, covered assaults upon the religious ideas of the different castes of India through their proved and unselfish friends, the founders of the Theosophical Society.

We also declare that, so far from our confidence in Colonel Olcott and Madam Blavatsky being abated by these Christian defamations of their private character, we, the members of the Bombay branch, feel drawn all the closer to them, and now publicly declare that the labors of the aforesaid founders—all of which have come under our personal observation—have been unselfish and philanthropic. We recognize in them the true allies of every native of India, whether a Parsee, a Hindoo, a Mussulman, or of any other caste, who would improve the intellectual, moral, or spiritual condition of his countrymen.

The slanders of Cook & Co. were bitter upon myself, alluding to those private letters and to the unfair remarks of Scribner's Monthly after my return from prison. Cook dictated an article in the Times of India replete with such malicious falsehoods as he so well knows how to use. Subsequently the following letters were sent him:

WALKEHSWAR, BOMBAY, Jan. 18, 1882.

SIR: In your public lectures you have affirmed:

1. That Christianity is of divine origin.
2. That it is destined to spread over the earth.
3. That no other religion is of divine origin.

In reply, I maintain that neither of these propositions is true. If you are prepared to make them good, and not ask the people of Aryavarta to accept your statements without proof, I will be happy to meet you for discussion. I name next Sunday evening at 5:30 at which time I am to lecture at the Framji Cowasji Institute. Or, if that should not be convenient to you, then you may name your own time and place in Bombay. As neither of us speaks the other's language, I stipulate that our respective arguments shall be translated to the other, and that a shorthand report of the same shall be signed by us both. The discussion must also be held in the presence of respectable witnesses brought by each party, of whom at least three or four shall sign the report with us; and the whole to be placed in pamphlet form, so that the public may judge for themselves which religion is most divine.

DAYANAND SARASWATI.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE, Jan. 18, 1882

SIR: Those who resort to misleading statements about an opponent are commonly believed to give thus the best proof that they are advocating a weak cause. It pleased you to make before a large audience yesterday certain allegations about my probable motives in coming to India, my standing in America, and the character and objects of the Theosophical Society, which are far from true and clearly belied by the facts. I have too strong a regard for the good opinion of the Asiatic people to permit them to be deceived by such easily refuted calumnies. I have, therefore, set aside other engagements, and on Friday evening, at the Framji Institute, Dhobi Talao, will state my side of the case. I challenge you to meet me at that time and say what you can against my society, its cause, or myself.

Your obedient servant, H. S. OLCOTT, Pres Theos. Soc.

CROW'S NEST BUNGALOW, Jan. 18, 1882.

SIR: You have defamed my character, impugned my motives, and cast a slur upon the whole Freethought party who take the liberty of thinking for themselves. That the Indian public may know whether your several statements are true or false, I shall make, on Friday evening, at 5:30, at the Framji Cowasji Institute, a public statement. On that occasion I invite you to meet me face to face and answer the statements I shall make. Your failure to do so would be construed into an inability to substantiate the reckless allegations flung out under the protection of a crowd of sympathizers.

Should you plead other engagements, I may say that to meet your calumnies I have myself put off my engagement. Like yourself, I am on a voyage around the world, and have no time to waste.

For the whole truth, yours, etc, D. M. BENNETT.

It is to be seen from the foregoing notes that a second meeting was to be held at Framji Cowasji Hall on the 20th inst. for the purpose of refuting the slanders of Joseph Cook against the Theosophical Society and myself. He received the first two notes, but mine was returned unopened. The following note to Col. Olcott was handed in on the occasion of our meeting on the evening of the 20th, and was read to the meeting:

BOMBAY, Jan. 20, 1882.

COL. OLCOTT, OF THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, BOMBAY, Sir: I am not open to challenges of which the evident object is to advertise Infidelity.

You ask me to sit on your platform with a man whose career has been described in an unanswerable article in Scribner's Monthly as "The Apotheothis of Dirt." No honorable man can keep company of this kind. For using this man as a weapon with which to attack Christianity the enlightened public sentiment of India will hold the Theosophical Society to a stern account. Men are measured by their heroes.

Several days before I received your communication I was definitely engaged to be in Poonah on the night proposed for your meeting in Bombay. Yours, etc., JOSEPH COOK.

At a second meeting the hall was packed to overflowing, and hundreds who were unable to gain admittance were obliged to turn back. Captain Brown, of an English regiment in the northern part of India, was chosen chairman. Colonel Olcott introduced me to the audience, when I spoke as follows:

Friends, Ladies, and Gentlemen: In justice to yourselves, in justice to my friends who reside among you, in justice to myself, I beg your attention for a short time while I attempt to refute the misrepresentations which have been made in your midst respecting myself and others; and I crave your indulgence if, in repelling those attacks, I am compelled to dwell somewhat upon my own personal affairs.

There is no character more justly detested by good people in all parts of the world than the falsifier, the defamer, the maligner, the slanderer, who with falsehood and malice in his heart wilfully attempts to injure and destroy the reputation of a fellow-being. The greatest wrong any of us can commit is to injure those of our own kind, whether in property, in peace of mind, or in reputation. A good character is justly prized by us all above all other possessions. To have this assaulted, defamed, and traduced injures us more painfully than to rob us of money or property.

Mr. Joseph Cook, of my own country, has been among you, and has seen fit to attack me and the cause I serve in an unwarranted and untruthful manner, and I feel it my duty to meet his charges in this public way. He has attacked me in his public lectures; he has attacked me in the public press by furnishing falsehoods to damage me, rejoicing that he here found journalists so unscrupulous as to become mediums for his defamations. [The two editors of the Times of India are reported to be keepers of women not their wives.] He has attacked and endeavored to injure those whom you know to be very worthy people simply because they recognized me and permitted me to address you for a few minutes in this hall.

Mr. Cook has been my enemy for several years. He has made attacks upon me in my own country. He has spoken falsely of me; he has slandered many good people whom I am proud to call friends. He has poured upon us all the vile epithets which he was able to command, and this because we could not believe divine the system of religion which he advocates and attempts to build up.

Though I am not a learned man, I have been an earnest advocate of what I conceived to be the truth. I do not believe the Christian religion is the faultless system which its advocates claim for it, and I have endeavored by fair arguments to show this. This has been my offense. For this I have been denounced over and over again.

In one of his public lectures in America Mr Cook denounced me as a "cancer-planter," and applied similar epithets to the Freethought party. I exposed his falsehoods, refuted his slanders, and to show there is more impurity and immorality in his own ranks than among those who are opposed to him, I cited three hundred cases of Christian clergymen in America who, according to the public papers, had been detected in crimes of various kinds, particularly of the crimes of adultery and seduction. And since that time an able American lawyer has given more attention to the subject, and he has made up a pamphlet, taken from the published reports in our country, of six hundred Christian clergymen who have been guilty of nearly all the crimes in the calendar, but more frequently crimes of adultery. I can send you the pamphlets containing the accounts of these crimes if you desire them.

These immoralities covered a wide field, and many of them were of a most revolting character. Let me mention a case or two as specimens. Henry Ward Beecher is a popular Christian clergyman who, I believe, belongs to the same denomination with Mr. Cook. He was accused of the crime of adultery with a married woman—a sister in his church. This clergyman was considered the greatest preacher in America, and, I believe, received the largest salary of any clergyman in the country. The scandal was great and created intense excitement throughout the length and breadth of the land. The papers were full of it, and everybody was talking of it. A trial was at length the result. The injured husband prosecuted the clergyman. The trial lasted six months. Most damaging letters and confessions of the clergyman were produced upon the trial, which carried conviction of the man's guilt to the hearts of millions of his countrymen. Large numbers of his fellow-Christians, of course, sustained him, and his own church raised the sum of $100,000, or 225,000 rupees, to defray the expenses of the suit; and very naturally there was a division of opinion, and so it was with the jury—they did not agree. But probably not less than twenty-five million of the American people firmly believed the man guilty, who added to the blackness of his crime by going himself upon the witness stand and for thirteen days perjured himself, adding great guilt to the crime he had already committed. That man is still preaching to one of the largest churches in America, and is still drawing one of the heaviest salaries paid to any man for talking for Jesus. But this has not disturbed Joseph Cook. He has not been shocked by the immorality of this case. He has never denounced Mr. Beecher in his lectures, and doubtless still recognizes him as a brother in Christ.

Another case was a presiding elder, in Tennessee, who had for thirty years been preaching the gospel of Jesus; he had several churches under his supervision. He had become advanced in years, and was regarded as a father of the church, but letters of a most improper character, to one of the young women of his fold, were discovered, in which he made criminal propositions, and he was forced to confess his guilt and retire from his priestly office. A very similar case was that of Bishop McCoskry, of Michigan. He was seventy-five years of age, and for nearly half a century had been a leader in the Christian church, and long at the head of the Episcopal church in Michigan, but he also fell, to the extent of writing improper letters to a young woman under his charge. There are hundreds of similar cases among us, but I have not time to point them out. I only allude to these cases to give you a slight idea of what crimes are committed by Christian clergymen, and how little Mr. Cook is troubled about them. I have never heard of his being shocked at these Christian immoralties; I never heard of his denouncing one of the sinful saints of his own religion, for all his horror, all his invective, all his vemon and malice seem to be directed toward those who differ from him in religious belief, and who dare question the truth of his religion.

I may truthfully say this man has pursued me for several years, and has spoken falsely of me upon many occasions, and it is not strange that he should continue it here. He also appeared at the time of my trial, and sitting side by side with the vile man who had caused my arrest, gave countenance to the prosecution, and such influence as he had with that Christian jury he threw against me, as much as to say, "I am in favor of this man's conviction." I may say I owe, in part, at least, my conviction to the influence of Joseph Cook.

But let me examine his charges in detail. He has tried to make you believe me a criminal, because I have been arrested, tried, convicted, and imprisoned; but I beg to assure you that that does not necessarily prove me a criminal. Did the arrest, trial, conviction, and sentence to death of the old Greek philosopher Socrates make him a criminal? Has the world thought any the less of him because he was imprisoned and sentenced to death for his opinion? Does Mr. Cook, or any of his Christian friends, think any the less of Jesus because he was arrested, tried, convicted, and executed for expressing his religious sentiments? Was not Jesus treated even more severely than myself, and did that constitute him a greater criminal? Does the world to-day esteem Galileo any the less because he was arrested and seven years imprisoned for entertaining the honest belief that the earth is a globe and revolves around the sun, and for announcing that belief?

The catalogue of men who have been unjustly arrested, tried, convicted, imprisoned, or executed for exercising the right of thinking and expressing their thoughts is a very long one, and it embraces many of the best men who have lived. In all, they amount to millions, and among them are the sagest philosophers and the purest men of this world. Michael Servetus was imprisoned and burnt. Giordano Bruno was convicted and burnt because he did not gauge his belief according to prescribed rules. Lucilius Vanini was treated in the same cruel manner. John Bunyan was a long time in prison; so was Richard Baxter. Sir Walter Raleigh was fourteen years in prison, and then beheaded. Bishops Hooper, Latimer, and Cranmer were burnt at the stake; John Rogers shared the same fate. George Fox and William Penn were sent to prison for their opinions. Thomas Paine was sent to prison, though he had committed no crime. Robert Taylor, Richard Carlisle, and other advocates of Freethought have been sent to prison for the commission of no crime save that of thinking for themselves, and for daring to tell their thoughts. Thousands—yes, hundreds of thousands—of perfectly innocent people have not only been arrested and imprisoned, but put to the most cruel deaths which the ingenuity of man could invent, and all in the name of religion and morality. Nothing is better proved than that conviction and imprisonment are not necessarily proofs of guilt.

The pretext upon which I was arrested was the selling or mailing of an argumentative and physiological pamphlet of much the same character as the one for which Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant were arrested and convicted in England. Thousands of copies of it had been sold before I sold it, and many thousands have been sold since my conviction. The largest booksellers in New York city have sold many copies of it, and Mr. Cook has not said a word against them on account of it.

The author of the pamphlet had been unjustly sent to prison for selling it, by the same prosecutors who sent me, and believing there was nothing criminal in it, that every person had a right to buy it, to read it, and to sell it. and being a bookseller, and my customers wishing it, I exercised the right of selling it, and this while the author was in prison.

That the pamphlet is not criminal or indecent I have the decided opinion of thousands of clear-minded people of our country, including lawyers, judges, literary men, and even fair-minded clergymen. And more than that, the president of the United States, the members of his cabinet, of the department of justice, including the attorney-general of the United States, gave it as their opinion that the work is not obscene, and my Christian prosecutor was instructed by them to arrest no more persons for selling that book. And none have been arrested since, though many thousand copies have been sold. The president and the heads of his government distinctly declared that I had committed no crime and deserved no imprisonment. Their word is worth far more than that of Joseph Cook.

After my conviction over 200,000 of my fellow-citizens, fully believing I had committed no crime, signed a petition to the president to release me, and not less than ten thousand letters were sent him asking for the same justice. The president saw that my conviction was unjust, and ordered a pardon to be made out. But just at that moment the clergymen of the Cook stamp and the Christian people of the country, as Mr. Cook told you, remonstrated with the president against my release. They appealed to him to keep me in prison. These remonstrances flowed in from all directions. The president's wife, who is a bigoted Christian, took strong grounds against me, and the president hesitated, and finally decided to not release me. The church was too strong for me, and my unjust imprisonment was continued, though a greater number of persons asked for my release than ever before signed a petition for any individual. I think Mr. Cook was one who worked against my release, and it is now very easy for him to inveigh against me.

Mr. Cook said I had a fair trial. This is untrue. A more unfair trial has not been known for a hundred years. I was not allowed to introduce any evidence save to show that I had through life maintained a good character. This I proved by persons who had known me from childhood. But I was not allowed to introduce the evidence of competent judges, including fifty authors, publishers, booksellers, philologists, and literary men generally, as to the character of the book I sold. Not one was allowed to testify. My attorney also wished to compare the little book with the works of standard authors which are in the principal libraries of the world to show that no more objectionable language was employed in the book I sold than in scores of others, and not so much so; but this was overruled. Nothing of the kind was allowed. My attorney then wished to read the entire work to the jury; this was not allowed. Next, my attorney wished to show that the Christian man who acted as my prosecutor, and who was the chief witness against me, had perjured himself in his evidence against me, which I was prepared to show by three witnesses, but this was also overruled. I was not allowed to show that the evidence which convicted me was perjured evidence. I was prejudged. It was a foregone conclusion that I must be convicted. Being an old man, it was thought a term of imprisonment would break me down and that my publications would be discontinued. The unjust judge before whom I was tried gave such a partial ruling against me as would convict any bookseller in the world; and when, after deliberating several hours, the jury appealed to the judge for further instructions, he virtually enjoined them to find me guilty, and thus my conviction was secured, and for no crime whatever.

Mr. Cook calls me a poisoner of youth. It is utterly false. I never poisoned a youth. I have never addressed a book or a circular to youth. The books and paper I publish are not of a character to attract the attention of young people, but persons of mature minds; and their object is to eradicate poison and not to plant it. I never sold one of the pamphlets on which I was convicted to youth, nor did I ever hear of a youth who read it. It is a dry physiological treatise, and has no attraction for young people.

It is also insinuated in the unjust remarks which Mr Coo dictated, and which he approved, that I have even poisoned the minds of the youth of Bombay by immoral circulars, etc. A greater falsehood could not be uttered. I brought no circulars of any kind with me, nor have I sent one to anybody, old or young. I have had no communication with the youth of Bombay, either to poison them or to give them an antidote for poison.

Mr. Cook says I am a promoter of vice, and am profiting largely by such immoral traffic. This is maliciously and wickedly false. I have sold nothing pertaining to vice, and have no desire to. My whole object and desire has been and is to disseminate truth, and to employ only good arguments in its defense. If he means that I made large profits on the little pamphlet for which I was imprisoned, he is false again. As it sold for less than five annas of your money, and I bought and paid for them, and sold but a limited number, you will see at once that my profits could not amount to a very large sum. I may truthfully say that the defense against my unjust prosecution cost me a thousand times more than the profits on the little book.

As to the letters which he has referred to, I can only say what I said before, that I had written indiscreet letters, but not criminal, and letters that injured nobody. Whatever they were, they were private, and the public had no business with them. Let me add here that Justice Story, one of the first judges we have had in our country, in trying a case where private letters had been used without the consent of the writer, gave it as his judicial opinion that the private letters are sacred, and that it is culpable to publish them without the consent not only of the person who received them, but of the person who wrote them. I wish not to detract from any honor which Mr

Cook or any other man can gain in consequence of the unauthorized and culpable publication of private letters, though he seems to be a man capable of that kind of business.

I believe I have now noticed his principal falsehoods against myself, and I beg your pardon for dwelling so long upon what is of a personal and private character, but it seems necessary to show you the real character of my maligner—the man who defends crime and denounces virtue, a man who defends the perjurer and pursues the man who tells the truth. He defends the man who caused me all the trouble I had, who I can prove has committed perjury on numerous occasions; a man who has caused the arrest, imprisonment, and great unhappiness to many innocent persons and to their families, cruel almost as death. This man, Mr. Cook, defames and denounces me who have endeavored through life to do injury to none. This may serve to show you what kind of a man this slanderer is, and how much his word is entitled to be believed. All I have stated I can furnish unquestionable proofs for.

Let us glance at a few of the other statements of Mr. Cook. He tells you that skepticism—unbelief in the doctrines of Christianity, and Freethought—is decreasing in the United States. I know this to be false, and I have good opportunities for knowing. Ten years ago there was but one Freethought journal published in the United States; now there are six. There are ten times more Freethought books, pamphlets, and tracts printed than ten years ago, and ten times as many people are reading them. There was never such a general disposition to examine into the truth or falsehood of existing creeds by people of all classes at the present time. There are ten times more Freethought lecturers now in America than ten years ago. I think I speak only the truth when I say that there are in our country to-day ten times more skeptics, unbelievers in supernatural religion, and Freethinkers than ten years ago, and they were never increasing so fast as at the present time.

Mr. Cook also tells you that Christianity is increasing rapidly in our country, and is daily becoming stronger. This is equally untrue. Faith in supernaturalism and Christianity is yearly growing weaker among us. The churches themselves are becoming thoroughly honeycombed with skepticism and unbelief. It is still fashionable to be considered orthodox, and to be counted among the believers in the current system of religion, but the scientists are at work and have done good service. They deal in nature's truths. Tens of thousands of their volumes have been read with avidity, and the result is that blind faith in the obsolete fables and claims of the past is giving way, faith in the supernatural is lessening, as I said, in the churches, and tens of thousands are seeking for something better than ecclesiastical absurdities. To rebut Mr. Cook's statements, I need only call attention to the fact that the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, one of the first clergymen in our country, has published his views on the lifelessness of religion among the churches, and has made the statement that the addition to the churches only amounts to two members each every year, and through the country not enough to make up for the deaths that occur. The Rev. Dr. McCosh, of Princeton University, one of the first theological institutions of the country, in a wail which he very recently sent abroad, admitted that fewer of the young men than formerly are offering themselves as candidates for the clergy, and that clergymen are absolutely decreasing in numbers.

Again, Mr. Cook tells you how the missionary societies in the world are rapidly increasing their effectiveness, that the cause is in a very prosperous condition, and that in another hundred years India herself with her 250,000,000 will be more than half converted to Christianity. To meet his highly colored statements I need only read to you some of the statements of the Reverend Doctor Theodore Christlieb, professor of theology and university preacher of Bonn, Prussia, in his late work on foreign missions. In recounting the difficulties under which the missionary cause labors, he says:

The sudden and ofttimes brutal advance of white settlers, of gold-diggers, of brandy merchants, and others, with all their demoralizing influence, splits up and scatters the church as yet hardly formed, and increases exisiting native prejudices to an almost unconquerable hatred of every white face. I need only refer to South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and many of the Indian territories of North America. To undermine a large stronghold of darkness, like Hindooism, was, and is in itself, a sufficiently heavy undertaking. What must it be there, when, as now, the Hindoos confront the missionary with questions from Hegel, Strauss, Renan? When, in addition to the ancient superstitions, modern Infidelity has to be combated? When the youth of heathendom, thirsting for knowledge, are instructed—as in Japan they are—by Materialistic professors: and when, as often happens, students in the colleges abandon superstition only to adopt complete religious indifference or Nihilism?

Hatred to Catholics is thus shown:

Where, in the present day, can Protestant missions make any great stride in advance, without Rome immediately following close at their heels? In Madagascar and Central Africa, in the South Seas and in British North America, wherever Rome can, she seeks by her influence to paralyze the advance of the gospel.

Still the growing question of the darkness is perhaps a sign of the progress of the light—a proof that the line of attack is being extended. But what if the darkest clouds in the missionaries' sky are to be found not so much in the various phenomena presented by the hostile country as in the atmosphere of the churches at home? Where is there now that deep enthusiasm such as existed in the founding of the most of our missionary societies? When, in September, 1795, aged and venerable churchmen and dissenters embraced with tears in the chapel of Lady Huntingdon, and reaching each other the hand across the barriers of denominationalism formed the London Missionary Society? Or when, again, at the ordination of the first four Barmen missionaries the offering-plates were filled, not with money only, but with golden chains, watches, rings, and ornaments of all kinds? Where is all that now?

Till recently, as the considerable increase in the revenues of the various societies showed, the interest at home kept pace, from decenium to decenium, with the growing extent of missionary enterprise. For a few years back, however, deficits in many of the great societies—in Germany more especially—have become chronic. Is this a consequence only of the widespread commercial and agricultural depression and temporary? Or will the funds permit no greater drain on them for some time to come? Many seem actually to think that any farther demand on the material resources of the friends of missions would be a very questionable policy. Already some of the boards of direction, in spite of many of the earnest appeals from heathen lands, have felt themselves compelled to take up the question of limited and diminished supplies. Even in England and America, here and there, the necessity for retrenchments casts a heavy cloud on the prospects of the future. . . . I am convinced that on a mere comparison of past and present, the balance is not altogether in favor of the present, and that as we owe more thanks to God that he has, not so much by us as in spite of us, in spite of the lukewarmness and worldliness of our Christianity, permitted such rapid advances to be made toward the completion of his own work (pages 26, 27, 28, 29, 30).

The following may be taken as a wail with regard to Palestine:

Alas, that this land must be included among the fields of missionary labor! This land, beloved as no other, wept over as none, hoped for as none; the land of promise, the apple of the eye of God and man, the cradle of truth and freedom. Fain would we think of her as a garden of God, with angels ascending and descending as of old. . . . Here there is read aloud the lesson, for the stones cry out, and the ruins bear witness of what God has done in mercy and judgment. But the inhabitants, Turks and Jews, and alas! Christians, too, will not understand it. The messengers of the gospel must come from afar to interpret the language of these ruins and proclaim alike to Jewish unbelief and Christian idolatry that God must be worshiped in spirit and truth, that so the despised, long-rejected Lord may again be made possessor of his inheritance. Yes, a land of missions, but a barren one. Amidst the marvelous divisions of its many Christians and non-Christian parties and sects; tilled by missionary societies, but yielding little fruit" (pages 149 and 150).

Hear what he says about your own land:

Thus, then, we see that, in this ancient land of civilization, it is precisely those races and classes of people which, in religion and social position, have relatively come least under the influence of heathen culture, that are most accessible to Christianity; whilst the real strongholds of the Hindoo religion and civilization—the north with its Benares, one may say all the higher, better educated castes and more enlightened tribes generally of India—still stand out defiant, like a mighty fortress, which, though besieged indeed, is far yet from being taken (p. 173).

The best that can be said respecting these extracts is that they present a far less rose-colored view of the missionary field than the representations of Mr. Cook. According to this higher authority, it appears that the world is not being converted to Christianity so rapidly as the representations of this man would lead you to think. In fact, Mr. Cook is guilty of misrepresentation in this matter.

I will leave it with you to decide whether this man, who certainly possesses means for knowing the facts quite equal to Mr. Cook, presents as many hopes for the speedy spread of Christianity over the world as does Mr. Cook.

I will leave it with you to decide if, as Mr. Cook boasts, £1,2500,000 ($6,250,000), or a crore and a half of rupees, are annually expended in the cause of foreign missions, whether it is the best possible use that could be made of the money; whether the same amount of money used in schools of science, in erecting industrial establishments for the people, in making good roads and highways, in draining marshy and waste lands, in works for irrigation, and in thousands of other ways, would not do more good to the world. I leave it for you to decide whether the progress of the missionary cause among yourselves is commensurate with the money and talent expended in that line. I submit it to you if the missionaries, who come among you to bring you a new religion, do not expend the money they bring with them in living comfortably in fine residences, in dressing well, and in having around them all the comforts of life. I ask of you to say whether they are the self-denying class which they are represented to be. I will leave it with you to decide whether those among you who have made a profession of Christianity are really much better and more moral in consequence. I will leave it with you to decide whether, if the people of England—the first Christian nation—expend £70,000,000 ($350,000,000), or eighty-four crore of rupees, for intoxicating drinks which produce crime and wretchedness, as is authoratively stated to be the case, I leave it with you, I say, to decide whether you wish that kind of Christianity to spread over India.

Whether India will become Christian in another century, I think, depends much upon yourselves and your offspring. In my opinion, Mr. Cook's prediction is a very wild one. I doubt not many reforms could profitably be effected in your country. If idol-worship and baseless superstitions could be done away, by an increased knowledge of science, nature, and truth, I would hail the change with joy, but I do not wish to see you embrace Christianity, for I do not believe it would make you any better or happier. It would be likely to make you greater hypocrites, more false, but it would not make you better people, nor more moral.

Mr. Cook would have you believe that Christianity is a divine system of religion, handed down directly from heaven, and that it is the only religion that has enjoyed that great good fortune. I deem him as wrong in this—as wide from the truth—as in the other statements he has made. I wish we had time to enter into an examination of this subject. His position is either true or it is false, and since it has been truthfully said, that "it is better to suffer for speaking the truth, rather than that truth shall suffer for want of speaking," it is well to investigate this important subject.

I have paid considerable attention to the subject of the gods and religions of the world, and I have fully come to the belief that all the religions I know anything about are man-made; all of human production, and Christianity is no exception to the rule.

Mr. Cook insists that all other religions are man-made except Christianity, on which subject I shall have no quarrel with him, but I shall insist, if in looking over the entire field and investigating all the claims that Christianity has to offer we find there is nothing in it but what is contained in the other man-made religions, that it must be decided that it also is a man-made religion. If there is a personal, intelligent, and infinite God who has from everlasting ruled over the destinies of this world, and yet left its inhabitants to grope in darkness for thousands of years with no religions save those produced by men, until, less than two thousand years ago, he undertook the grand enterprise of sending a true religion down to earth from his own throne—a religion which the children of men needed to take them to heaven and to save them from the everlasting burning which must otherwise overwhelm them, I say it would be most natural to expect that such a religion would, in a few respects, at least, be unlike the old man-made religions which had existed for thousands of years. But, alas! it is not so. If Christianity is that divine religion it is no better than the man-made religions that preceded it. For upon giving it the closest scrutiny I cannot find that there is anything new or original in it. I cannot find one dogma, rite or sacrament in it not also to be found in these older man-made systems.

Now, this is so, or it is not; and it is better for all of us to know which it is. If Mr. Cook can succeed in showing that I have been in prison, if he can show that I have not been the most perfect man in the world, even if he could make you believe that there is danger of my stealing the Himalaya Mountains, or of carrying away two or three of the famous rock temples of your country, it would make no difference in this question of the only divine system of religion. No matter how bad a man he can make you believe me to be, it will not prove Christianity to be true; nor prove Brahmanism, and Zorastrinism, and Buddhism, and Confucianism to be false. Truth does not stand, let us rejoice, upon so slender a foundation.

Before leaving the subject, I wish to say this much in my own behalf: While I cheerfully admit that I am not perfect, that I am not a saint, that there are better men than myself in the world, I must claim that I have tried to do as well as I could; I have endeavored to be an honest man; I have wished to wrong none of my fellow-beings, and I am not conscious that I have wronged any. This is all I have to boast of, and I do not speak this to boast.

Mr. Cook attempts to establish Christianity by science, and to show that Christianity and science harmonize, but in this I think he is as wide of the truth as in his slanderous statements. I would like some person to show me wherein Christianity is scientific or wherein the Bible is scientific. I claim that neither Moses, nor Jesus, nor a single writer of the Bible has enunciated a single scientific truth or thought. They even did not know the earth is round, a simple fact which now every schoolboy understands. They talked about the "ends of the earth," the "corners of the earth," the "foundations of the earth," and that is a fair specimen of all the science they possessed. The fact is, the writers of the Bible were very ignorant people, judged in the light of the present day. They knew not that the sun is larger than the earth; nothing about the strata of the earth; nothing about the coal formation; nothing about the glacial period; nothing about man in prehistoric times. They had very little or no scientific information, and it is simply absurd and untruthful in Mr. Cook to pretend that science has any connection with either the Bible or Christianity.

Without attempting to give all I said, I will remark that I closed my little speech by making a hurried review of Christianity, and enlarging on some of the points. I showed that Christianity is not new or original; that everything in its stock of trade is borrowed from older systems; that the myth of God begetting a son is far older than Christianity; that the crucifixion of the sons of gods as an atonement is older in other religions than in Christianity; that miracles have been claimed for nearly all the old religions; that the story of Jesus and his religion is wholly unhistorical; that there is no corroborating proof, contemporaneous or otherwise; that what are called the four gospels in our New Testament were not known by the early fathers, were not known by the early churches, and probably were not written till about the year 181; that many of the early Christian fathers were designing and dishonest men, capable of using deception and fraud; that they were also full of contentions; that Christianity has not been a religion of love and peace, but the bloodiest religion in the world, and its bright lights and champions among the worst tyrants the world has known; that it has fostered ignorance, and retarded science and learning; that Christianity has favored slavery and the worst forms of oppression; that it has opposed the advancement of woman; that Christianity has not been the source of civilization in the world claimed for it, but that it has depended far more on science and general intelligence; that Christianity is unprogressive in its nature, being established nearly two thousand years ago as a perfect system, incapable of further progress or improvement; that Christianity does not teach the highest class of truths, founded, as it is, upon the untruthful claims of the supernatural, etc., etc.

There was abundant applause during my imperfectly delivered remarks.

Col. Olcott, in a speech of an hour and a half, by extracts from the American press and numerous letters from many distinguished officials and men of position in America, showed that Cook's statements that the Theosophical Society was comparatively unknown in America, and that its founders had but little standing there, are wholly false. He also showed that Mr. Cook's representations that the Spiritualists of America are a disreputable set, and that he knew of only about ten persons among them who were men of good sense, etc., were only slanderous statements. The colonel gave a large number of persons in the Spiritualistic ranks who stand high in intelligence and worth.

Upon the whole, Colonel Olcott fully vindicated the Theosophical Society and showed Joseph Cook to be simply an untruthful and malignant slanderer. Of this fact the natives here appear thoroughly convinced.

The following circular—written by a native, and printed and circulated pretty freely at Cook's last lecture—very fairly represents the effect which his five lectures have had upon the native element:

The native public of Bombay take this opportunity to thank Mr. Joseph Cook for the trouble he has taken to come to Bombay and preach Christianity to the English-speaking native and European residents of this great city. But at the same time they think it proper to inform the reverend gentleman that he should not leave them with the idea that his eloquent but flimsy, unargumentative, and merely rhetorical lectures have produced any impression whatever on their minds with respect to the truth of Christianity. Many flocked to his lectures merely to witness the magnificent tamasha [show]. Hence the large number of hearers he succeeded in obtaining. Let him and his colleagues rest assured that Christianity will never succeed in India. Nothing more need be said.

NATIVE PUBLIC VOICE.

I may add that since the second meeting both Mr. Cook and Col. Olcott have gone to Poonah, over a hundred miles to the southeast of this city, where both made speeches, and where, true to his malignant nature, Cook again repeated his aspersions against the Theosophical Society. The colonel sent a challenge to Cook to meet him on the same platform, taking the occasion to say that I was not present and could not longer serve as an excuse for his refusal to meet the colonel on the same platform; but the false-hearted man then took another dodge under the pretext that he could not meet him, as he could do nothing to advertise or aid Infidelity. He far prefers to use slander and defamation, in an ungentlemanly and under-handed way, to meeting his antagonists fairly, face to face.

I am able to report, however, that Cook has not made a good impression in India, though he commenced with all the pomposity of a war-horse. Some of the papers here have at last spoken quite slightly of him, pronouncing his speeches unargumentative, and saying that the quality most conspicuous in him is his "bumptiousness." At Poonah Cook undertook to get his audience to repeat the Lord's prayer with him, but they declined. He got angry and said something about casting pearls before swine. This was resented by many, when an intelligent Englishman present took the occasion to say that he had resided in India nearly twenty years, and he had never had any occasion to compare the natives to swine. Cook attempted a lame apology, but it was not well received. The intelligent native population are greatly disgusted with him, and regard him as not only a very unfair man but as a malicious liar. He is not accomplishing very much toward building up the cause of Jesus here.

Pardon me for having so much to say about Joseph Cook, for I presume you think about as little of him as I do. But there is considerable being said hereabouts of him. I would give extracts of what he has said in his speehes and in his dictated newspaper articles of a slanderous character, but have not the papers within reach.

Trusting I may be able to write you something of a more interesting character about India, I am

Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Bombay and Its Surroundings.

BOMBAY, Jan. 24, 1882.

DISTANT FRIENDS: There is not a little about this town that will interest you, but I presume I will not think of everything which I ought to. Let me first mention the Theosophist, a monthly quarto magazine of thirty-two pages, published by Madam H. P. Blavatsky and Col. Olott, "devoted," as it claims, "to oriental philosophy, art, literature, and occultism, embracing mesmerism, Spiritualism, and other secret societies." It was commenced in October, 1879, some ten months after the arrival here of the two managers, and, what seems singular, has been self-sustaining since the issue of the first four numbers. It goes all over India and Ceylon, and is gradually increasing in circulation. It is ably conducted and contains many interesting and original articles. I will have something to tell you of occultism after some other subjects are disposed of.

Bombay is a pleasant and flourishing town. Within the past few years it has acquired an importance not possessed earlier, and which, in a commercial point of view, places it ahead of other cities in India. Calcutta is still the seat of vice-regal government, and is an important city, but Bombay has the greater amount of commercial trade with Europe and the Western world. This change, which is one of gradual growth, is but natural, owing very greatly to the completion of the Suez Canal, by which the commerce with England and the rest of Europe was greatly facilitated and increased. Also the opening of various parts of India by railway, connecting with Bombay, has largely increased the commerce and travel of the town.

Unlike most seaport towns, Bombay is not located upon a river, but is built upon one of a cluster of islands connected with each other and the main-land by artificial roads or causeways, thus making the bay one of the finest in the world. These are all proofs of volcanic formation on the part of some of the islands, and some of the smaller ones seem to be the remains or extinct volcanoes. One of these islands, and perhaps more, is used as a fortification, heavy guns, which sweep the whole harbor, being planted thereon. There are also two heavy floating batteries.

The usual landing-place is called Apollo Bunder, attractive and fine-looking buildings ornamenting the front, and very fine buildings being all along further back on the Esplanade. Several tramways are in operation, which carry passengers the distance of three miles or more to northern and north-eastern portions of the city.

Two fine marble statues adorn the European part of the city; first, that of Queen Victoria, the empress of India, opposite the fine post-office, and the other of her son, the Prince of Wales, on the Esplanade. Amongst the numerous public buildings may be mentioned the Town Hall, in which the Asiatic Society have a large library and museum of Indian antiquities, including idols, etc.; the mint, St. Thomas's Cathedral, the Sailor's Home, the public works offices, post-office, telegraph office, the high court offices, the sectariat, the Sassoon Mechanics' Institute, and the University buildings. These and long rows of business houses would do honor to any city.

A ramble through the native bazars is very interesting, which present, with their busy little shops, vivid pictures of oriental life and manners. A European recently from the West seeing the unclad appearance of the lower classes of the natives, nearly entirely naked, will easily be shocked, but he soon becomes familiar with this marked feature of the place, and the daily burning, glaring sun, even in the winter time, soon teaches him that clothing is not necessary to keep away the cold. The better classes are clad in clean white robes or garments of muslin; pants, however, being worn by none. The legs are invariably uncovered. It is the lower classes, as observed, who go the nearest unclad, and these perform the most menial labors, like being scavengers of the city, carrying away the contents of the privies, and cleaning up the droppings of animals in the streets, drying the same in cakes for fuel. This work is principally performed by the women of the lower caste, who gather it up with their hands, and then take it to some open lot where they can obtain water, when the dung is wet, if necessary, and kneeded and rolled out in round cakes from four to six inches in diameter, and three-fourths of an inch thick. These soon dry, exposed to the rays of the India sun, when they are ready for market. They are usually packed edgewise in round, shallow baskets, twenty-five to thirty inches in diameter and piled up nearly two feet high, making two or three bushels by measurement. Low caste women may be seen carrying these baskets on their heads to market for miles. I have seen this fuel being burnt, and it burns well and makes a fire as hot as a coal fire. Wood and coal are both scarce here, and this kind of fuel is very largely used by the 250,000,000 inhabitants of India. The women are more clad than men, but in Europe and America they would be considered very slightly clad indeed.

I think I said the extensive bungalow occupied by Madame Blavatsky and Col. Olcott commands a splendid view of the bay and the neighboring gardens and palm groves. They are renting the place at a low figure because it has the reputation of being a haunted house. They are not the kind of people to be afraid of ghosts, and were not at all disinclined to live in a house where ghosts and phantoms are said to congregate. It is enough to say that though they have occupied the house for two years or more, the ghosts have not yet proved at all troublesome or demonstrative.

There are two or three kinds of palm-trees growing hereabouts in great numbers; the most numerous is the cocoanut palm, which bears the nuts in plenty. It is also called the "toddy-tree," because the natives tap the stalk of the leaves, perhaps seventy-five or a hundred feet from the ground, hanging a vessel to catch the juice, which is sweet and rich, and which, easily fermenting, makes an intoxicating liquid which some of the natives are fond of. It is curious to watch the agile toddy gatherers climb these tall trees, having notches and jogs on which to place their feet, and with their hands upon the opposite side of the tree they climb, in a nearly naked condition, as rapidly as a man would ordinarily ascend a flight of stairs. They have a vessel strapped to their backs or shoulders in which they collect the juice, and making a fresh incision in the place of tapping, they descend with the agility of a cat. It is a particularly low caste that attends to this occupation. I pantomined to one I was watching that I wished to taste the juice, and he allowed me to do so; but I did not like it, it having an acrid taste, not very agreeable. The British government have levied an annual tax of eighteen rupees—equal to nine dollars—on each cocoanut tree in the country, because the natives procure their toddy from it. The tax seems like a heavy one, but the natives pay it rather than go without their toddy. Within three hours' drive of the city are most beautiful cocoanut groves, where the trees almost join leaves over the road and form a most beautiful arch. This is besides the thousands in the limits of the city and its suburbs. The other variety of palm, which has a leaf much like those used for fans, and which also bears fruit, abounds in considerable numbers. Sometimes they grow to a hight of one hundred and twenty feet to the leaves; it never has any branches.

Birds are very numerous here, but they are not all of an attractive kind. Sparrows are very numerous and tame, coming into the house with but little apparent fear, and always very lively. There is also an abundance of crows here, which are nearly as tame as the sparrows, and come close to the doors and windows. They are not the same as the American crows, being a trifle smaller and more glossy and sleek-looking, and more domestic; but their eternal "caw, caw" becomes a little bit tiresome in time. The kites are a much larger bird, and look like hawks sailing about, though probably quite as much like the buzzards of our country. They are often extremely bold, and sometimes swoop down and snatch food from the hands of children, or a bone even from the mouth of a dog. These, with the countless crows, are the scavengers of the country, and keep meat and other substances from going into a state of putrefaction. I hear of another large bird, called the adjutant, which is around frequently in the raining season; they are tall, and of the heron or crane family, and sometimes stand on the corner of a house for hours; hence their name. Green parrots of rather small size abound in many places. Pigeons or doves are very numerous, and may often be seen, hundreds together. I have often seen several birds which look like the American robins. Large vampire bats are also numerous, and after sunset they may be seen sailing through the dusky air. The most persistent and annoying birds which I find here—please pardon the appellation—is the musketo. I have seldom seen them anywhere more numerous or more annoying. It seems they will almost eat one up before going to bed, and after that it seems impossible to bar them from one's face and hands; the weather is so warm that one does not feel like covering up "head and ears." Another animal abounds here, and that is the jackal. They are always to be heard barking and crying along in the evening, seeming to be close by, and sounding much like a lot of boys yelling and making all sorts of noises.

The oxen here are peculiar to this country. They have a hump or prominent enlargement on the top of the shoulders, and against which they do much of their pulling. This is said in young animals to be very fine eating, being of a fleshy formation, partly lean and partly fat. They are, perhaps, not so strong as American oxen, but they are better travelers, and far less affected with heat. They are much used here in carts, both for traveling and for hauling stuff of all kinds. I see many carts upon springs, with a top to them, in which are seats, making a kind of pleasure carriage, in which the natives of the better classes take great delight. It is amusing to see these native cattle trotting and plodding along the streets and highways as though their very lives depended upon getting along speedily. They are said to be able to travel a distance of seventy-five miles per day, and I have not seen one that showed weariness or seemed to be at all overcome by heat; not one with his tongue out of his mouth. They are generally of a light color, and seem to be of a tractable, obliging disposition. They are worked single, in shafts, double, with a kind of yoke, triple, with one in the lead, and quadruple, one yoke before the other. The third one in the lead does his pulling against the hump on his shoulders. A small rope passes from the horns through the nostrils, by which the animal is guided as easily as the horse by the rein. Very little bawling is done to these cattle, and they trot or amble along as naturally as the horse or mule.

The Italian buffalo, or what is much like it, is reared here in great numbers, and worked much the same as the oxen mentioned, though they are much larger and more unwieldy. They are mostly used for heavy draught, being larger by a third, perhaps, than our cattle, as well as coarser in appearance. They are ill-looking beasts, for their horns, going straight back, gives them anything else than a prepossessing appearance. They have a great fondness for water, and when used to haul cannons in war times, or loads of anything at other times, they have to be watched closely when near ponds of water or they will betake themselves to the same and have a good bath. The female buffalo is valued for milk, much of which is used for making butter, but the latter is as white as the driven snow. I could not imagine what it was when first I saw it on the table, and was under the necessity of asking. It has not the flavor of butter from cows' milk, and to my taste not as agreeable. I have seen both the buffaloes and the India oxen used singly as pack cattle, having a kind of saddle or padding on, with wood, stone, or any similar freight confined with ropes on each side. These are the same variety of buffaloes I saw in Greece, Syria, and Egypt.

Great nnmbers of Arabian horses are brought here from Aden, and a heavy trade is done with them. The Arabs, however, are very careful to prevent the propagation, for they never allow horses to leave their country in a condition to become fathers. The Hindoos are very merciful to the brute creation, and take very good care of the animals under their control. The beasts look sleek and contented, and I have not seen a Hindoo beating an animal of any kind.

THE EVIL OF CASTE.

Caste is the great curse of India. It may have its good sides, or it may in some directions have subserved a good purpose in restraining the upper classes and inciting them to conduct superior to that of the lower classes, but taken all in all it has done infinite harm to the country. This system of caste has been brought about by the Brahminical religion, commencing, perhaps, as far back as the Institutes of Menu. There were originally four grand castes. First, the Brahmans, which are the highest. They are the learned class, and furnish the numerous ecclesiastics of the country, and it is not expected they will engage in mercantile or mechanical pursuits. They are the aristocrats of the country, and though as poor as poverty itself, they look down upon the inferior castes with a perfect contempt. They will hardly touch a person of low caste, and if they deign to speak to them it is in a haughty, lordly manner! No matter how poor the Brahmanic class may be themselves, if the shadow of one of the low castes, or of an unbeliever, like a European, falls upon their food they will not eat a mouthful of it, but throw it away as though it was poisoned. If any of this caste demean themselves by engaging in the employ of a European, or in following any menial pursuit, or in marrying below their station, they are tabooed by their caste, and they become outcasts upon the face of the earth.

A Brahman is not necessarily a priest, but a priest must necessarily be a Brahman. A Brahman, however poor, will not degrade himself by becoming a trader or dealer, or filling any position belonging to the lower castes.

The second class or caste are the Kshatryos, which is the military class. The third are the Vaisyas, the industrious and the commercial caste; of these are the shop-keepers and the higher mechanics. The fourth are the Sudras, the servile class, the laborers, the agricultural class, and those engaged in all servile and menial employments. Below these again are the fifth class, the Pariahs, the descendants of criminals, who are the most degraded of all, and are allowed to follow only the most despised and most disreputable pursuits. The four main castes are again subdivided into almost an infinite number of sub-castes. Thus the Brahmans themselves have almost a countless number of classes or castes, to keep account of which and each attending to the requirements of their caste requires close attention, and great inconvenience, making many grades of aristocracy. There could not be a greater difference between the President of the United States, or the governors of the several states, and the most abject slave under our late slave system, than between the high and low castes here, each mechanical trade and every occupation having a caste by itself.

The tyranny of these castes is fearful to contemplate. An individual of the low caste, however intellectual or worthy, cannot rise, while those of the higher class may fall. A person of the lower strata has nothing to hope for in life but the most pitiful and servile existence, and the most abject poverty. The higher class still has many advantages, though poor; if he commits a crime he is not so severely punished as an offender of the same grade in the lower classes.

There is a very great difference in the intellect and intelligence of the different classes. Among the Brahmans are as educated and intellectual people as are to be found in the world, while the lower classes are as ignorant and superstitious, as full of absurd errors and prejudices, as it is possible to conceive of. I have had interviews with several of the Brahman class, and I find them cultured, deeply read men. They are very familiar with the writings of John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Darwin, and others, and are very fond of discussing occidental and oriental philosophy. There is probably no people more at home in metaphysics, mysticisms, and abstruse thought. It is natural for them to believe in occultism. In this is a part of the marked difference between the philosophy and thought of the East and the West.

Several of the Brahman class have visited me, and are anxions to learn the state of thought, philosophy, and education in the new world, and they are marked by an ease of manners, a mildness and amiability of disposition perfectly charming. Some of them have made recitations to me of Sankrit poetry, chanting it in the original style, and in a manner quite pleasing. Some of them are stories, some fables, and all inculcating a fine moral lesson. These have been translated to me, but I fear I do not remember them well enough to justify an attempt on my part to repeat them. I have had very little opportunity to become acquainted with the Hindoo women, as it is principally the lower classes who are to be seen on the streets. None of the India women are educated, and their minds are left an intellectual waste, so far as the culture of education is concerned.

MARRIAGE IN INDIA.

The women of India, indeed, occupy a most unenviable position in society, and one's heart can easily bleed for them in view of the inequality which bears down upon them in the marriage relation and otherwise. I have only to state the prominent facts in the status of the female of this country for the case to be properly understood. She is generally betrothed by her parents while in a state of infancy, not over the age of three, six, or eight years, and this reprehensible custom is carried to the senseless extent of betrothals being made while the child is still unborn, it being disposed of for life to her future husband in case she proves to be a female, the mother going through with the ceremony of betrothal in behalf of the unborn infant. If upon being born the child proves to be a girl the betrothal is as binding and the girl is held to the bargain as scrupulously as though she had herself been a party to the contract. If the betrothed husband dies, the girl is a widow, and must remain a widow for life, and that is a fate most terrible to contemplate. She, like all other widows, is never allowed to marry again under any circumstance. Her head is shaved—which is the greatest disgrace that can be placed upon a woman in India—and she is a scullion, a menial, a despised person, a slave all the days of her life. She must never wear any jewelry, she cannot dress in gay attire, she cannot sleep on a bed, nothing but a piece of matting spread upon the brick or earthen floor, with no covering, even if the night is cold, save the scanty apparel which she wears through the day. She is restricted to but one meal a day and that of a scanty and economical kind, and once every two weeks she must pass twenty-four hours without eating a mouthful. Neither must she during this fast take a drop of water or a particle of medicine though she be dying with a fatal illness. She must never sit down or speak in the presence of her mother-in-law or of her sisters-in-law, unless they command her to do so. Even though she were a high caste Brahman woman, she sinks to the lowest estate on becoming a widow, and even the servants are permitted to order her about as much as they please. No woman about the house must ever speak a word of pity to her or show her the least kindness.

If a widow becomes sick and can no longer go down to the accustomed place to get her daily meal, she may lie in her place and die, and no one will dare assist her, save she be so fortunate as to have a son, who may wait upon her and show kindness to her. Instead of a kind word being spoken to her, she is reviled and abused on every occasion, as it is admitted on all hands that she must have done something very wicked in some former stage of existence to bring upon her such a fate as now rests upon her, that of being a widow. To this extent she is held to be accountable for her husband's death, and it is believed that it was for punishment that the gods took her husband away. Think of this horrible state of things when in India it is estimated that there are over one hundred thousand widows under the age of eight years, and perhaps ten times that number of widows of all ages. Think of the terrible amount of wretchedness there is in this unhappy country.

Widowhood, of course, is worse than the married state, but the latter at best is terrible enough. As observed, the girl is betrothed in her infancy, she never having a word to say as to the choice of her partner for life, but she is not really married, and does not go to live with her husband till she reaches the age of puberty. On the day of her marriage the young wife is put into a palanquin, tightly closed, and taken to her husband's home. No matter if she has been a pet of fond parents and has received all kinds of indulgence; all that is now over. Now she becomes the slave of her mother-in-law, and can no longer be said to enjoy the prerogatives of a free human being. She has to wait constantly upon her mother-in-law, who orders her about as though she were an utterly inferior being; and this mother-in-law is to be her teacher and to instruct her how to please her husband. She is to teach the young wife what dishes the young husband likes best and how to prepare them. If the mother-in-law by chance is a kind-hearted woman, she sometimes lets the young wife return to her parents' home and make them a visit, when she may wear her saree down upon her shoulders, but while in the house of her hushand's mother she must so wear it that it will cover her head and face down to her mouth. It is permitted her to raise this after she gives birth to a son. In her own mother's house she retains her given name, Mohemee; but in the house of her husband's mother she entirely loses her identity; she is no longer called by her given name, but is always Bo, which only means daughter-in-law; and to this another term is appended which implies whether she is the wife of the first, second, third, or fourth son. After she becomes mother to a son, she is known as the mother of that child, the word ma being added to the child's name.

In her own mother's house she may run about in the court and verandahs, enjoying such poor play as is thus vouchsafed to her; but in her husband's home, until after the first child is born, she must move about with the greatest precision, and not like a happy young person who has a right to enjoy the natural pleasure of existence. She must not speak aloud, but the little she is allowed to speak must be scarcely above a whisper. In this way it can easily be seen that her spirit early becomes broken. When she first sees her mother-in-law in the morning she must prostrate herself before her, placing her own forehead to the earth and kissing the feet of her mother-in-law, and placing one of the matron's feet upon her own head for a short time. This indicates the perfect submission in which she holds herself and is to remain.

She sees very little of her husband, and he regards her very little more than he would a cat or other pet animal. It is the most seldom thing that any manifestation of love takes place between them. It makes very little difference how cruelly she may be treated, she must not complain to her husband of anything his mother may do, for he is not allowed to take her part. Her husband sends her each day the allowance of food which is to be cooked for himself, herself, and the children, when there are any. When it is prepared, by the simple processes of the country, she places it upon a large platter, and it is taken into the husband's room. He eats what he chooses, and the platter is returned to the wife and the children, who have the privilege of eating what remains. She rarely or never eats with her husband. The food is eaten sitting on the ground, and without knife, fork, or spoon. Though the food may be semi-fluid, it is put into the mouth with the fingers.

While the wife is young she is seldom permitted to go from home upon any occasion, but when she becomes a matron she sometimes makes a pilgrimage to some Hindoo temple to make offerings to the gods for herself or others. It is more customary, however, for her to have the family gods in the house, and often on a shelf over the head of her bed; and to these she makes daily oblations, offering them rice and decorating them with garlands of flowers. Thus the life of the India woman is spent. When she approaches the hour of death, she is taken out to the river Ganges, or some other sacred river, there to breathe her last in view of the holy stream, whose waters are believed to be efficacious enough to wash away all the sins she may have committed. When she has ceased to breathe, her body, as is the case with all Hindoos, is burnt and the ashes thrown into the Ganges, or sent there from a distance to be consigned to that holy stream; when, let us hope, her troubles and afflictions are all over, and that a day of peace and rest has come to her. This account of the married life of woman applies more particularly to the better classes. Among the lower class, with whom the women have to go out to earn a livelihood, and who have smaller residences, there is more equality between the sexes; and it certainly appears that the women of the poorer classes have the most liberty and the most pleasure of life. I have seen many of the women of the lower class upon the streets carrying their children with them; not as the American Indian women do their children, lashed to a board at their backs, but they carry them above one hip, the little fellow having a leg on either side—one in rear and one in front.

The women of this country have singular ideas of personal ornamentation. It is not at all uncommon to see a dozen bracelets on one arm, or metallic anklets of silver and cheaper metals above the feet, and rings upon the toes are very common; sometimes a ring on nearly every toe. But the worst of all are the rings in the nose; these are attached a third the way up on the left side of the nose, and are usually an inch in diameter, and often more, amounting to two, four, and sometimes six inches in diameter, appearing to be much in the way of the mouth, and are really a horrid disfigurement. They sometimes, also, wear rings in the ears; not drops, as American ladies foolishly use, but round rings, an inch or more in diameter, and worn upon the upper part of the rim of the ear, instead of the lower, fleshy part. Two or three rings are sometimes in one ear, and occasionally the men are seen following the same foolish fashion.

This inequality toward woman in India has grown out of many centuries of misdirected zeal and a too strict observance of the teachings of the old sages and priests. In the laws of Menu there is found authority for these restrictions upon woman. He says in childhood the female must be dependent upon her father, in youth upon her husband, and in case of his death upon her sons. He also says, "By a girl or a woman advanced in years nothing must be done, even in her own dwelling-place, according to her own pleasure." This was the oriental idea with regard to woman. She was regarded as an inferior being, and the same was observable among the Jews. Paul had much the same notion, and preached upon the perfect submission of a wife to her husband in all things. The civilization of Greece and Rome, and the status of Greek and Roman women, was much better. So it has been in most Christian nations, and even in Mohammedan countries it has not been so bad. But even here, with the influx of European manners and customs, there is some improvement, and it is to be hoped that the lot of woman in India is not always to be as hard as it has been.

It is not strange that, under the state of things here portrayed, widows and other women of India sometimes turn out badly and become prostitutes, though, from what I can learn, that class of unfortunate women are not as numerous here as in Christian countries. This being a seaport, and thousands of sailors landing here every year, as in other places of the kind, prostitution largely abounds; but I am informed that a very large share of them are women from Italy, Germany, Austria, Armenia, and other countries, where the Christian religion bears rule. Of course there are native prostitutes, also, for prostitution here is not looked upon as being so degrading as in Europe and America, and in all conscience the poor beings have hardships and degradation enough piled upon them to drive them to almost anything.

It is hardly to be expected that the long-surviving representatives of the oldest civilization in the world should not have handed down many imperfections, and that the effects of a mistaken education should not here and there be seen. If the Hindoos have vices, they also have their virtues. Their children are reared to entertain the highest respect for their parents, and to yield to them the most implicit obedience. Every morning the well-raised children of Hindoo parents bow to the earth, or prostrate themselves upon it, before their parents, as a token of the perfect obedience to be rendered, and it is one of the most unusual things in the world for a child here to be insolent or disobedient to its parents. If Young America were endowed with a trifle more of this spirit it would undoubtedly be better for him. There appears, also, to be more regard for the rights and feelings of others among the Hindoos than among other nationalities; as a people, they are noted for patience, humility, submission, respectfulness, contentment, and peacefulness. They are also remarkably kind to the animal creation. They will not take any sort of animal life when they can avoid it, not even for food; it is very seldom that a Hindoo eats any animal food. They will not even kill a bug or insect if they can avoid it. They have the character of being very kind to the low forms of animal life I have seen one of them out feeding ants, sprinkling flour around the ant-hill, so that the little pests need not suffer with hunger.

A VIEW BACKWARD OF THE HINDOO RACE.

It may not be amiss to look back and consider for a little while the origin and character of the progenitors of the people who dwell in India to-day. Without undertaking to settle the question, which is the older civilization, Egyptian or Hindoo, it is pretty well known that many thousands of years ago a pretty highly civilized nation called the Aryans dwelt in Central Asia, and developed agriculture and many of the domestic arts. This people dwelt on the great plains east of the Caspian Sea, and northwest of this country. There seems to have been two branches of this great nation, one of which is believed to have emigrated west and founded the nations of Europe, while the other branch moved southward and peopled what were afterwards known as India and Persia. From this branch came the ancient Medes. Arya is a Sanskrit word, signifying noble, of a good family, and the term Aryan was applied to the tillers of the soil, a pursuit in which this ancient race was noted. It is believed they were the first nation to bring the cultivation of the soil to a high state of perfection. Philologists have found many points of resemblance between the ancient Sanskrit language, spoken by the Aryans, with the words used in more modern languages which are believed to have grown out of it, and which are now the prominent languages of the world, but that subject is too extensive and intricate to be dwelt upon in a book of travels. Suffice it to say, many of the old Sanskrit words spoken by the Aryans have their counterparts and close resemblances in the Greek, Latin, German, French, and consequently in the English.

It is held that, without attempting to give the source of the Aryans, thousands of years ago they reached a comparatively high state of civilization, not living in tents like the Arabs, or in crude wagons like the Scythians, but in well constructed dwellings, and even in villages and towns. Their houses were strongly built, and their wealth consisted largely in their domestic animals, in the rearing of which they took great delight.

In matters of religion the Aryans were admirers and worshipers of nature. They seemed not to have believed in any personal God extraneous to nature, but to have adored the different phases and forces of nature, and to have addressed these in their religious exercises. They called the earth mother. They also had great veneration for the sun, and regarded him as the source of power and existence. Their name for the sun's light was Dyaus. In time this force or power became personalized, and Dyaus was the god of the bright sky. A similarity in name is discovered between it and Zeus of the Greeks, the Jovis of the Romans, and is further traced in the name Jupiter; Dyaus-pita with the Aryans meant heaven, father, and Zeupater and Jupiter easily grew out of the term.

THE ARYAN RELIGION.

It is held that the Aryans, or the wise men among them, were the authors of the Vedas, which are believed to be the oldest preserved productions in the world. They are grand hymns of praise directed to the sun, and its representative fire, to the dawn, to the vault of heaven, to the winds, to the clouds, the storms, and the active, moving phenomena of nature. From these ancient hymns many nations have found their liturgies and rituals, but they have indulged in more personality of idea, and thus gradually their gods have become in their minds virtual beings or personages.

The Aryans admired the scenery of the heavens—sunrise, sunset, dawn, dusk, the moving clouds, etc. It was easy for them to see a close relationship between the sun and the earth—the great father and mother—while the clouds might be practically regarded as their offspring. It has been said that in the Aryan heaven was a great plain over which roamed bulls and cows, other terms for clouds. As the cow yielded him milk, so the clouds yielded rain. The sun was lord of all, and was sometimes considered the bull of power and might. I will not, however, now attempt to give the poetic views of the Aryans, nor their myths, which have been copied into the mythologies of many later nations. It is enough to say that the Aryan worship was simply a nature-worship, clothed in poetical ideas and metaphorical paintings. The grandest phases and features of nature commanded their highest admiration and worship.

It is not easy to decide at what age the Aryans emigrated from their fertile tablelands in Central Asia, nor whether the Vedas were composed before they journeyed to the land of the Indus and Ganges or after; but one thing may be safely decided, that it is that they enjoyed a high degree of civilization in their native land, and that their historic period reaches farther back into antiquity than that of any other people with which we are aquainted, save it be the Egyptians; and we may also safely conclude that the period from the time they achieved this advanced civilization back to the time when the inhabitants of the earth knew very little of civilization, and gladly made use of the rudest implements of stones and bones, and subsisted, as many of the wild animals do, upon other animals, fish, etc.—of which age abundant proofs exist all over the earth—must necessarily have been many thousand of years. From what we know of the rapidity with which civilization advanced in the world a few thousand years ago, we are irresistibly led to the conclusion that a long period must have been necessary to bring man from his primitive low savage state to the condition which it is known that the Aryans occupied even before they emigrated from their central Asiatic homes.

I have conversed with learned Hindoos here, who tell me that they have in their nation authentic records, based upon astronomical calculations and the position of the heavenly bodies, which reach back not less than thirty thousand years. And the Chinese have records which they insist are far older than that; but even if we set these claims aside as not sufficiently authenticated, we have sufficient proofs to establish the fact that both countries were inhabited, and that the inhabitants residing in them have descended from a stock who lived long prior to the period set for Noah's flood, and before the first man and woman are said to have been created in the Jewish scriptures.

As before remarked, the Vedas of the old Aryans are the oldest known writings or literature of the human race. Veda means knowledge, science, a word of much the same meaning as wisdom in the English language. It was used in the plural form to denote four collections of hymns, though one collection is the original and the oldest, called the Rig-Veda, or hymns of praise to nature's forces.

The Rig-Veda thus contains the hymns in which the Aryans who first entered India worshiped the gods of nature, and they are held to be 2,400 years older than the Christian era. They number more than a thousand hymns, and are of various lengths, varying from one verse to more than fifty verses, or ric, meaning praise, for which reason they have been called Rig-Veda, or Veda of Praise. Their authors were called Rishis, a term implying seer or sage.

Professor Clodd says some six hundred years before the Christian era every verse, every word, every syllable, every letter of the Rig-Vedas were counted and that the number agrees with existing copies with scarcely a difference. The Brahmans, the ancient priesthood of the Hindoos, held the Vedas in the highest veneration, and it was their duty to devote years of study to them and to commit them to memory, believing them to be the inspired word of God, having existed in his mind long before the world existed.

The chief gods addressed in the Rig-Veda are Agni, fire; Prithivi, the earth; Mitra and Surya, the sun; Indra, the sky; Ushas, etc., the dawn; Maruts, the storm; Varuna, the all-surrounder; Soma, the moon; Vishnu, who afterwards became a leading god in the Hindoo trinity, and whose name was first used in the Vedas to represent the sun.

To the ancient Aryans races Agni or fire was held to be more divine than the earth, and a higher order of divinity was accorded to it. It was considered a subtle and mysterious power; a most helpful servant though terrible master. To him more of the hymns of the Vedas were addresed than any other of the gods. He it was who lived among men in a special manner, and was regarded as the messenger between heaven and earth, the guarding and guiding power left to shelter men from the terrors of cold, and to dispel the gloom when the orb of day had retired to rest. His marvelous birth, produced by briskly rubbing two dry sticks together, was celebrated in poetical and glowing language, the ten fingers of the kindler being ten virgins who brought the fire, and the two pieces of wood being the father and mother of the young god thus produced. From the fact that butter when thrown into the fire made it burn more briskly and mount higher, it was believed to be the most acceptable gift that could be offered to Agni, and when he was most to be pleased, butter was the offering made. This is one of the hymns of the Rig-Veda to Agni:

Agni, accept this log which I offer to thee, accept this my service; listen well to these my songs.

With this log, O Agni, may we worship thee, thou son of strength, conqueror of horses! and with this hymn, thou high-born!

May we, thy servants, serve thee with songs, O granter of riches, thou who lovest songs and delightest in riches.

Thou lord of wealth, and giver of wealth, be thou wise and powerful; drive away from us the enemies.

He gives us rain from heaven, he gives us inviolable strength, he gives us food a thousandfold.

Youngest of the gods, their messenger, their invoker, most deserving of worship, come, at our praise, to him who worships thee and longs for thy help.

For thou, O sage, goest wisely between these two creations (heaven and earth, gods and men), like a friendly messenger between two hamlets.

Thou art wise, and thou hast been pleased; perform thou, intelligent Agni, the sacrifice without interruption, sit down on this sacred grass.

Indra, as the sky, the firmament, or sometimes the sun, received many hymns of praise. Here is one of the hymns offered him:

He who as soon as born is the first of the deities, who has done honor to the gods by his deeds; he at whose might heaven and earth are alarmed, and who is known by the greatness of his strength; he, men, is Indra.

He who fixed firm the moving earth, who spread the spacious firmament; he, men, is Indra.

He who having destroyed Vritra set free the seven rivers; who recovered the cows (clouds); who regenerated fire in the clouds; who is invincible in battle; he, men, is Indra.

He to whom heaven and earth bow down; he at whose might heaven and earth are appalled; he who is drinker of the soma juice, the firm of frame, the adamant armed, the wielder of the thunderbolt; he, men, is Indra. May we envelope thee with acceptable praises, as husbands are embraced by their wives.

Ushas, the dawn, who chases the darkness away and makes a pathway for the sun, who wakens in every Brahman's breast his morning prayer, and has done this for more than four thousand years, justly comes in for her due share of praise. Here is a beautiful, simple hymn to Ushas:

She shines upon us like a young wife, rousing every living being to go to his work. When the fire had to be kindled by men, she made the light by striking down darkness.

She rose up spreading far and wide, and moving everywhere. She grew in brightness, wearing her brilliant garment. The mother of the cows (mornings), the leader of the days, she shone gold-colored, lovely to behold.

She, the fortunate, who brings the eye of the gods, who leads the white and lovely steed (the sun), the dawn was seen revealed by her rays, with brilliant treasures following every one.

Thou who art a blessing when thou art near, drive far away the unfriendly; make the pasture wide, give us safety! Scatter the enemy, bring riches! Raise up wealth to the worshiper, thou mighty dawn.

Shine for us with our best rays, thou bright Dawn, thou who lengthenest our life, thou the love of all, who givest the food, who givest us wealth in cows, horses, and chariots.

Thou daughter of the sky, thou high born Dawn, whom the Vasishthas magnify with songs, give us riches, high and wide; all ye gods protect us always with your blessings.

Varuna was a favorite god; he ruled over all, and governed the seasons of the year. He was believed to set sun, moon, and stars in their courses, and of him the devout worshiper asked pardon for sin, protection from evil. The following are specimens of the hymns offered to Varuna, and though they were composed more than fifteen hundred years before the Psalms of David, so called, they are equal to them in grandeur of conception and imagery:

The great lord of these worlds sees as if he were near. If a man thinks he is walking by stealth, the gods know it all.

If a man stands. or walks, or rides, if he goes to lie down or to get up, what two people sitting together whisper, King Varuna knows it, he is there as the third.

This earth, too, belongs to Varuna, the king, and this wide sky, with its ends far apart. The two seas (the sky and the ocean) are Varuna's loin; he is also contained in this drop of water.

He who should flee far beyond the sky, even he would not be rid of Varuna the king. His spies proceed from heaven toward this world; with a thousand eyes they overlook this earth.

King Varuna sees all this, what is between heaven and earth, and what is beyond. He has counted the twinklings of the eyes of men. As the player throws the dice, he settles all things.

May all thy fatal nooses, which stand spread out seven by seven and threefold, catch the man who tells a lie; may they pass by him who tells the truth.

In the following pardon for sin is asked:

However we break thy laws from day to day, men as we are, O god Varuna,

Do not deliver us unto death, nor to the blow of the furious, nor to the wrath of the spiteful.

Wise and mighty are the works of him who stemmed asunder the wide firmaments (heaven and earth). He lifted on high the bright and glorious heaven; he stretched out apart the starry sky and the earth.

I ask, O Varuna! wishing to know this my sin. I go to ask the wise. The sages all tell me the same; Varuna it is who is angry with thee. . . .

Absolve us from the sins of our fathers, and from those which we committed with our own bodies.

I will close with the following, which assuredly contains as grand sentiments of praise as are found in the sacred writings of any people.

Let me not yet, O Varuna! enter into the house of clay; have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

If I go along trembling, like a cloud driven by the wind; have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

Through want of strength, thou strong and bright god, have I gone wrong; have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

Thirst came upon the worshiper, though he stood in the midst of waters; have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

Whenever we men, O Varuna! commit an offense before the heavenly host, whenever we break the law through thoughtlessness; punish us not, O God, for that offense!

There is no room for doubt that the ancient Aryans believed in a life after death. The king of that other world was Yama. He and his sister Yami were the first pair, and when they reached the realm of bliss they prepared a place for those who were to follow them. In the Persian rendition of the same legend Yama appeared as Yima, ruler of the golden age and founder of paradise.

The Aryans led a sunny, joyous life, and they gave little place to gloom and sadness. In their prayers they asked for wealth, children, long life, success in war, and yet they were not bowed down with sorrow because they knew that, in spite of all, life one day must come to an end. Their belief in death, even, was cheerful. "They believed that in some bright place where the gods dwelt, they and their loved ones would be gathered under the peaceful sway of of Yama." It was their custom also to make offerings to the spirit of their forefathers; and while they laid the bodies of the dead quietly away they fully believed that the spirit was also at rest with Christian Duplicity.

Among the many who are exercised at the success of Col. Ingersoll is the New York Times. A remark of the colonel's, at his Boston lecture, that if "Christianity be true, Longfellow and Emerson are in hell to-night," is excepted to, and the following lecture is read to Mr. Ingersoll and Infidelity in general:

"According to Mr. Ingersoll, Christianity teaches that men holding the opinions which he assumes that Longfellow and Emerson held are cast into hell immediately after their death. Will he kindly mention what is his authority for this assertion? It is generally understood that both Longfellow and Emerson were Unitarians, in the New England sense of the term—in other words, that they did not accept the doctrin of the Trinity. Mr. Emerson has also been somewhat vaguely called a pantheist, but that he firmly believed in the existence of God and the reality of the future life can hardly be doubted, unless we are to make the unwarrantable assumption that certain poems written by him were not meant to be poems, but formal statements of his theological creed.

"Mr. Ingersoll has a convenient fashion of calling everything Christianity which has at any time been taught by any church or sect. If ignorant fanatics were to form themselvs into a new sect and assert that human sacrifices should be made a part of the Christian religion, Mr. Ingersoll would undoubtedly cite their preposterous dogma as a sample of what Christianity teaches—just as he is never tired of citing the Spanish Inquisition as part and parcel of Christianity. In the days when the Unitarians separated from the orthodox Congregationalists of New England, there were undoubtedly men among the latter who believed that no one who denied the doctrin of the Trinity could be saved; but to assume that these heated controversialists, fighting under the banner of a small and waning sect, were the authorized exponents of Christianity, would be as absurd as to accept the claim of the three tailors of Tooley street to be the people of England.

"It may be unhesitatingly asserted that Christianity does not teach in regard to the final condition of men like Longfellow and Emerson what Mr. Ingersoll says that it teaches. The Roman Catholic church, which undoubtedly does make the broad, general assertion that outside of its pale there is no salvation, concedes that men who hav been baptized, and who hold the essential doctrins of Christianity, may be saved, although they hav never formally become members of the church of Rome, and Mr. Ingersoll will not find a single intelligent Roman Catholic priest who will assert that if Christianity is true Longfellow and Emerson are in hell. The Anglican church, which includes among its priesthood men who disbelieve the Athanasian doctrin of the Trinity, and others who deny the existence of hell, certainly does not giv Mr. Ingersoll any authority for his assertion as to the fate of Longfellow and Emerson. Among the numerous sects of Protestantism there may be found an occasional Presbyterian, Methodist, or Baptist, who, mistaking his own prejudices for Christianity, may gratify Mr. Ingersoll by conceding that, because Mr. Longfellow was not a believer in the doctrin of the imputation of Adam's sin, or because Mr. Emerson had not been immersed, or because neither the poet nor the philosopher had been formally 'converted' at a camp-meeting, they could not escape eternal punishment; but Mr. Ingersoll will meet with extreme difficulty in finding an intelligent minister of any Protestant sect of any numerical importance who will declare that unless Longfellow and Emerson are in hell, Christianity is an imposture."

According to the Times' theology, all Christians are Universalists; that is, believe that all men will finally be saved. Now, if the editor knows anything about orthodox Christianity—which is doubtful—he knows better. But as there is a general denial on the part of some alleged Christians of many things and especially doctrins imputed to the church by Freethinkers, we will look into the matter and see if the church is wronged by anything the Times complains of.

A little while ago, in "answering" Ingersoll, Talmage said the Bible and the church nowhere taught that the universe was manufactured from nothing. Now, the Bible says that God created the heavens and earth. The act of creation implies making something where there was nothing, and, according to Genesis, this is what God did. This is what the whole Christian world has all along understood, and is in the creed of the church. Talmage is a Presbyterian, and ought to know his own creed; but one of three things must be imputed to him: 1. Either he has not read his "Confession of Faith;" or, 2. He does not regard it as of any account; or, 3. He is dishonest in his statement. Chapter iv of the Presbyterian "Confession of Faith" says: "It pleased God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for the manifestation of the glory of his eternal power, wisdom, and goodness, in the beginning, to create or make of nothing the world, and all things therein, whether visible or invisible, in the space of six days, and all very good." To prove this the Bible is copiously quoted.

The criticism of the Times is exactly like Talmage's. When compared with the authorized utterances of the church, it will be at once seen that it is a dishonest evasion, in fact a Christian, Jesuitical lie.

The Times disputes that Christianity teaches that men holding the opinions of Longfellow and Emerson are cast into hell, and wants authority for the assertion. Probably the Times will admit that Longfellow and Emerson were not Presbyterians. If it knows what Christianity is, and what Longfellow and Emerson believed, it will also hav to admit that they were unbelievers. The New York Sun recognized this fact, and manfully said so in its issue of last Sunday. In answer to an inquiry it says:

"Mr. Emerson and Mr. Longfellow were unbelievers in the Christian religion. The essence of belief in the Christian religion is belief in the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Without the godhead of the Christ there is no real Christianity. It is true there is a sort of doctrin which many people fancy to be Christian, and according to this doctrin Jesus Christ was not God, but a creature, a man, or a created being somewhat superior to man. But this is not the doctrin of the Christian religion. It is a foe to Christianity. It is a station on the broad road to total unbelief, to Infidelity. This sort of doctrin we understand to hav been the doctrin of Emerson and Longfellow. They were Unitarians. They were not believers in the Christian religion."

The Times says that because Mr. Longfellow did not believe that he sinned when Adam did, and that because Mr. Emerson had not been converted and baptized, is no reason for assigning them to hell. Does the editor of the Times believe the Bible? If so, what does that say about the unbelievers and the unbaptized? In the sixteenth chapter of Mark, sixteenth verse, we read, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." What does being damned mean? Every Sunday-school boy knows that according to Christianity it is being cast into hell.

Jesus made conversion an indispensable requisit to going to heaven. In Matthew xviii we are told by no less a person than he, that "except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." Does the Times find that either Emerson or Longfellow became converted even as little children? On the contrary it admits they were not. As there are only two places to go to after death—heaven and hell—and only converted people can go to heaven, and the dead poet and philosopher being unconverted, where are they?

What do the creeds of the churches of the present day teach is the fate of the unbeliever? Let us see. The Presbyterian church is popularly supposed to be a Christian institution. In chapter six of its "Confession of Faith," we read:

"Our first parents, being seduced by the subtilty and temptation of Satan, sinned in eating the forbidden fruit. This their sin God was pleased, according to his wise and holy counsel, to permit, having purposed to order it to his own glory.

"By this sin they fell from their original righteousness, and communion with God, and so became dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body.

"They being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed, and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity, descending from them by ordinary generation."

"Every sin, both original and actual, being a transgression of the righteous law of God, and contrary thereunto, doth, in its own nature, bring guilt upon the sinner, whereby he is bound over to the wrath of God, and curse of the law, and so made subject to death, with all miseries spiritual, temporal, and eternal."

Is that not plain enough? Or is not the Presbyterian church Christian?

The Times lays much stress upon the good works of the two dead poets, and implies that good works on earth will open the gates of heaven. What is the Christian doctrin concerning good works? The "Confession of Faith," chapter sixteen, says:

"We cannot, by our best works, merit pardon of sin, or eternal life, at the hand of God, by reason of the great disproportion that is between them and the glory to come, and the infinit distance that is between us and God, whom by them we can neither profit, nor satisfy for the debt of our former sins."

What does the Bible say about good works? Or is not that authority upon the doctrins of Christianity? At any rate we will quote it for the benefit of the Times editor. It may be new to him. Galatians ii, 16, says: "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we hav believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." In Isaiah xli, 24, God tells his people that they are of nothing, and their work of nought. In Romans iii, 27, Paul asks, "By what law? Of works?" And answers, "Nay, but by the law of faith! Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." And in 2 Timothy Paul informs us that God saves "not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace." In his epistle to the Ephesians Paul informs them (chap. ii, 8, 9) that they are "saved through faith, and that not of yourselvs; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast."

As Emerson and Longfellow had no faith in Jesus Christ as a divine individual, it is hard for an ordinary person to see how, in the face of these texts, they can be "saved."

But perhaps the Times is Baptist in its persuasion. If so, it will probably acknowledge that that is a Christian sect and understands the Christian doctrin. They hold that the Bible is "truth without any mixture of error" (Declaration of Faith, article i), and that voluntary rejection of the gospel involves the rejecter in an aggravated condemnation (Ibid, vi). Article vii of the same reads:

"We believe that, in order to be saved, sinners must be regenerated, or born again; that regeneration consists in giving a holy disposition to the mind; that it is effected, in a manner above our comprehension, by the power of the Holy Spirit in connection with divine truth, so as to secure our voluntary obedience to the gospel; and that its proper evidence appears in the holy fruits of repentance and faith and newness of life."

If we say that Longfellow and Emerson did not sin, we are told by the Baptists (who are Christians) that "all mankind are now sinners, utterly void of that holiness required by the law of God, positivly inclined to evil, and therefore under just condemnation to eternal ruin without defense or excuse."

Beautiful doctrin! Merciful God!

Final reward and punishment is contingent upon voluntary acceptance or rejection of the gospels. The two poets rejected the gospel. What is to be their fate? This is the creed of the Baptist church:

"We believe that there is a radical and essential difference between the righteous and the wicked; that such only as through faith are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and sanctified by the spirit of our God, are truly righteous in his esteem: while all such as continue in impenitence and unbelief are in his sight wicked, and under the curse; and this distinction holds among men both in and after death."

"We believe that the end of the world is approaching; that at the last day Christ will descend from heaven, and raise the dead from the grave to final retribution; that a solemn separation will then take place; that the wicked will be adjudged to endless punishment, and the righteous to endless joy; and that this judgment will fix forever the final state of men in heaven or hell, on principles of righteousness."

As is seen, according to the beautiful Baptist creed Longfellow and Emerson at the last day will be adjudged to endless punishment on principles of righteousness.

The Times' theologian says that belief in the trinity is not a necessary part of Christianity. That is a rather curious statement to make. "Will he kindly mention what is his authority for this assertion?" Not from the Catholic, nor the Episcopal, nor the Congregational, nor the Presbyterian, nor the Baptist, nor the Methodist does he get this, but from the hitherto heretical Unitarians and Universalists. It is generally believed at the present day that Mr. John Calvin had Doctor Servetus burnt because he persisted in denying the dogma of the trinity, which is an inseparable part of Christianity. Take the divinity of Christ away and where is the scheme of salvation? Christ's promises would hav no meaning unless he were given authority to make them. He threw heaven and hell around with a great deal of freedom—too much for a mere man. It will not do. Christianity as the churches know it to-day, must stand or fall with the trinity. If there is no Holy Ghost the reputation of Mary must suffer. If Jesus was not the Christ, then the salvation scheme is a humbug, and Christianity an imposture.

The statement regarding the Roman Catholic church is simply not so, and the Times' theologian ought to know it. The Catholic creed is that all who die outside its pale, unbaptized and without its offices, are lost. Its prayers might possibly get their souls out, but it would be expensive, and for people so heretical as Unitarians the result of the experiment would be so doubtful as to be hardly worth attempting. Any orthodox Roman Catholic priest will unhesitatingly say that both Emerson and Longfellow are, if not in hell, in purgatory on probation waiting for surviving relativs to giv the church money enough to pray them through to heaven.

Mr. Ingersoll may not find any minister who will say the two poets are in hell, for it is very difficult at the present time to find a man as bad as the Christians' creeds, but every minister who admits a doubt on the subject is to that extent a heretic, and may be "disciplined" by his church.

To show the different light in which the men are regarded by the Times' theologian and the church theologians, it is only necessary to quote a little from the acknowleged journals of the church. This first is from the Churchman of May 6th:

"Emerson insisted upon thinking for himself. It was to such wholesome protests against the narrowing influence of religious dogmatism that Emerson first gave his attention, but, in freeing himself from the restraints of the reaction against Calvanism, Emerson became an individualist. He joined the church of one member. He not only gave up the vague remnants of the idea of the church as an authority to administer sacraments, which has been held by the children of the Puritans, but also renounced his belief in the Bible as 'the book,' and in the Christ as anything more than the son of man. He found his refuge in an all-absorbing individualism, which his genius illustrated and adorned, and from which he never escaped. He might as well hav lived in the days of Socrates as in the present century, so far as the bent and range of his thinking were concerned. He gave up nearly everything belonging to Christianity but its ethics, and his ethics centered not in the person of Christ, but in the personal consciousness of man. Truth distinctivly Christian is almost entirely absent from his books. He concerned himself far less with matters of faith than with matters of fact. He is a very Greek in his way of looking at things. He has seen far into this world, but his writings furnish little ground of hope that he had the Christian consciousness of the reality of the other world."

Can such a man as that get to heaven according to the Bible, the Presbyterian, or the Baptist creeds?

The following extract will show how Longfellow is regarded by The Christian at Work. It is from its issue of April 20th:

"The Presbyterian journal is authority for the statement that 'in several Protestant churches of Buffalo, the regular services were dispensed with, and selections from the works of the poet were read to the congregations on the Sunday after Longfellow's death.' We ought to hav the names of those 'several' Longfellow churches. For church services we are old-fashioned enough to prefer the Bible to Longfellow's poems, his 'Hyperion,' or 'Kavannah.'"

The same paper, of May 4th, says of Emerson:

"It cannot be forgotten that Emerson belonged outside of the evangelical domain of faith. In fact, he was outside the Christian system altogether."

It seems to us that Col. Ingersoll was right in saying that if the Christian religion is true Longfellow and Emerson are in hell. We know that with their great hearts they would be unhappy in heaven, and as we expect to go where Longfellow and Emerson hav gone when we die, we are happy to be assured they are not in heaven. But seriously, what an unmitigated evil any system of religion is that consigns such men to eternal pain. Longfellow and Emerson were Unitarians, but Unitarianism is not evangelical Christianity. Unitarianism never burned a man nor hanged a witch, never imprisoned a man nor subjected him to torture. The nearest it ever gets to being orthodox is in its heresy trials and the expulsion from its ranks of men like Chainey and Miln. Evangelical Christian creeds hav changed but little since executions for heresy were common. About the only difference is, the churches defer the execution of sentence till after the death of their victims. They leave to God the burning instead of doing it themselvs. The acts of the sixteenth century are the creeds of the nineteenth.

The Days of the Week.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: We are glad to find that you are quite willing to answer queries of public interest.

1. In the early ages were not the days of the week numbered instead of named?

2. If so, about what time were names substituted for numbers?

3. Is there any proof in history that the Jewish week consisted of seven days?

4. If so, how were they named or numbered?

5. If the days were named in rotation to correspond with the seven planets, how could Saturday and Sunday come together?

Any light on the subject will be of interest to your many readers. T. G.

1. Among the Jews the days of the week had no name, but were simply counted.

2. The names of the days hav probably existed as long as the month's division into weeks. What time the Jews adopted the Egyptian names for the days accessible records do not inform us.

3. The Jewish week, being the same as that of the Egyptians (with the exception that through hatred for their captors they made Saturday the last day), consisted of seven days.

4. The numbering began with Sunday as the first day, Monday as the second, etc.

5. The days were not named "in rotation" to correspond with the seven planets. It is true that the Egyptians named them after the planets then known, beginning with the one most remote from the earth, thus, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, the Moon; but their succession was governed by the planet reigning for the hour upon which the day began. The twenty-four hours were each assigned a planet, as follows: Saturn to the first, Jupiter to the second, Mars to the third, and so on. In this order it will be seen that Saturn would hav the 1st, 8th, 15th, and 22d hours of the first day; the 23d hour would fall to Jupiter, and the 24th to Mars. The next hour, which would be the first of the second day, would fall to the Sun, thus making the day Sunday, and causing Saturday and Sunday to "come together."

The accompanying table will assist our correspondent materially in solving the problem. By following the column downward from the name of any given planet until he reaches the large figure 1, he will find the number corresponding to the position of that planet as it represents a day in the week. Take, for instance, Jupiter. The large figure 1 in that column is numbered 6 (1°), indicating that Jupiter is Thursday, the sixth day in the week, as the Egyptian week began on Saturday.

The planets according to their distance from the earth.

Joe Cook's Cowardice.

The following letter was written to the Philosophic Inquirer, of Madras, India. After slandering the Theosophical Society and Mr. Bennett, Cook ran away from their challenges to him. But he could not get away from the truth, and the pamphlets issued by Col. Olcott seem to hav pursued him everywhere. The letter shows how he flees from the wrath to come:

To the Joint-Recording Secretary of the Theosophical Society,

My Dear Brother: The pamphlets, "The Truth About the Theosophical Society," came just in time. In fact, they traveled with Mr. J. Cook. The same train which brought the pamphlets brought the Boston orator to us. As I wrote to you last night, they were widely distributed among the people here. This morning, as Mr. Cook entered the Mission School, an innocent little school-boy hastened to hand the book to him. He looked at it, exclaimed "Tush!" and seemed terribly disconcerted. Very soon he pleaded engagements in Ceylon, which he said could not be put off on any account. This very afternoon he took the train to Tuticorin without even visiting the mission stations of the district which rejoice in the biblical names of Nazareth, Galilee, Bethlehem, Christianagaram, Mennanapuram (Gospel Town), etc., etc. No Jordan-pura is to be found in the number, as all these pious places are desolate, sandy tracts, studded with scanty palmyras. His evil genius hunted him down to the railway station, where another smiling boy handed to him the same pamphlet as he was taking his seat in the carriage. He exclaimed "Tush," with still more pronounced disgust, and dropped into his box with an air of profound vexation. The missionaries who, before his arrival here, kept trumpeting on all the tones that "Mr. Cook was coming from America, and that now would Theosophy go to the dogs, and Christianity become the religion of India," etc., etc., now mournfully explain to the people that poor Mr. Cook suffers from a sore throat, and therefore goes away without lecturing as he had intended to. It is extraordinary the effect one humble pamphlet can sometimes produce.

And to think that this great American apostle was introduced to our schoolboys as "This gentleman who has come from the far, far West, moved by the purely philanthropic spirit of doing good to you, and at an enormous sacrifice and expense to himself." Yes, he goes to Ceylon, but only to be disappointed, I am afraid, as these pamphlets must hav preceded him, and our Singalese brothers are not likely to go to sleep over them.

Yours fraternally, S. R., F. T. S.

Tinnevelly, March 22, 1882.

By missing the steamer for Hong Kong by two days, Mr. Bennett's arrival at San Francisco will be delayed till the latter part of this month. He spent considerable time in Java, a country about which little is known. In his letter of March 28th he said he intended to stop two or three weeks in Japan, and intimated that he might giv the Sandwich Islanders a call on his way to 'Frisco.

Mr. Bennett has taken so many notes on his travels that we at home will hav to hurry to catch him, and so we shall print eight pages a week hereafter. It will cramp our space somewhat, but we trust our correspondents will see the state of the case, and make brevity a study in the future. The pro tem editor has already obtained a book on the subject.

Doc. Monroe has gone and got mad just because ten or fifteen of his subscribers hav run up bills they wouldn't pay. That's nothing, doctor? Just call on us and we will show you a nice book of shut off delinquents that represents cash enough to run The Truth Seeker for three months. We just heard from one of them who is now borrowing the paper. One of these days we are going to send him a gilt edge certificate of membership in a Methodist church. He's got about there on the down-hill road, and if he don't reform he'll soon be mean enough to join the Presbyterians.

The busts of Paine and Voltaire which C. P. Farrell has had cast are two of the best specimens of the sculptor's art we hav seen for a long time. Besides being splendid parlor ornaments, they hav the added value of being authentic. Liberals should make their homes as beautiful as they can afford, and the pictures and busts of the benefactors of our race are the most appropriate ornaments that can be had. Mr. Farrell has our thanks for the copies sent to The Truth Seeker. The busts can be ordered of him at 1421 New York avenue, Washington, D. C., or through us.

The April Man has at last got around. Judging from the number of auxiliary Leagues which report progress, Mr. B. F. Underwood's statement that the League is dead was an error in judgment. Somehow or other a good many "errors" have emanated from the same quarter since his connection with the Index. Maybe the office needs ventilating.

Col. Ingersoll's new book is now in press and will be ready for delivery soon. The title is "Ingersoll on Talmage." The price will be $2 handsomely bound in cloth, $1 in paper. We will receive orders now and mail as soon as out.

Mrs. Lake began a course of lectures at Postville, Iowa, on the 6th. She is to speak for the Patch Grove (Wis.) League for a month, beginning the 21st. Parties wishing lectures for week evenings may address her there.

We hav a new supply of Bronson Keeler's "Short History of the Bible," and shall be pleased to supply all who wish. It is a splendid work, showing how the Bible was manufactured. Price, 75 cents.

Mr. T. B. Wakeman has partially recovered his health, which is good news, so far as it goes. We shall be very glad to announce his complete restoration.

Mr. Bennett's Expected Arrival in California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Knowing that many thousands of the noblest and most intelligent men and women in the country are anxiously awaiting to hear of Mr. Bennett's arrival in this city, I deem it my duty, as it certainly is a pleasure, to giv all the information possible on the subject. According to the letter I received from the sage while he was in Ceylon, he expected to be here the latter part of this month. Of this fact I already apprised you through the columns of The Truth Seeker. Hence we expected him by the steamer of the 23d, just a week ago. Special messengers, old and honored citizens, volunteered to keep on duty whether he arrived by day or night. The steamer came in the morning, and it was quickly learned that Mr. Bennett was not on board. No letters or message came from him, but a package for him to my address came from the Principal School of Arts, Jeypore, via Bombay.

Now we are all anxiety expecting the honored sage by the steamer due on the 4th of May via Yokohama. A meeting of all Liberals is called for to-morrow evening (May 1st) to make final preparations for receiving the illustrious traveler. We are meeting with great success in our efforts to make the ovation thoroughly cosmopolitan, and all classes of citizens opposed to fanaticism and religious intolerance are taking a heart-felt interest in making his reception triumphant for the cause.

We hav justissued a brief address to the citizens of San Francisco on the subject, and ten thousand copies are being distributed. You might find it interesting to publish it to show what is being done by the frontier guard (Auxiliary Liberal League 190) toward giving a glorious welcome to the old hero who never flinched in assailing superstition and never lowered the inspiring flag of universal mental liberty, even when bigots chained him in a felon's cell, wrongfully, cruelly, and mercilessly. We also advertised through the leading dailies our meeting for to-morrow evening.

I hav to say to you and to all true Freethinkers that the Underwood-Bundy slime has reached here, and that our enemy at the East is in league with the enemy here. A prominent journalist (a Liberal) informs me that the Underwood-Bundy charges will be hurled against Mr. Bennett and against all who stand up for him, together with the vile array of false testimony hatched up by the ever-detestable trio, Benedict, Comstock, and Colgate. The foe here, aided by the foe at the East, will with desperation play the obscenity game. But fear not; we will with unflinching courage stand by our colors. We are conscious that the obscenity charge is a wilful and infamous Christian lie. We loathe and detest the dissemination of impure literature through the mails, or in any other manner. We are honestly, hopefully, and unselfishly working to uplift mankind from the mire of superstition and the sink of ignorance. We are working to make this world more peaceful, more bright and beautiful than it is for human habitation. Conscious of this, we defy all the bigots who assail us. The just, noble, and exalted principles we teach and advocate will finally destroy and extirpate that accumulated and accursed crime of eighteen centuries, the Christian superstition.

Eastern Michigan Camp-Meeting.

A Spiritual-Liberal camp-meeting, to continue six days, will be held on Orion Park Island, commencing on Tuesday, June 13, 1882. The meeting will be held under the authority of the committee on district work, of which J. H. Burnham is chairman, appointed by the executiv board of the state association, and it is expected that a district association will be organized during the meeting as part of the state work.

The meeting will be held on Orion Park island, some seven acres in extent, and shaded by a fine growth of young oaks. It is approached by bridge from the mainland, and by boat. There are upon the island a large dining and dancing hall, speakers' stand, seating, and other conveniences. Visitors who do not bring tents can find lodgings in the village at reasonable rates.

Charles E. Watkins, the well-known test medium, is engaged to attend the meeting. S. B. McCracken, Detroit, Mich., is manager.

Yama. At a later date the bodies of the dead were burned upon an altar of Agni, and this custom has been continued for thousands of years. At the present time nearly all the Hindoo sects burn their dead. There is the Rig-Veda, a hymn of great beauty, and part of which to this day is used at the funeral ceremonies of the departed. After a few verses, in which Death is asked to harm the supplicants no more, the body is placed on the funeral pile with these appropriate and beautiful words:

Approach thou now, the lap of earth, thy mother,
The wide extending earth, the ever kindly;
A maiden soft as wool to him who comes with gifts,
She shall protect thee from destruction's bosom.

Open thyself, O earth, and press not heavily;
Be easy of access and of approach to him,
As mother with her robe her child,
So do thou cover him, O earth!

May earth maintain herself thus opened wide for him,
A thousand props shall give support about him;
And may those mansions ever drip with fatness;
May they be there evermore for his refuge.

Forth from about thee thus I build away the ground;
As I lay down this clod may I receive no harm;
This pillar may the fathers here maintain for thee;
May Yama there provide for thee a dwelling.

The Vedic hymns are not all equal to those quoted. Were not some foolish and insipid, they would be far ahead of the sacred writings of other nations. No system of religion, even down to the present day, has been devised that contains nothing but what is grand, sublime, and sensible.

"The Vedic religion had no temples, no priesthood, no idols." The great number of gods which are worshiped by Hindoos to-day, the castes which were later inaugurated, as the practice of burning wives with their deceased husbands, had no part in the original Vedic religion. These absurdities were the innovations introduced by priests at a subsequent period. The original religion of the Aryans was simple, and not repulsive, but with the lapse of centuries and the inventions of a designing priesthood that simplicity which worshiped the various phases of nature passed away. Indra, Varuna, and Agni fell from their places, and Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, and after them a countless host of inferior deities succeeded them.

After the Rig-Veda others were written, and these were the Shama-Veda, Veda of chants; Yagur-Veda, Veda of sacrificial formulas; Alhana-Veda, Veda of incarnations. Each Veda consists of two portions, Sanhita, or collection of mantras or hymns, and Brahmanas, which give information on the proper use of the hymns at sacrifice, or their sacred meaning, on their supposed authors, etc. Of the authorship and final collection of the Vedic hymns Dr. Muir speaks thus: "For many ages the successive generations of these ancient rishis continued to make new contributions to the stock of hymns, while they carefully preserved those which had been handed down to them by their forefathers. The fact of this successive composition of the hymns is evident from the ancient index to the Rig-Veda, which shows that these compositions are ascribed to different generations of the same family as their 'seers.' The descendants of the most celebrated rishis would no doubt form complete collections of the hymns which had been composed by their respective ancestors. After being thus handed down, with little alteration, in the families of the original authors for several centuries, during which many of them were continually applied to the purposes of religious worship, these hymns, which had been gathering an accumulated sanctity throughout all this period, were at length collected in one great body of sacred literature, styled the Sanhita of the Rig-Veda—a work which in the Puranas is assigned to Veda Vyasa, and one of his pupils."

Sanskrit scholars are not agreed as to the age of the Vedic hymns. Dr. Haug holds that the Rig-Veda was composed 2400 years B.C.; Prof. Whitney, 2000 B.C.; Max Müller, 1200 to 1500 B.C. Among the later sacred writings of the Hindoos are the Institutes of Menu, the Vedangas or limbs of the Vedas; the Aranyakas, prepared for those who retired to lead a contemplative life of solitude and asceticism in the wilderness and caves; the Upanishads, much in the same line as the last; the Ramayana, containing mainly the history of Rama, the seventh incarnation of Vishnu; the Mahabarata, a great history of the descendants of Bharata, contains about 200,000 lines, and is the work of different authors at different periods. It is said to be a story of quarrels between rival families, whose adventures and wars, however, do not occupy more than one-fourth of the narrative, the remaining three-fourths consisting of a variety of episodes and legends, amongst which is one of the deluge, said to closely resemble that given in the Saterpatha-Brahmana, but told at greater length; one incident being that when the flood was over it was discovered that among the treasures which had been lost was the "Amrita, or Drink of Immortality." The gods met in council to consider how the loss might be repaired, when Vishnu advised them to churn the ocean that the vexed sea might give back its spoil. With the aid of Brahma and the King of the Serpents the waters were made to relinquish the lost treasure, and Amrita was recovered. The job of churning the entire ocean was a pretty extensive one, but with the gods it is not supposed to be a very heavy contract. This may be an improvement upon the Chaldean story of the flood which was the source whence the Jews borrowed it to place in their own sacred writings. The Mahabarata also contains the "Bhagavad-Gita," a deeply religious and philosophical poem, given, of course, by inspiration, containing an account of Chrishna, the eighth incarnation of Vishnu, his moral lessons to his disciples, the conversations which they had together, containing many excellent moral sentiments. This poem makes a volume by itself, and is highly appreciated by many who have read it. A translation of it by Sir Cockburn Thompson has been published in England and republished in America.

The Puranas, eighteen in number, are of a later date, not being considered as old as the Christian system. Their contents are very miscellaneous, embracing cosmogony, legends, genealogies of the gods, directions about festivals, etc. They are written in the form of dialogue, and in a style to be popular with the masses. They are clearly of a priestly origin, and a principal object of them being the exaltation of the worship of Vishnu and Siva, two of the personalities of the Hindoo godhead or trinity. Puranas are written to the glory of both divinities, but most to Vishnu.

The Tantras are certain works in which directions are given for the correct performance of rites in honor of the "energy" or wife of Siva, the moral tone of which is said not to be very high—not more so, perhaps, than some parts of the Jewish scriptures.

It will thus be seen that these sacred writings, which are ten times as voluminous as the Jewish scriptures, cover three distinct periods of the Hindoo religions—first, the Vedic or pre-Brahmanistic; second, the Brahmanistic, including the Institutes of Menu and the Epic poems, a period during which the systems of philosophy, the Hindoo trinity, the division of people into castes, etc., arose, and during which the extensive system of Buddhism arose and declined so far as India is concerned; third, the more modern writings embraced in the Puranas, Tantras, etc.

BRAHMANISM.

From what has been said it is to be inferred that the ancient and extensive system of religion known as Brahmanism came into existence upon the decline of the more ancient Vedic system, when the Vedic or purely nature gods were supplanted by Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva—the Hindoo trinity—together with the almost infinite number of gods which have evolved from them, the creations of the vast tribe of priests which have ministered to the masses in behalf of the trinity.

Vishnu's name, it will be remembered, was mentioned in the Vedas while Brahma's was not; but it was not as one of the trinity, but more strictly a representation of the sun. When Brahma was devised and taken up, an evolution of the impersonal and all-pervading Brahm, Vishnu, and Siva became his partners and coöperated with him in forming the great Hindoo godhead or trinity, and this more than a thousand years before the Yahweh of the Jews, by the addition of the Son and the Holy Ghost, became the Christian godhead or trinity.

The impersonal and infinite Brahm originally meant force, will, wish, and the progressive power of creation, or, in other words, the law of evolution in the universe. As Max Müller remarks: "This impersonal Brahm as soon as it is named grows into something strange and divine. It ends by being one of many gods, one of the great triad worshiped to the present day. This is only one of the many instances where the forces and principles of nature have been accorded personality and become worshiped as beings or individualities. In fact this has been the case with the greater part of the gods which have been worshiped in the world. In the esoteric sense they were simply principles or forces of nature, but in the exoteric sense they came to be regarded as persons, when they really became dwarfed and crude; for the moment personality or the properties of a being are imparted to an ever-prevailing and everywhere-pervading principle or force, the quality of infinity is necessarily destroyed. A being or person can occupy but one place, one point, in the universe at any given point of time; while infinity must be everywhere alike, as much in distant worlds and systems a million times as far away as the most distant visible fixed stars, as upon this diminutive globe. It is utterly illogical and crude to regard any being or personality as infinite."

Yahweh, of the Jews, is no exception to the general rule; the earliest conception of him was a crude, nature god—the sun or fire—and in the conceptions of a crude and ignorant people he evolved into a person, and was thought to be furnished with all the parts and organs of a human being. It is only ignorant and unthinking people who can be so crude as to give personality and organs and parts to a great force and principle in the universe. Thus Brahm—ever existing force and life—was immensely greater than the being or person, Brahma, who really was but the third part of a triune god. In the same way it may truthfully be said that Yahweh, when regarded as the moving, life-giving force in nature, was immensely greater than when he became dwarfed in the form and proportions of a man, when he could walk about like a man, eat meat and bread like a man, have his feet washed like a man, show his back parts like a man, beget a son like a man, nd ultimately become but the third part of a god, no larger, no more powerful, and no better than the gods of many other nations which have been worshiped within the past five thousand years. It must certainly be set down as a great falling away in godship to degenerate from a great and universal force in the universe to be the third part of a personal god.

It was the same with Brahma; when he was Brahm, the impersonal force or principle, he was grand; but when he became personalized, and but a third part of a person at that, he lessened immensely, and the religion which grew out of this littling process also became crude, imperfect, and even base. This personalizing of gods, and the increasing of them to almost an unlimited extent, has been the curse of Hindoo religion. It has brought in crudities and monstrosities repulsive to meditate upon. It is said that the personal gods of the Hindoos are now to be counted by millions. Brahma, though regarded as the parent or superior god, the creator of all below him, is now scarcely worshipped at all, and very few representations are seen of him, unless when he forms a third part of the Hindoo godhead—three persons in one. He has virtually stepped into the background, and now has no worshipers, while Vishnu and Siva, the other fractional parts of gods, with their numerous companions, have worshipers by the millions. Brahma, in his best estate, was a god of no little consequence, but he has retrograded very greatly, and the religion named after him has become a conglomeration of senseless superstitions and crudities.

The priests of Brahma gave it out long ago that they came from the mouth of Brahma, and were, consequently, much better than the mass of their fellow-beings, and therefrom they derived the superiority of caste which they claimed. They also held that the second or soldier class came from Brahma's arms; the traders and farmers from his thighs; while the Soudras, or the inferior race, came from his feet. The priests, thus claiming superiority for themselves, assumed, as priests have always done, to make known the will and purposes of their god, and to lay down laws and rules for the government of the classes below them, pertaining not only to prayer, worship, and sacrifices, but also with regard to all the duties of life. The people readily conceded that the priests of Brahma knew best what kind of food the people should eat, what water they should drink, what air they should breathe, what clothes they should wear, how their hair should be shorn, what the length of handle the ladle should have which was used in sacrifice, as well as the other of the thousand and one things of daily life; the same as, at a date no earlier, the Hebrew Moses took it upon himself to lay down the minute rules by which his fellow-countrymen should be governed. The Hindoo priests have continued to rule, with a heavy hand, their countrymen till the present day, and it is probable that more corruptions have grown into their system of religion, or at least among a part of the religions of India, than almost any other in the world.

While Brahma has neither temples nor altars, nor images of himself, nor worshipers, Vishnu and Siva have great numbers of temples, great numbers of altars and images, and great numbers of worshipers. In fact, an active opposition and rivalry grew up between the worshipers of Vishnu and those of Siva, which grew into bitter hatred and animosity. It seems that gods hate each other, or at least that their worshipers do.

It is, perhaps, not easy to decide whether Vishnu or Siva have had the most worshipers. Vishnu has been very popular from his nine incarnations, especially the last three, Rama, Christna, and Buddha. Christna, the favorite son of the god Vishnu, had many millions of ardent admirers and worshipers, and the same continues to the present day. It will be remembered that Vishnu overshadowed a virgin called Devanaguy, who was also the daughter of a virgin, and that after the young god Christna was born a wicked tyrant named Nanda, the wicked Rajah of Madura, sought to destroy the young god's life by causing all the young infants of that part of the country to be massacred; but the young god was divinely preserved, and grew up to be a great teacher of morals, to be the leader of a band of disciples, who followed him from place to place, and daily listened to the divine instructions which fell from his lips; a god who performed many wonderful miracles, but was eventually betrayed and put to death by a bitter enemy, and executed on a tree by the side of the river Ganges, as a propitiation for the sins of his fellow-men All this was firmly believed in a thousand years before the time of Christ of Palestine, for Christna was the incarnation of Vishnu before that of Buddha, and the latter was born 640 years B.C., and did not flourish till a few centuries after the time of Christna.

The name of Siva does not appear in the Vedas, but his worship, nevertheless, reaches far back into antiquity. His worshipers were those who were governed by fear and terror at the various destructive and disastrous forces in nature, such as floods, drouths, earthquakes, tempests, disease, and death. His queen, or at least one of them, was Kali, a terrible black goddess, whose worship was attended with revolting features. The phallic worship was connected with the worship of Siva many thousand years ago, and is still continued. The linga, or lingum, being a representation of the union of the male and female organs of generation—the phallis and the yoni—which also entered largely into the worshipful ideas of many ancient nations, have been duplicated tens of thousands, and probably millions of times all over India, and are in existence to-day as numerously as ever. There is hardly a temple or shrine in India where the linga is not to be found, and where it was placed as a representation of creative power, the source of life, etc. This phallic form of worship, together with the worship of the sun and the heavenly bodies are probably among the oldest ideas of divinity common with the human race.

As before observed, with the lapse of centuries, the inferior gods of India have increased till they are now said to amount to millions. Among them are Genesse, the elephant god, the sacred bull, which is probably a relic of the Aryan reverence for the bovine species, the famous Jaganath or Juggernaut, and others too numerous to mention.

While the people who have been professors of Brahmanism, claimed to number 150,000,000 of people, have divided up into numerous sects, some of them holding to absurdities as crude, apparently, as among any of the savages of Africa, and though such a numerous category of gods are worshiped here, it must not be supposed as a consequence that there are no people of high intelligence among the devotees of Brahmanism, for this is by no means the case. There are thousands of as deep thinkers, as profound philosophers, among the Brahmans as among any class in the world—men who hold as high reverence for the unalterable and ever-present forces of nature, as are entertained by the soundest scientists of Europe or America.

Let it be remembered, too, that though such a great plurality of gods are worshiped in India, there are many thousands of men in the country who believe in none of these gods, who believe in no personal or finite deities, and recognize only the eternal and unchangeable forces of nature to be the causes of all results, the universal, self-existent source of all life and being. There are many Atheists in India.

It will not do to try here to trace out or describe a tithe of the sects which the religions of India have been divided and subdivided into, for probably there is no country in the world more prolific in getting up sects and systems of religion. I will now stop to mention but one of the Hindoo sects, and that is the Jainas, quite a numerous sect, which has existed for many centuries. I will leave the consideration of Buddhism—though its founder was an inhabitant of India, and the religion had its first growth here, but was afterwards forced out—until I reach Ceylon, where it flourishes greatly, and where I shall come far more in contact with it than in India.

JAINISM.

This division of the Hindoo religion, which can hardly be considered as a branch of Brahmanism, is some two thousand years of age, but has not spread into other countries as Buddhism has done; and though its adherents now number many millions they do not number as many as they did a thousand years ago; the religion has lost the brilliancy which first attended its outburst and caused it to spread exclusively over India. It has, also, like the other religions of India, though pure at the start, degenerated into a system of idol-worship, though it can hardly be denied that the adherents of this religion practice as good morals as the followers of other systems in India, and perhaps in the world.

The founder of the Jain religion was Arhata, a king of the Benkata Hills in the South Carnatis. Early retiring from the world, he devoted his life to religious services, and went about exhorting the people to follow the holy example of Rishabha Deva, whose character he held up as a model to imitate.

Rishabha Deva is mentioned in the fifth book of Sri-Mata-Bhagavata, and according to a popular belief of the Hindoos was a part-incarnation of Vishnu. The Jains acknowledge him as the first Arhata of that great god, and he was styled Arhata because, following in the wake of Resava, he set about effecting a religious reformation. According to the Puranas, Rishabha was father of Bharata, and flourished in very early times. The Jains do not deny the existence of God, but they hold the Arhata to be that god. It is said in Vitara-gastati, a Jain work, that there is only one creator of the world and no other, who is eternal and omnipresent; and besides him everything else here is a source of evil, and unsubstantial even as a dream. "O Arahata! there is nothing in this world which thou hast not created." The attributes of this Jain creator are claimed to be different from Brahma, the creator of the Hindoos; they believe him to be omniscient, conqueror of anger, envy, and of every evil passion, revered in the three worlds, and the speaker of truth. "Arhata only is the true god."

In the opinion of the Jains virtue is the only avenue to salvation. Virtue absolves man from the bonds of action, and therefore restores him to the original purity of his nature. Salvation in its very nature is uplifting. The Jains have it thus: There is a limit beyond which even the sun, moon, and planets cannot rise; and when they reach their point of climax, they come down again. But the souls that have once attained perfection never fall again. The very tendency of the soul, they hold, is to rise higher and higher. It grovels below only because of the mortal tenement which contains it; or, in other words, because it is weighted down with clayey environment As soon as this mortal coil is shuffled off it resumes its original nature. Infinite is space; so, infinite is the progress of the soul; or infinite is the progress which the soul is capable of. A pumpkin, they say, though light enough to float easily itself, if freighted down heavily with clay, would sink to the bottom of the ocean; but if it can be disburthened of the clayey encumbrance it will at once rise to the surface again. It is the same with the soul.

The Jain moralists say:

Wisdom is an attribute of man; wisdom only can lead to salvation, enable man to sail safely the solemn sea of life. Wisdom only can dispel the gloom of false knowledge like mists are dispelled by the rays of the morning sun. Wisdom only can absolve man from the consequences of action. Wisdom is supreme, and no action can equal wisdom. Wisdom is joy. Wisdom is the great good, the all in all. Wisdom is Brahma.

Further on in the ethical part of the Jain religion it continues in this wise:

A man should dwell only where virtue, truth, purity, and good name are prized, and where one may obtain the light of true wisdom.

Man should not dwell where the sovereign is a boy, a woman, or an ignoramus, or where there are two kings.

A man should go nowhere without an object in view.

A man should not travel alone, nor sleep alone in a house, or on an elevated place; nor enter any man's house suddenly.

A good man should not wear torn or dirty clothes; nor put on his body a red flower, except it be a red lily.

A wise man should never deceive gods nor old men; and neither should he be a persecutor nor a witness.

When you come back from a walk, you should take a little rest; and then put off your clothes and wash your hands and feet.

A grinding mill, a cutting instrument, a cooking utensil, a water jar, are the four things that bring men to sin; which again in its turn causes them to deviate from the path of virtue. For these are the sources of envy. Take what course you will, they are sure to give rise to envy.

The ancients prescribed several virtues to enable man to escape from sin. Hence men should always practice virtuous actions.

Kindness, charity, perfect control over the passions, worshiping the gods, reverence to the guru, forgiveness, truth, purity, devotion, and honesty; these are the virtues that every householder should possess.

Virtue is too extensive. Its most prominent feature, however, is doing much good to mankind.

There are two kinds of virtue—that which atones for our sins, and that which secures and brings about salvation. The first mentioned virtue embodies the redemption of the fallen, benevolence, humanity, perfect control over the passions, and mildness. These virtues destroy sin.

Priests, gurus, guests, and distressed persons, when they come to our house, should first be welcomed, and then fed to the best of our means.

We should relieve and soothe as much as we can the sick, the hungry, the thirsty, and the frightened.

Being so fortunate as having been born men, we should always be engaged in something useful either to ourselves or to others.

There is very little difference between the Hindoo and the Jain system of morality, which, perhaps, arises from their having lived so many centuries together in the same country. Both were probably originally derived from the Aryans, from which both descended, and both will compare very favorably with the morals of any other system of religion which has been taught among men.

The Jain opinion of God as the creator is that he does not exist. They believe that the universe is without beginning or end. They hold that matter in the various forms which it is capable of occupying is eternal and cannot be either increased or decreased. In one of their works it is maintained that it is unnecessary to suppose that there is a creator of the universe, for in that case it would be just as necessary to suppose that that creator must also have had a creator. As every result must have a cause, it would by analogy be necessary for every god or creator to to have a god or creator. The soul is stated to be immortal—without beginning or end—but capable of the highest virtue, improvement, and salvation. They hold that each act of a human being produces its result, which is, according to its nature, either punishment or reward, pain or pleasure. They attach but little importance to prayer, so far as it can have any effect upon God. It must be admitted that their views have a common-sense reasonable ness about them, to say the least.

I am informed by an intelligent believer in the Jain religion that though idols are largely used in their religion, they do not consider the idols to be God or gods, but are merely used, as pictures and paintings are used, to bring to the mind and memory the person or thing which is wished to be commemorated, and that they do not worship the images, but the principles in the universe which the images are supposed to represent. I cannot, at all events, see that it is any worse than the images and pictures which the Romish and Greek Christians have in their churches and cathedrals, and which the more ignorant classes absolutely worship. If the Christians require images and paintings of their God and goddesses and saints, why not allow the poor Hindoos the same privileges?

THE PARSEES AND THEIR RELIGION.

There are in Bombay some sixty thousand of the class of people called Parsees, the descendants of the ancient Persians, or the Guebres—the followers of Zoroaster, also called sun and fire worshipers. In the other parts of India there are some forty thousand more, making about one hundred thousand altogether. They are an intelligent, enterprising, active class of people, and are either engaged in the mercantile line or are employed as accountants and clerks in banks, government offices, or other responsible positions. They are a thrifty class, and seem to know how to get along and live comfortably in the world. They are not more than half as dark as the Hindoos—about as dark as Chinamen—and seem much more like Europeans than natives of the country. They have been called the Jews of the East, from their sharpness, enterprise, etc. The most of them speak English well, and are wide-awake and on the lookout for an opportunity of making a few rupees in a legitimate way. They live in better style than the average Hindoos, and in the after part of the day many carriages containing Parsees may be seen out for a pleasure drive when the heat of the sun is over. The men principally wear a dark cap or turban, pointed at the top, much in the shape of the miter worn by popes and cardinals. The majority also don a dark coat, or a garment between a robe and a coat. The priests wear white turbans and white robes.

These, as observed, are what are remaining of the ancient Persians, who in the early days of Mohammedanism were warred upon and conquered by the Arabs and Moguls, the followers of the prophet. In the year 640 of our era the remnant of this persecuted people were forced to leave their own country and seek safety and rest in India. They were called Parsees, from the province named Pars, whence they came. They found in India that toleration which they could no longer find in their own country. They early made their way to Bombay, where the larger bulk of them have since resided. They brought their religion with them, even to the sacred fire from their temples in Persia, with which they lighted the fires in their temples, in the land of their adoption, and these fires have since been kept burning. There are several of these Parsee temples in Bombay, but they are too sacred for the feet of unbelievers from the Western world to tread upon their Mosaic floors. But I learn that each of these places of worship are divided into three compartments—the outer court, into which only Parsees can enter; the inner court, where only priests can enter; and the holy of holies, where the sacred fire is kept burning by priests, the flame being continued by the fragrant sandal-wood and other precious woods. The Parsees claim not to worship fire direct, but regard it as the symbol of the sun, and the sun they regard as the representative of their tutelar deity Ormuzd, which again is the offshoot or representative of the great, eternal, omnipresent, universal, impersonal, creative principal—Ahura-Mazda. The most pious Parsees pray twenty-four times a day, and when praying they turn toward the sun, but if the sun is not visible, or is not above the horizon, they turn toward the holy fire, its representative. I have seen them on their knees in prayer in the street with their faces turned toward the setting sun, bowing their faces nearly to the earth before him. I have often said if men must worship, and are not content to worship humanity and to serve it, there is no object so appropriate as the glorious orb of day, the center and controlling power of our solar system, and the source of light, heat, and life. When I see these pious Parsees bowing before this visible, real, and effective representation of power and glory it does not shock me at all. When I worship anything beyond my brothers and sisters of my own kind it shall be the sun, the grandest object to us in the whole great system of the universe. There may be other suns grander and greater, but they are too far away, and our own sun to us is the greatest, the most omnipotent, the most glorious.

BIBLE EXERCISE.—Giv some particulars concerning Nebuchadnezzar. Nebuchadnezzar was king of Babylon. He stood six cubits high, and the weight of his coat was five thousand shekels of brass, and the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam. He set up an image of a golden calf. And that same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote on his wall, "Minnie, Minnie, tickle the parson;" which being interpreted, meaneth, "Many are called but few chosen." He thereupon broke Israel's bones, and carried the Jews into captivity; wherefore the Lord made him eat grass, and smote Egypt in his first-born, for his mercy endureth forever.—Freethinker.

MR. EDITOR: I am one of your old friends. No doubt I told you many years ago that I was born Jan. 31, 1799. Well, you see I am yet able to use the pen. I inclose $5 for the Round-the-World books. I hav no expectation of living to read them, but I hav four worthy children to leave them to, who are all entirely of Infidel grit.
Dear brother, can we not hope to meet in the spirit world? I hope. Existence is too fine a thing to be lost so quick. Farewell, J. A. RUTHERFORD.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $10—$3 for your paper, $5 for Round-the-World trip, and $2 for the portraits of Paine, Ingersoll, and Bennett.
The glorious truths of Liberalism penetrate the average orthodox intellect very slowly in this region. They mistake brassy egotism and blind credulity for logical reasoning and scientific facts. The people are groping in the dark miasmatic dungeon of myths and fables, and would assassinate the man who would offer to lead them into perpetual sunshine.
IRA E, DRAPER.

CANTON, DAK., April 26, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for the Round-the-World trip. I am rather late in sending in my money, put I suppose it is better late than never. My part of the fund will help the traveler across the states. I presume he is in America by this time. I hav been a reader of your old theology-smasher (THE TRUTH SEEKER) for five years, and I hav gained more knowledge from its pages than I ever did from all the preaching of the chosen ones I hav ever heard or read. I hope Mr. Bennett has had a very pleasant tour, and that he may liv long to impart the knowledge he has gained to all the rest of mankind. Welcome home! is my greeting. C. W. MCCRONE.

CROTON LANDING, N. Y., April 24, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1.15—$1 for my paper, and fifteen cents to pay for postage on my first volume of the Round-the-World books. I feel as if it was taxing Mr. Bennett a little too hard to pay forty-five cents postage on the three volumes. So you see I will relieve him of that burden as far as I am personally concerned. CHAS. E. PETERSON.

EDINA, MO., April 23, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: We hav been visited here by Mr. Geo. Wendling, the "silver-tongued orator," as the Western press calls him, and the champion defender of Christianity. Like almost every Christian that does not recognize the only true Christian church, the Roman Catholic, he has a Christianity of his own without hell and devil. He was announced to lecture on "Ingersollism from a Secular Standpoint," but did lecture on "Voltaire," saying that it would serve the same purpose. His delivery was simply splendid, but his discourse was full of assertions without the least proof, reminding me of passing through a cornfield, when, plucking a beautiful husk which I thought contained corn, I found by opening it that it contained naught but mildew and mold. He called Infidelity the arch-enemy of rest and quietude and therefore the enemy of home and fireside, perhaps forgetting for the moment that his own client Jesus Christ told the young man "he had not where to lay his head." He often grew ridiculous, saying that as Infidelity sows irreverence broadcast it will reap irreverence, for while our great men, as Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln, will always be called by the American nation by their full names, the champions of Infidelity will only be known, except by their friends, as Tom Paine and Bob Ingersoll.

Time and space do not permit me to giv you a full outline of the discourse, but the lecturer made one assertion which lies so near your own door that, as a faithful reader of your paper, I must mention it. Near the end of his discourse he held up before the audience two newspapers, stating that they were the latest numbers of two of the leading organs of Infidelity, one of the East and one of the West. He did not name the papers, but a friend of mine ascertained that they were THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Age. The lecturer stated that both these papers contained articles which, if he would read them before the audience, would cause every decent man and woman to leave the house. Perhaps you can find time and opportunity to answer this last assertion yourself. As for me, I hav always found your paper an advocate of, though not Christian, purity and morality, and as such I prize it as a welcome visitor.
BENJAMIN E. BLOOM.

[Mr. Geo. R. Wendling, Christian, will please point out wherein THE TRUTH SEEKER has printed any such stuff (except extracts from the Bible) as he insinuates, or else he will please consider himself denounced as a slandering and cowardly liar, and he can make the most and best of it.—ED. T. S.]

FARMINGTON, UTAH, April 18, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I feel an especial pride in sending you the inclosed clipping for publication in your journal. Myself and a few friends of the the League took a drive last evening, returning after midnight, to attend the meeting in Salt Lake City, and I can assure you we felt well repaid for our long drive. The speeches were immense and noble, and they were so not so much because of the oratorical powers displayed as for the noble and Liberal expressions given. And yet it need not be inferred that because they were Liberal they were in anywise tame. They were radical in the truth. I hav been long and anxiously looking for this thing, sometimes fearing it would not be accomplished for some time to come. I am sorry that we did not get a verbatim report in the papers of the speeches, so that some of the noble expressions might be preserved.

The Mr. Charles Bright referred to is a gentleman from Australia who has been lecturing two evenings a week for several weeks past in Salt Lake City on Freethought questions, and who has been the means of bringing to pass so soon the movement for organization. Mr. Bright laid great stress on and he gave great force to the idea that it was not enough that an organization or government should be good, but it was essentially necessary that it should be republican in that it was of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. Henry W. Lawrence gave out some good ideas, among others that we had been trying to serve God long enough,, and the time had now come when we should begin to serve man.

Gen. M. M. Bane was very eloquent indeed. I shall watch with a great deal of interest the completion of the organization, and hope it will be such that I can take a hand in the same. It certainly will be if last evening is a foreboding of the future. I attach a great deal of importance to this movement, as, if it resolves itself into the right kind of an organization, it will be a great center in this territory for Liberal work. I would hav preferred that they resolve themselvs into an auxiliary of the National Liberal League, but perhaps it is as well for the present that they attempted no more. I think they will grow into it in a short time. Maybe Mr. Bennett will be able to effect it when he visits there, for which I am told arrangements are being made. Before closing I will say that we are overhauling our League constitution and by-laws, and are to hav them printed for circulation. As soon as we get them I will send you a copy. I am, with respect,
Your fellow-worker and well-wisher,
WALTER WALKER, Sec. Utah L. L.

FREETHOUGHT MASS-MEETING.

From the Salt Lake City Tribune.

A very enthusiastic and large assemblage met at the Liberal Institute last evening, in response to the call published in the Tribune for a day or two past. Mr. D. F. Walker was called to the chair, and Mr. T. C. Armstrong appointed secretary. Speeches were made by Mr. Charles Bright, Gen. M. M. Bane, Mr. H. W. Lawrence, and Mr E. L. T. Harrison.

The following resolutions were accepted:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting it is advisable that an association be formed, to be called The Utah Freethought Union, the objects of which shall be the dissemination of Liberal ideas, resistance to all forms of oppression, and the promotion of union and brotherhood among Liberals of all descriptions.

Resolved, That in order to carry out the objects set forth in the foregoing resolution a provisional committee be formed and empowered to receive the names of intending members at a subscription of not less than $1 per quarter, or $4 per annum, to prepare the basis and rules of the organization and to report at a future meeting. Said committee to consist of David P. Walker, M. M. Bane, H. W. Lawrence, H. M. Walker, Edward Austin, H. P. Mason, E. L. T. Harrison, T. C. Armstrong, Sen., James Lowe, W. D. Williams, John Tullidge, and Dr. Chapman.

All the speeches were loudly applauded, and the meeting altogether a great success.

H. L. GREEN'S LECTURE TRIP.

WAVERLY, IOWA, May 1, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Since my last communication to the THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav lectured in the following named places: Dowagiac, Holland City, Nirvana, and Baldwin, of Michigan; Fulton, Bloomington, and Patch Grove, of Wisconsin; and Charles City, Nashua, Waverly, and Jefferson City, of Iowa. I was invited to Dowagiac by Mr. Richard Heddon, an intelligent, activ Liberal, and while there enjoyed the hospitality of his pleasant home. I was permitted to speak in the Universalist church, the best church edifice in town. I was glad to learn that the Universalists of Dowagiac, with few exceptions, are members of the church of humanity, and are in favor of free speech, and always willing to open the church to any one who desires to utter his or her honest convictions. While there I took down the names of the leading Freethinkers, among whom were a number of the members of the Universalist church, but I am sorry to say I hav lost the memoranda. I remember the names of Mr. and Mrs. A. Knapp, worthy and enthusiastic Liberals, who came five or six miles through the rain to attend the lecture. Of such will be "the kindom of man."

The next place where I preached the gospel of Freethought was at Holland City, Michigan. I was much surprised to get an invitation to lecture here, for I think there is no more orthodox town in the United States. The most of the inhabitants are Holland Dutch, and they are very superstitious. Such a thing as a Liberal meeting was never before heard of in this city, and the announcement that such a meeting was to be held stirred up a great commotion, and the day before the lecture a committee was sent to the proprietor of the Opera House to prevail upon him to cancel his contract for the hall. But he was so much of a man that he would not do so, and we had a very respectable audience; and it was a surprise to me that in that reason-forsaken town they were able to raise eleven dollars to pay the expenses of the lecture. Two gentlemen are entitled to the credit of introducing Freethought into this place, viz., Messrs. F. A. Fisher and Johannes Elenbaas. Mr. Fisher is the gentleman I mentioned in one of my recent letters as a suitable person for a Liberal missionary for this town, and I again suggest that your readers immediately after reading these lines send him a package of Liberal literature for general circulation. Mr. Fisher is a poor man, has poor health, and a large family; and if anyone has twenty-five cents or a dollar that he wants to place where it will do great good, let him send it to brother Fisher. I very much enjoyed the society of himself and his family, and shall always remember his bright children. With a little aid brother Fisher can revolutionize this dark corner of the earth.

From Holland I went again up north into the pine regions of Michigan and spent a Sunday in the town of Nirvana, and while there was the most of the time the guest of F. D. Lacy. Here I found a new town full of Freethinkers, and I never addressed an audience where there were more intelligent people, according to the size of it; and I was pleased to learn they contemplate organizing a Liberal League here soon. Mr. F. D. Lacy is writing and publishing a book, and I predict it will hav a large sale, judging from some of the proof sheets he read to me. The title of it is "Nature's Harmony; or, a Gleam from the Other Side." Mr. Lacy is not a Spiritualist, as might be inferred from this title, but is a believer in some kind of future existence. Mr. Lacy is a good speaker and proposes before long to go into the lecture field. I had a most interesting visit while here with Adonis McMath, one of your subscribers, and the postmaster of the village. I was pleased also to make the acquaintance of Mr. Albert C. Allen and N. J. Terry. I lectured on Saturday and Sunday evenings, and a Methodist minister of the town was present on both occasions and gave good attention; and, to my surprise, the second evening brought some of his family with him, and the morning I left shook hands with me and wished me success.

I next visited another new lumber town a few miles east—the village of Baldwin. This is the county seat of Lake county. I was gratified to learn that nearly all the county officers were outspoken Freethinkers and subscribers to Liberal papers. These are the persons I refer to: Judge W. A. Burnham; O. F. Phelps, recorder; Isaac Grant, treasurer; and Edward McLusky, treasurer. Brother Phelps got up the meeting, and he has no fears of speaking on all proper occasions just what he thinks. While there I was splendidly taken care of by Judge W. A. Burnham, who is the proprietor of the Occidental Hotel.

Persons who hav never visted northern Michigan can hav little idea of the magnitude of the lumber business. There are probably a thousand lumber towns in northern Michigan where no other business is engaged in. I was glad to learn that there is very little orthodoxy through this region. It would be an admirabie place for some intelligent young Liberal to settle who is a good speaker and who desires to constantly engage in Liberal lecturing. Preachers get a very meager support in this section.

The next town I visited was Ludington, on the shore of Lake Michigan. There are many Liberals here, but as no hall could be obtained I took a steamboat for Chicago, and had a very pleasant ride for one hundred and thirty miles up the lake. What a large, grand lake this is. For fifteen hours we were out of sight of land just as much as we would hav been on the Atlantic Ocean. The boat I came down upon was the Lawrence, and I found the captain a gentleman who took pleasure in making his passengers comfortable. I staid over night in Chicago. Made a short call on my old friend, William Sager, formerly of Syracuse, and the next morning took the cars for Fulton, on the Mississippi river, where I intended to take a boat up to Gregory, about one hundred and fifty miles north. I arrived at Fulton about 2 P.M., and, finding I could not get a boat and must stay until next morning to get a train of cars, I looked around to see if arrangements could not be made for a lecture there that evening. I found the post-master took the Boston Investigator—his name I cannot remember—and he said he would get me a hall for his part, and he did so; and I went into the schools and to every business place and gave out the notice by word of mouth, and the result was we had a very respectful audience, and I hope some good seed was sown, for there is need enough of it, as I could not find another person but the postmaster who took a Liberal paper; and the postmaster, although a good man, I think did not proclaim his views "on the house-top." If he had done so he probably would not hav been postmaster in that bigoted town.

My ride the next day up the bank of the father of waters was a pleasant one. There was a great freshet about this time, and the river was nearly up to high-water mark. The next day the stage Prairie du Chien took me back eighteen miles into a most delightful country. Bloomington, Wis., was my stopping place. Here I found another Freethought town. I was invited here by Frank Joseph Schell, as earnest and activ a Freethinker as I ever met. Mr. Schell is a very modest man, and requested me not to eulogize him in the Liberal papers, but I must say that so thorough a Liberal worker I seldom come across. Here I delivered two lectures—one Sunday and one Monday evening—in the large and commodious opera house. Friend Schell engaged a number of young ladies to do the singing, but some good (?) orthodox people alarmed some of the girls by representing that it might be detrimental to their characters to sing at an Infidel meeting, and they, therefore, declined; but in their place we had the fine brass band, all of whom are intelligent Liberals, led by George Taylor. This band gave us good music.

The following are a few of the leading Liberals of Bloomington: James Ballentine, David Ballentine, Peter Woodhouse, Lemon Hulford, Daniel Brown, Patrick Bardyle, and John Barnum.

On Sunday afternoon I went over to Patch Grove, and spoke before the Patch Grove Liberal League. Here I found many stanch Liberals, and if time would hav permitted, I would like to hav spent a number of days with them. This League is in good condition, and will be well represented, I hav no doubt, at the St. Louis Congress. The following are some of the most activ members of this League: Alexander Paul, P.M., William Humphrey, Henry Jung, George Ballentine, John Bitwell, James Paul, John Wolfendon, James Heden, and George Lamb.

The next place that I cast anchor and lectured was at Charles City, Iowa, some one hundred miles east of the Mississippi river. This is further west than I ever was before, and I found it a delightful country. At Charles City I was pleasantly entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Mahara. I was pleased to find his young daughter so much pleased in Liberal reading. Mr. Mahara is not afraid to express his opinions, if he is in business.

I had a pleasant visit at the home of Mr. Andrews, who has for many years been an earnest worker in all reform movements. It is seldom I come across so bright and sprightly a woman as the mother of Mrs. Andrews, who is over eighty years of age. She says her uniform practice has been through life to be as happy and joyful as possible, and always look on the bright side of everything. And when she is asked how she does, she invariably replies, "First-rate." She spends but little time talking about funerals and death-beds. While there I also made the acquaintance of Mrs. T. C. Woolley. Mr. Tucker and Hon. Karl Markle are all of our household of faith.

Nashua was my next stopping place. Here I found very few out-spoken Liberals, but many silent members of our church. But by the aid of R. H. Way, the proprietor of the Commercial Hotel, we succeeded in getting together quite an audience, who listened attentivly to my lecture for nearly two hours, and the people became so much interested that they hav just engaged Col. M. E. Billings, of Waverly, to deliver a course of lectures there.

For the last week I hav been stopping at Waverly, Iowa, and last Friday evening lectured before Liberal League No. 116 at the opera house, and yesterday afternoon (Sund) lectured under its auspices at Jefferson City. This League is doing a grand work in this section. It has 340 members. Mathew Farrington is president, W. P. McCormack, vice-president; Col. M. E. Billings, secretary; Mrs. Eli Barns, treasurer. The League for the last two years has met regularly once a month, but now proposes to meet every two weeks. It is composed of the best people in this vicinity, and its meetings are well attended. Since I hav been here I hav made my headquarters at W. P. McCormack's, and I shall never forget the pleasant visit I hav there enjoyed. Mr. McCormack is one of the best Liberal workers in the state, and his intelligent wife and daughter, Miss Calla May, are all in full accord with him. Miss McCormack often writes for the Liberal papers, and few young ladies of nineteen years of age are better versed in Liberal views than she is.

Col. Billings makes it lively for the "servants of God." His publication, entitled "The Crimes of Preachers," is having a large circulation. Every mail brings orders for it. The next edition, which is soon to be published, will contain two or three hundred additional ministerial crimes. Every Freethinker should order a copy. Col. Billings is one of the leading lawyers of this section, and a fine speaker, and often speaks in behalf of Freethought principles. I am pleased to announce that he has promised to be present at the Freethinkers' Convention at Watkins in August. I am sure he will interest our Eastern people.

This large working League has reason to be proud of its noble president, Hon. Mathew Farrington. He is recognized everywhere as one of the leading citizens of the state. For two days I was admirably entertained at his pleasant country house, and greatly enjoyed viewing his splendid farm. He has an intelligent family of children, who are in full accord with him, and I shall remember my visit there with pleasure, and shall not forget the sweet little grandson, only a few months old. I predict he will be a star in the Liberal ranks in the future. And I must not forget to mention, in this connection, my good friends Harry Tallet and Alma N. Wood, two of the stanch supporters of Liberalism here. They hav some money, I am glad to know, and propose to use it to advance the cause of Freethought. I was also pleased to take by the hand that stalwart Freethinker Moses St. Johns, of Waterloo. Also Guy Farnsworth, Peter Valentine and wife, and also H. J. Russell, a live young Liberal of Waverly. There are many others I would like to mention, if space would permit. Truly yours, H. L. GREEN.

MARSHALL, KY., April 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of April 15th G. C. T. Hall, in criticising a letter which I wrote to your paper some time since, charges me with saying that "woman ever will be a supporter of the church." If I hav ever even hinted such a thing I do not know it. I said, "Woman has always favored church rule and church persecution, and she favors it still." If there is anything in this which indicates that woman "ever will" support the church, I fail to discover it. He asks, "Who established the church?" The base deceptions and vile tricks of priestly men eighteen hundred years ago do not concern the question of woman suffrage in the nineteenth century. The question is not who established the church in the Old World, but who wish to hav an established church in the New. Again he says, "Woman's reasoning powers are in every way as clear as those of man." Partly right and partly wrong. Naturally woman is man's intellectual equal, but this long siege of slavery to superstition, priest, and husband has done it with its little hatchet. She has learned to love her king, and wants to see every one bow to him. Man spread the mantle of superstition over woman's mind, and so firmly has she "pinned her faith" to it that she would hav it spread over all the world. She would hav our statute books enshrined in it. She would not respect the rights of those whose minds were not incased in the same holy wrapper. And yet I blame man for it all. But this does not help the matter in the least. It has been done and must be undone. So let us all be up and (un)doing.

Yours for doing good and undoing evil,

S. V. MULKEY.

PAWTUCKET, R. I., April 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I take THE TRUTH SEEKER through a periodical store, for the reason that by lying on its counters it may attract the eye and cause some one to do likewise. We hav many good Liberals in this busy town, among the number the celebrated Judge Robinson, the oldest Liberal in town, a man not to be trifled with, and the all-hail-the-power-of-Jesus's-name people know it to their sorrow. One of the Latter-Day saints had a discussion with him last winter, and the old veteran used the saint up so bad that we hav heard nothing of him in his church since. Are these Latter-Day saints an improvement upon the ancient ones? What church or council canonized them? What holy man laid hands on them, commanding them to receive the Holy Ghost. Are not all these things necessary in the manufactory of a live saint? Are they set apart by the Holy Ghost like Paul and Barnabas, or are they self-appointed, or do they receive the unction from that holy saint, Joe Smith?

In the summer we hav open-air preaching and exhortations in the groves by some one of the denominations, giving a chance for us Liberals to put in a good word, a chance that is seldom neglected. One good brother of the Second Advent Society came out from the city of Providence several times to let us understand that Christ was coming to pay us a visit about Christmas, 1881. I offered to bet him a "V" that he would not come to time, but he declined to bet. Then I asked him how he would look if Christ did not come, and he answered me by asking how I should look if he did come. I said of course I should treat him as well as lay in my power. I should hav nothing to fear, never having done the gentleman any harm, but that being strangers, I should not expect to meet him in the air. Now I want the brother to come out once more and let us know why this heavenly visitor did not come to time. Did he wait for the last train, or meet with any accident? Did he get snowed in? Are the engineers and firemen on a strike? Did he not hav the "spondulicks" for the passage? Is he sick or otherwise indisposed? Has Vanderbilt or Jay Gould any control over that road? Why did he not telegraph, telephone, or in some way state his reasons for his non-appearance? Does he not know that his non-arrival put many people to inconveniences? Some did not buy an overcoat for the winter, thinking that the Lord would make it warm enough for them without one. Bro. Knight, please come and giv us the reasons, and set another time for your friend's visit somewhere in the future, say about two million years, so the present generation may not find out your errors.

I hav not yet subscribed for Mr. Bennett's book of travel around the world, but I must hav them at any price. Yours truly, ROBERT H. NELSON.

SHAWANEE, WIS., April 27 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is remarkable how stupidly Christian bigots stultify themselvs in slandering Thomas Paine. Instance the letter of "B" to Elmina, entitled "Beating their Mother," and so well answered by her in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 15th. "B." says that Benjamin Franklin, writing to Paine, urging him not to publish the "Age of Reason," said to him, "You are probably indebted to religion for the habits of virtue on which you so justly value yourself." Here Franklin, who knew him well, emphatically indorses Paine's moral character and the correct habits of virtue, in which he says he justly valued himself, and yet the Christian bigots and priesthood, whom Paine hit such hard and fatal blows, persist in falsely representing him as the most drunken, immoral, and vicious of men. Of course, taking St. Paul and the early and modern Christian teachers for example, they are justified in "lying for Christ's sake," but it would look better to lie so as not to stultify themselvs in such a bare-faced way.

W. S. W.

AYER, MASS., April 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the first volume of Mr. Bennett's Round-the-World books, and consider its value far more than its cost. It embodies the observations of one who has the rare faculty of seeing things as they are, through Infidel eyes, unlearned in the school tradition, veneration, fear, and falsehood. The gun which orthodoxy and bigotry shot for Bennett's destruction has recoiled with telling effect.

I trust that Bennett will call on R. B. Hayes and show him the wide contrast between Infidel and Christian forbearance and forgivness. The former forgiv the injury and leave the man alive. The latter first kill their enemies and then forgiv them.

"But truth shall conquer in the end,
As round and round we run;
For ever the right comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

Yours truly, ELIJAH MYRICK.

Church Weapons.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

When o'er mankind the church held sway,
In superstition's palmy day,
The arguments the priests adored
Were thumbscrews, fagots, fire, and sword.
Now, when of these they are bereft,
The only weapons they hav left
Are threats of gods beyond the skies,
With personal abuse and lies.
Behind a wall of obscene Bibles
They skulk and sling their slanderous libels.
With hate they load their gospel guns,
And poison shoot at freedom's sons.
But truth will silence soon their roar,
And priests will be believed no more.
The persecuting, slandering clan,
No more will dwarf the mind of man.

Letter to Hon. Charles Bradlaugh.

BY FRANCIS D. LACY.

Stand to justice and to reason,
Yield not to the railing crowd;
Though they persecute thee keenly,
Still proclaim thy mind aloud.
Don't forget that o'er the ocean,
Many millions look on thee,
And behold with admiration
Thy great work across the sea.

Lips grow firm and sinews harden,
At the martyrdom of spite,
While our eyes with tears are flowing,
For our brother in the right.
Though by numbers overpowered,
And by brutal lords laid low,
Wince 'hou not in freedom's battle,
Men'al slavery overthrow.

Sacred is the right of thinking,
And our moral thoughts sustain;
Note how many noble martyrs
By the rabble hav been slain.
Though in torture, grief, and sorrow,
Pearls before rude swine are cast,
Let the mind still bid defiance;
Truth shall triumph at the last.

Though not lovers of Britannia,
Still our nation must adore
One so earnest for progression,
Even on old England's shore.
And we trust the time is coming
When thy burden of this age
Shall be sacred to your honor
Glaring on fair history's page.

Gladly would we giv protection
If it lay within our power,
But this cross is thine to suffer
At the shrine of freedom's dower.
May the spirit of great nature
Favor thee thy lot to bear,
Till those heathen lords repentant
Yield to thee thy rightful share.

Borrowed Christianity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

Please say to "J. P. S." that "eating eggs on Easter Sunday and dyeing them red" not only dates back to the "ancient Hindoos, Jews, Persians, and Egyptians," but the very day itself and festival was commemorated in the month of April by the Teutons centuries in advance of the Christian era, in honor of their mythological goddess, Ostra. Ostern, Ostera, East-ran, East-re, Eastre was the goddess of light or morning (the East), and of spring, the opening year (April); so the fathers of the Christian church pitched upon this ancient festival-day in which to celebrate the resurrection of their God, even as they also seized the pagan day, Dec. 25th, for birth, and called it Christ's (Christmas).

Verily, verily, were not, and are not these Christians economic parasites and thieves thus to substitute their festivals for their personified goddess of light and growth, not even changing the name, Easter, except as orthography has amended?

Do you suppose, Mr. Editor, that the various clergymen who celebrated Easter two weeks since so magnificently, devoutly, and earnestly, were aware of the fraud, and that they were perpetuating a heathen festival in honor of their risen God? Do you suppose they would like to hav the laity know the origin of Christmas, Santa Claus, and Easter?

For verification of these facts the reader is advised to consult Worcester's or Webster's Dictionaries unabridged, and the various encyclopedias.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION

TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

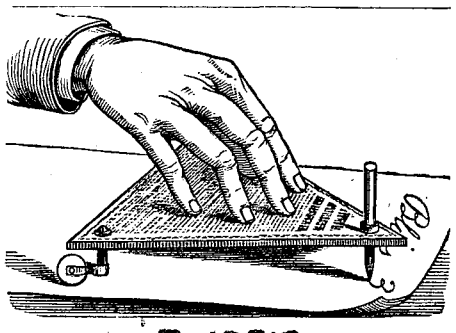
Verdict of European Scholars.

This work has received the indorsement of the Society of Critical Historical Theology of Zurich, Switzerland. The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religion Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupf rschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a critic sm of your scientific work. It is for me to communi ate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."



One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

Price, $2.25. Address, D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth st., New York.

BLISS'S Electro-Magnetic Planchette,

A wonderful and mysterious little instrument that combines electricity and animal magnetism in assisting Spirit intelligence to communicate through it with mortals. It has been in the market a little over two years, and during that time thousands of skeptical persons, yes, downright Materialists, hav been convinced that this Planchette has been MOVED BY A POWER independent of themselvs while their hands hav been placed passivly upon it.

WHAT BLISS'S ELECTRO-MAGNETIC PLANCHETTE WILL DO.

It will answer either mental or spoken questions; giv communications from departed friends; tell correctly past, present, and future events; warn persons of coming danger; tells you who are your friends and enemies; develop writing and other phases of mediumship; will write or Materialists (if they possess the least mediumistic power) as readily as it will for mediums or believers in Spiritualism, etc.

It is a great source of amusement, as well as instruction, in the family during long winter evenings, and a desirable companion at the summer resort. It is not only the best, but it is the cheapest Planchette in the market.

SKEPTICS, TRY IT, and you will never be sorry, for you cannot fail to be convinced that death does not end all; but, on the contrary, spirits survive the death of the body and can communicate with mortals.

THE ADVANTAGES CLAIMED OVER OTHER PLANCHETTES.

First. A paste-board top in place of oiled, stained, or varnished wood.

Second. Five miniature batteries upon the top of each Planchette, upon which the fingers rest.

Third. Each Planchette is separately magnetized and a signed a band of developing spirits.

Price, Fifty Cents Each.

Sent post-paid, securely packed in a neat box to any part of the United States upon receipt of price. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian ystem of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the only successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION, which is the doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of these were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a milk or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of its cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR, Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Semina. Weakness, giving the causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey, to whom all letters should be addressed.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, and system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability These in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

WHAT is an orthodox creed but a mystic "word-fetich?" Look at the wafer elevated by the Romish priest in the sacrifice of the mass as a piece of God-man—thousands prostrate before it, not daring even to look at it, so awful is their dread of the power to bless them and to curse them, to annihilate them instantly! Yet that is merely a "thing-fetich." Look now at that dogma elevated by the Protestant preacher before the logical understanding of his audience, whose souls lie prostrate in the dust before it, not daring to use their reason on it or to look it for a moment in the face, believing, as they must, that to doubt is to be damned! That is a "word-fetich."—Prof. Lesley's Man's Origin and Destiny.

TRUTH is all simple, all pure, will bear no mixture of anything else with it. It is rigid and inflexible to any bye interests; and so should the understanding be, whose use and excellence lies in conforming itself to it. To think of everything just as it is in itself is the proper business of the understanding, though it be not that which men always employ it to. This all men, at first hearing, allow is the right use every one should make of his understanding.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding

AN unexpected whirlwind will suggest to the Chinese the contest of evil spirits; and the flying of a crow in a peculiar direction fill them with consternation. "In such a deplorable state," gravely observes the missionary who records these facts, "is the heathen mind." Perhaps he did not consider that there were many, in more enlightened countries, who would be alarmed at the omen implied by a dinner party of thirteen, and who would regard it as of evil augury to begin a journey on Friday. In such a deplorable state is the Christian mind!—Amberley.

IF you should ask the question, "Is life worth living?" of a rattle-snake or an ichneumon-fly, the answer, were the answer possible, would be an emphatic yes. And from almost any standpoint outside of their individual consciousness the answer would be an emphatic no. Now, there are men and women whose social function is more injurious than that of any rattle-snake, whose habits are more parisitic than the ichneumon-fly. Ask such, Is life worth living? and the answer will be an emphatic yes; but ask the victims of their treachery, or those in whose living flesh hav been deposited the parisitic germs, and you will get a very different answer.—Chadwick's Is Life Worth Living?

TAKE navigation and ship building; does prayer add to the safety of the ship or not? If it does, will rotten wood and rusty nails do, provided the cracks are pitched "within and without" with plenty of prayer? When the archbishop of Canterbury prays over a vessel, christened by the hands of a princess, does he improve the chances of that vessel in a storm? If he does not, why does he pray? If he does, would he sail for America in a "coffin ship" full of praying missionaries as readily as in a well-built Cunarder?—Annie Besant

How many steps hav I taken in vain! Thus it happened to Israel for their sin: they were sent back again by the way of the Red Sea; and I am made to tread these steps with sorrow which I might hav trod with delight had it not been for this sinful sleep. How far I might hav been on my way by this time! I am made to tread those steps thrice over which I needed to hav trod but once; yea, now also I am like to be benighted, for the day is almost spent. Oh, that I had not slept! —Pilgrim's Progress.

LIBERTY of private judgment, if you will consider it, must at all times hav existed in the world. Dante had not put out his eyes or tied shackles on himself; he was at home in that Catholicism of his, a free-seeing soul in it—if many a poor soul had now become a slave to it. Liberty of judgment? No iron chain, or outward force of any kind could ever compel the soul of a man to believe or disbelieve; it is his own indefeasible light, that judgment of his; he will reign and believe then, by grace of God alone! . . . The right of private judgment will subsist, in full force, wherever true men subsist. A true man believes with his whole judgment, with all the illumination and discernment that is in him, and has always so believed. A false man, only struggling to "believe that he believes," will naturally manage it in some other way.—Carlyle.

THE workingman enjoys more luxuries to-day than the king of England in the Anglo-Saxon times; at his command are intellectual delights which but a little while ago the most learned in the land could not obtain. All this we owe to the labors of other men. Let us, therefore, remember them with gratitude; let us follow their example by adding something new to the knowledge of mankind; let us pay to the future the debt which we owe to the past. All men indeed cannot be poets, inventors, or philanthrophists; but all men can join in that gigantic and god-like work, the progress of creation. Whoever improves his own nature improves the universe of which he is a part. He who strives to subdue his evil passions—remnants of the old four-footed life—and who cultivates the social affection, he who endeavors to better his condition, and to make his children wiser and happier than himself; whatever may be his motives, he will not hav lived in vain.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THAT which is given to infirmity, to indigence, to honest poverty, ought to be given in secret, and known only to those who are benefited by it—such is the law of benefits between men; the one ought to forget at once what he has given, the other ought never to forget what he has received.—Seneca.

REMEMBER, O Christian, that thy gods are no more immortal than other gods hav been. As thy God conquered all former gods, and now stands supreme above their tombs, so will he, too, in turn be conquered by my god, fair Science, who will stand eternal and everlasting, because she is the only true and living god the world has ever known. —Elmina Drake Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A SIGN of the times, "This house to let."

THE palmy days of a boy's life are those in which he gets properly spanked by his mother.

"THAT's what beats me," as the boy said when he saw his father take the skate-strap down from its accustomed nail.

"I'VE been heron bad things about you," said one bird to another. "Let's stork about something else," was the response.

"WERE I to be candied, I would say you were just about the nicest fellow I ever met," said she, while leaning on his arm in front of a confectioner's. He bought the taffy.

"WOMEN are so contrary," said Blobbs. "I thought when I got married my wife would darn my socks, and let me alone; instead of that she lets my socks alone and darns me."

WHEN reprimanded by his employer for absenting himself from the office for two entire days, Fogg very calmly replied that he believed in the office seeking the man, and not the man seeking the office.

LAST Sunday evening a Boston divine suddenly paused somewhere near the end of his sermon and said: "We would be glad if that young man in the vestibule would come inside and satisfy himself whether she is or is not here. That would be much better than keeping a half-inch draft on the occupants of the back pew."

EX-PRESIDENT HAYES has sufficiently recovered from the attack of vertigo, occasioned by his gift of $250 to the Garfield monument, to be able to sit up in bed and converse with friends. His physicians insist, however, that visitors shall abstain from any allusion to the pecuniary transaction, as it might superinduce another attack.

THE editor of Puck discloses his experience by remarking, "There is nothing in this wide world that makes the young man crazier than, after arriving at a party with a young lady, whom he has got there at considerable expense, to hav some bald-headed individual get her off into a corner and talk to her all the evening on the peculiarities of the Gulf Stream.

IT was an Ohio man who, when a terrible storm set in one night, rushed into the house of a neighbor and cried out:

"Jones, this is the ending up of earth!"

"I'm afraid so; I'm afraid so!" was the reply.

"And what shall we do?"

"Make our peace with heaven!"

The wind blew still stronger, the house began to shake, and the excited man exclaimed:

"Jones, you lost five bushels of wheat last fall,"

"Yes."

"And you hav your suspicions?"

"I hav. The man who took my wheat had better own up."

"Can you forgiv him?"

"I can."

"Well—"

Here the wind suddenly dropped, and, after a look through the window, the conscience-stricken man turned and finished:

"Well, if I ever meet him I'll advise him to call around!"

ONE day a peasant who was laboring in the field was surprised at receiving a visit from the wolf, and he was about to rush for his gun, when the wolf called out:

"Hold on, my friend; my visit is one of peace. I hav come to hav a serious talk with you."

"But you killed one of my sheep only last week," protested the peasant.

"So I did, and that is the very matter I hav come to talk about. I hav felt conscience-stricken ever since that event, and hav firmly decided to kill no more sheep."

"Well, I am glad to hear it, and I hope you will stick to your resolution."

"Oh, I certainly shall, and I hope you will giv me due credit in the future."

The wolf took his departure with a sweet bow and a melting smile, and the peasant softly scratched the back of his neck and did a heap of thinking. That night he placed a large trap at the weak point in his calf-pen, and next morning he found the wolf held firm and fast.

"Excuse my embarrassment," began the wolf, as the peasant appeared; "but why did you move this trap from the sheep fold?"

"Because," replied the peasant, as he hunted around for a club, "experience has taught me that a wolf who is tired of mutton is simply working up an appetite for veal."

Moral—Don't put your foot in it.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Spectator tells the following story: A few years ago a friend of mine—there is no harm now in telling this story, as the superstition referred to in it is exploded, if not everywhere, certainly among your readers—was taking a country walk with a friend, a clergyman, when the latter suddenly wheeled round, his face toward home, with the remark:

"Let us go back, I'm tired; was called up in the middle of the night to baptize a child that was dying."

"Were you in time?" asked my friend.

"Just," was the reply; "another half minute and I should hav been too late!"

"And if you had been, what then?"

"Why, then, I suppose the poor little thing would hav been lost."

"Eternally?"

"Well, yes, according to our belief."

"May I ask what sort of boots you wear?" said my friend.

"Boots? Elastic side, always."

"Now, suppose you wore laced, and they had taken two minutes to put on, the child would hav been dead, and—lost eternally?"

"That's a peculiar view of the question; I must think over my position."

Two days after the clergyman met my friend and said: "I hav thought that matter over and must alter my view. The boots did it."

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

Marriage AND Parentage

AND THE

SANITARY AND PHYSIOLOGICAL LAWS.

FOR THE

Production of Children of Finer Health and Greater Ability.

BY A PHYSICIAN AND SANITARIAN.

"The virtues of men and women as well as their vices may descend to their children."

"There is nothing Utopian in hoping for the time to come when men and women will consult a wise sanitarian before entering into the marriage relation."

The Southern Clinic, a journal of medicin and surgery, says: "We took up this book with prejudice, but soon saw the author was a physcian, and a good one too; a sound physiologist, an instructiv writer, and a man of high moral sense;" and adds, "A race of vigorous, beautiful, sweet-tempered people would be the result of the observance of its principles."

The Home Journal, Boston, says: "We earnestly commend it to all. Its influence can be only beneficial. The author has a thorough mastery of his subject.

Demorest's Family Fashion Magazine says: "It contains enough sensible hints to set up a family."

The Alpha, edited by Dr. Winslow, says: "We like the book thoroughly." And adds: "Send for it, fathers and mothers, for your own good and for the sake of your children, who are to fill your places when you are called up higher."

The Buffalo Express says: "Whoever buys this book will find it a paying investment."

The Scientific American says: "Books on this subject are usually written by 'cranks,' but this is radically different; it is scientific, sober, clean, and worthy of conscientious consideration by every possible parent, and particularly by the young."

Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, writes: "I hav read all of your works, and feel I must study this one. Your contributions to sanitary and social science hav all been imbued with the spirit of sound conservatism and earnest conscientiousness, all too rare among reformers. Whoever gods over this book will find himself on sacred ground. It is the most valuable of your many valuable books."

Prof. N. S. Townsend, of Ohio University, writes: "I am greatly pleased with this work. I hav loaned it to some of my pupils, who express delight with it. I hope every thoughtful young man and woman will read it."

Notes and Clippings.

SURPRISED at the smile: "I'm no sectarian," said Job Shuttle as he grew warm in religious argument. "I believe every man ought to be a strict Presbyterian," and then he looked around in wonder as an audible smile wafted into the evening air.

JAMES MILL'S "History of India" is considered the best that has ever been written on that subject. When it was first written, some one said it was by no means his best production. "What is his best?" asked another. "James Mill's best production is his son, John Stuart Mill," was the ready answer.

A GENTLEMAN somewhat advanced in life, and who was never remarkable for his good looks, asked his grandchild what he thought of him. The boy's parents were present. The youngster made no reply. "Well, why won't you tell me what you think of me?" "'Cause I don't want to get licked," was the answer.

THE Indianapolis Age thus rebukes another Indianapolis paper: "The Sun of this city is clamorous against the payment of the late murdered president's doctors such enormous fees. The Sun ought to behave itself and keep quiet. The pay is out of all reason, but that is made necessary by the practice, which was in the same category.

WE learn from the Missouri Liberal that the plan for an orphan home is no longer merely a plan, but, according to that paper, a fixed fact. A. Minski, of Superior, Neb., gave $1,000 in cash, and G. H. Walser a like amount in lands and cash. The home will soon be incorporated and proper officers selected to receive subscriptions, which should be generously given.

IF through spels thru, why don't trough spel tru, and blough, blu, and crough, cru, and nough, nu, and tough, tu. If it takes phthisis to spel tisis, and sigh to spel si, why don't phthipsigh spel tipsy, and phthish-shough, tissu, and if a Chinaman can pronounce the bunches of scrawls on a tea-chest, why is not the same kind of writing goughd eenoughphffe phfforr usse?—Rescue.

COL. JOHN R. KELSO, who was for many years an eloquent Methodist minister and also a member of congress from Ohio, has settled at Modesto, Cal. He is now advocating the cause of Liberalism, and by his eloquence, experience, and deep learning makes his power felt. We are indebted to the gentleman for appreciated editorial favors. We cordially go half way to shake the hand of every liberal-minded person, regardless of sect or creed.—Jewish Times.

MRS. JACOB MEYERS was a religious convert at Mount Vernon, Ohio, through the evangelism of a Mrs. Roberson, who urged upon her the duty of also becoming a revivalist. Mrs. Myers obeyed, but the rebuffs which she received excited her greatly, as she was naturally very modest and retiring, and her mind gave way. She informed her husband one day that she would kill him if he didn't instantly repent; and a few hours later she attempted suicide.

ONE of her Britannic majesty's Indian subjects has written a poem upon the recent attempt upon her life, in which the following lines occur:

A vile wretch, impelled by viler passion,
Had aimed exact a fiery ball at her;
Her royal breast did suddenly heave and hop;
The luster of her face was lost, and it turned pale.
Cursed be he who did such wickedness practice
To peril the life of a female old, a queen!

IN reply to the inquiry, "Does not a belief, even if silly, in an all-seeing eye hav an influence on manhood?" the Popular Science Monthly replies: "Scarcely, when that all-seeing eye has a plan by which the vilest sinner may escape the consequences of his acts, while his victim is damned. Stupendous and immortal penalties hav been threatened against wrong action, but then the evasion of these penalties is always conveniently provided for. Is not this easy system of morals, which arranges for the defeat of justice, more open to the charge of laxity than the Atheist's scientific system, in which the penalties are both proportioned to transgressions, and follow them with a salutary certainty?"

THE women who work in the collieries of England wear loose trousers, and are naked above the waist; around the waist is a leathern belt, to which a large chain is attached. This chain is dragged between their knees, and pulls loads of coal through long, low, damp, dark passages, the women compelled to go on all fours, like brutes. In this way they haul loads of six thousand yards a day. The "gentlemen" owners of these collieries compel this work, yet talk of the "delicacy of the sex being destroyed by the ballot!"—Argonaut.

THE priests in a certain village in Japan hav drawn up a document opposing Christianity, which is signed by all the inhabitants, and deposited it with the local magistrate. One clause reads as follows: "Therefore we agree that if any nativ of this village becomes a Christian, we will cease to hav any intercourse with him, and if any person dwelling here, not being a nativ, embraces this foreign creed, we will send him back to his birthplace." It would seem from this that the Japanese do not hav a very high opinion of Christians and Christianity.

THEY hav nailed him at last. A Brooklyn clergyman named Stalesermon, after the manner of his brethren at this time of year, announced that he had received "a call" from an out-of-town church, and that he had accepted it. Instead of petitioning him to recall his resignation, the congregation accepted it, and presented him with a sheet of foolscap, telling him how much they loved him, and hoping that he would be happy with his new charge. Then he wanted to back water, and said that if he hadn't gone to the expense of purchasing a ticket he would remain. Nobody would chip in to compensate him for his outlay, and there is no alternativ but to dust. In the future clergyman will no doubt hesitate, and not giv warning until they hav corralled a sufficient number of trustees to insure a vote in their favor.

ARISTOCRACY in England is coming in every direction to grief. In addition to Lord Huntley, we hav another Scotch lord of ancient lineage, Lord Ruthven, in the bankruptcy court, who finds matters even harder to arrange. The heir of a baronet is found apprentice to a pawnbroker. The Countess of Mornington has applied for parochial relief. Two noble brothers are in the coal trade. The great flower shop in Regent street is kept by an aristocratic major, who is not ashamed of his calling. At Ealing they will ask you if you will hav a cup of milk from "the viscount's dairy," and at Uxbridge there is the nursery ground where a few months ago you might hav beheld a Scotch earl and his wife and children weeding and watering the vegetables for the London market. The earl is dead, and his widow has been pensioned by the purchaser of the ground.

THE Rev. Dr. J. M. Pullman, the noted Universalist preacher, once had an amusing tilt with Dr. Talmage in the religious papers. Talmage wrote: "Mr. Pullman, the Universalist minister, rivaling his brother of sleeping-car celebrity, proposes to take us all to heaven in a spiritual 'Pullman palace car.' We can take off our boots and hats, and lie down on our backs, and wake up in glory. John Bunyan's pilgrim went tugging along on foot, and Paul had many an anxious day of hard walking, and all the old-time righteous felt themselvs 'scarcely saved,' but (three cheers for the modern invention!) we can all now go in 'Pullman's spiritual sleeper,' the Universalist ministers acting as brakemen and conductors." In reply, Mr. Pullman wrote: "If Mr. Talmage would only adopt this idea in his earthly travels (that of making Jordan a hard road to travel) you would always know in what part of a railway train to find him. 'Is Talmage aboard?' you ask the conductor. 'Yes.' 'Where—in the Pullman car?' 'Oh, no.' 'In the smoking-car?' 'No—ask the fireman.' The fireman pulls open the furnace door, and there—in the fire-box—sits Brother Talmage, singed but serious, bound to get to his destination as 'scarcely' as possible; and composing meanwhile an article for the Christian at Work against 'spiritual sleepers,' and in favor of salvation by squirming."

WE learn from the Record of New London, Mo., that there is music in the air at the colored Baptist church of that place. The trouble grows out of a demand on the part of the preacher and his wife that the congregation build him a residence on the church lot. A portion of the congregation oppose this scheme, alleging that the church is in debt now, and is unfinished. Various meetings hav been held, and the matter discussed in all its bearings. The preacher has been endeavoring to hav some of the deacons removed from their offices because they oppose the building of the house, but in this he has not yet succeeded. At one of the meetings held to consider the matter, the excitement became very intense, so much so that the preacher's wife shook her fist under the nose of Deacon Givens and told him "she could whip him the best day the sun ever shined on him, if he would go out and fight her." Deacon Givens bore it very meekly; his only reply being, "Brethring, do you see dis?" At another meeting held on a recent Thursday night, another wrangle ensued. Deacon Givens accused the preacher's wife of having written letters to one of the young men of the church, asking him to run off with her. The deacon also accused the preacher with having stolen a dog at Palmyra, and went on to tell how much the dog theft had cost the preacher. The fun grew fast and furious; the female members of the church made speeches, and everybody was excited. The atmosphere became redolent with perfumes suggestiv of "William goat and bar," and blood was on the moon. The matter has not been settled as yet, but Deacon Givens and party still hold the fort.

THE following is a graphic account from an eye-witness and participant in a squabble to obtain possession of a little church near Freeport, Mich. It will be seen that the outsiders were very anxious to worship, and the insiders equally anxious they shouldn't. Hereafter we shall hav to include wolves, bears, and skunks among the weapons of theology. The account is from the Hastings Home Journal: "We (our church) were holding meetings at the wolf church every alternate Sabbath, and they (the other church) didn't like it and locked us out, and we broke in at a window and worshiped. Then they was mad, but we kept on worshiping until they took out the pulpit, seats, windows, and doors, and nailed up the church with boards and nails, and made a high rail fence around it. Then we appointed a meeting to go in and worship, and went. But they had got there first, and shut four wolves, one bear, and a lot of skunks in the church to defend it. We had hammers and cold chisels with us. Bro. S. led the assault, and we all got inside the fence. Brother Polley made a flank movement and tore the boards from a window, but fell back with some pounded knuckles. Meanwhile the skunks inside had climbed up into the steeple and succeeded in outraging Elder Cairns and Brother Polly's son-in-law, and sacrilegiously called it baptism. We then fell back. Brother M. (of their church) was very abusiv. Elder B. called him an old skunk, and Brother M. called Brother B. a liar. Bro. C. called Brother M. a liar. Elder Cairns asked Brother M. to pray. Brother M. said, You old hypocrit, I won't pray with you. Brother S. said if he was inside there would be a blood atonement in there. Brother Jenney would like to go in, but a bloody fight would disgrace him. They fought us from ports in the windows and doors, and from the lattice-work in the steeple, and we had to withdraw, but we intend to try again."

News of the Week.

A VERY destructiv flood prevails in Arkansas.

THERE are four Universalist societies in New York city.

DAZA, ex-president of Bolivia, is charged with carrying off $493,408 in public funds.

A REWARD of $3,000 is offered for the capture of S. J. Nevin, absconding mayor of Adrian, Mich.

W. H. ROSENTRAUCH is on trial in Newark, N. J., for making remarks reflecting on the chastity of the Virgin Mary.

THREE white men and two negroes were publicly whipped, for various crimes, at the jail in New Castle, Delaware, last Saturday.

SENATOR SHERMAN has received a note from Mrs. Garfield, thanking the national legislature for the pension which they hav settled upon her for her husband's sake.

THE steamship Pliny went ashore on the coast of New Jersey during a recent storm. The passengers were saved by the life-line, but the vessel and most of the cargo are a total loss.

GUITEAU'S counsel has been heard on the bill of exceptions, and it is thought that the decision of the court will be unfavorable to Guiteau, in which case he will be hanged on June 30th.

THE hall of the Hygienic Exhibition, at Berlin, was destroyed by fire on the 12th, together with many costly exhibits. The loss is estimated at several hundred thousand pounds.

SULLIVAN, the champion pugilist, got into a row in Boston recently, and was knocked down and jumped on by a diminutiv barber, concerning whose wife Sullivan had made uncomplimentary remarks.

OSCAR WILDE, the young Irishman who has been lecturing in this country on the gospel of art called estheticism, has emitted his final squeak on this side of the Atlantic, and goes back to Europe in a short time.

AN indignation meeting was held at Tombstone, Ariz., last week to denounce the action of the President in regard to the cowboys of that section. Report says that the meeting was a failure so far as an expression of sympathy for the cowboys is concerned.

THE Senate select committee on woman suffrage agreed last Saturday to recommend to the Senate for adoption a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, declaring that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of sex."

No material advance has been made toward the discovery of the murderers of Lord Cavendish and Under-Secretary Burke, of Ireland. Land Leaguers denounce the assassination, and declare it to be the work of the enemies of Ireland. Still more restrictiv measures hav been adopted toward the country by the English government.

THE trial of the Malley cousins, at New Haven, Conn., for the murder of Jennie Cramer, is in progress. The evidence goes to show that James Malley was the last person in whose company Miss Cramer was seen, and that he was with her three hours before her body was found. Arsenic, in sufficient quantities to cause death, was found in the dead girl's stomach.

AN excursion train of the Missouri Press Association collided with an engin and caboose near Parsons, Kan., one day last week. None of the seven hundred editors, or their wives and daughters, was hurt. Judging from the precedents of Ashtabula and Spuytenduyvil, the absence of priests, ministers, and hymnologists is rather an advantage than otherwise at such a time.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Bombay and Its Surroundings.—Concluded.

PARSEE WEDDINGS.

It has been my good fortune to attend two Parsee weddings in one evening here in Bombay; the first by the kind invitation of Mr. K. M. Shroff, his sister-in-law being the bride; the second by invitation of Mr. Bujjebee (I think that is his name). Madam Blavatsky, Col. Olcott, Mr. Bridges, and some others were also invited. The first wedding was set for 5:30 P.M. The wedding did not take place at the home of the bride, but in a public house, kept in part for the purpose and in which many couples have been joined in wedlock. The house stands upon a street or place off from a main street, and as we approached it by carriage, we found the entire place lined with men dressed in white robes, with a band of music, and a profusion of paper lanterns. The illuminations, the music, and the white robes imparted a very pleasing effect. Upon entering the main room, upon the walls of which were hung many framed engravings and pictures, embellished also with festoons of flowers, etc., we were graciously received by the mother of the bride, and soon introduced to the bride and her sister, Mrs. Shroff, both very pleasant ladies. While waiting for the arrival of the bridegroom I had ample opportunity for inspecting the style of the apparel worn by the thirty or forty ladies present, which I will endeavor to describe to you. Not making close inspection I may not be correct in all particulars, but think I am mainly. Let me then give the opinion that Parsee women do not wear the garment known to Europeans and Americans as the chemise, but do wear drawers of silk or other light and fine material. The upper part of the body is covered by a kind of jacket or sacque of similar substance, which sits loosely and is not fastened in front. The main dress consists of a piece of goods a yard in width and eight yards in length, of rich silk, on the edges of which is a border of gold thread two inches in width. The piece is brought over around the waist and fastened, perhaps with a pin, thus forming what may be called the skirt, and the residue is brought up over the shoulders, coming down in front in a most easy and graceful manner, and looking very neat and comfortable. There are no petticoats, no corsets, nothing dragging down upon the hips, nothing to prevent free and natural breathing. It will be remembered that the weather is so mild here as to scarcely ever necessitate clothing for the purpose of giving warmth. If chilly mornings take place, a blanket or shawl is always sufficient. White stockings, light, rich, variegated slippers, and a white cap resting on the back part of the head, complete the dress. These silken robes, if robes they may be called, with their rich borders, are certainly ornamental, and while decidedly oriental, they seem very modest and appropriate. Bonnets or hats are not worn, a light shawl, scarf, or head-cloth being quite as good as the silly affair, called a hat, sitting on the back part of the head, as worn by the European and American ladies.

The bridegroom was a heavy, sedate-looking man, who seemed not at all excited at the event which was about to take place. According to Parsee custom, he came from his own home in a small procession, and was met at the door of the wedding room by the mother of the bride, who broke a cocoanut as a token of friendship, when a few other ceremonies were performed which I could not quite see. The bride and bridegroom were seated side by side in the middle of the floor, and the presents from the bridegroom to the bride were then brought by a waiter and placed on the floor before her for a few minutes; these consisted of bracelets, I think, handkerchiefs, a scarf, and other articles of ornament and comfort. In the next place the mother of the bride brought a vessel of water and washed and wiped the feet of the pair to be married. This is a token of affection and the harmony that must hereafter exist between the parties to the ceremony. Now two priests dressed in white robes and white turbans came forward and commenced their part of the ceremony, in the forepart of which they hung or held a sheet of cloth between the bride and bridegroom so they could not see each other, and wound a silken thread around them, not tightly, passing thirteen times around the bride and bridegroom as they sat in their chairs. Then while the bride and groom joined hands, a priest stood before each and repeated in the Zend language the marriage ceremony, the chief priest repeating the first installment and his assistant the second, and while they were repeating they kept constantly throwing a few grains of rice on the heads and faces of the bride and groom, a pan of rice being held by attendants for each priest, from which they repeatedly took fresh handfuls. This ceremony lasted nearly half an hour, during which at least two quarts of rice must have been gently thrown upon the bride and groom, giving them, to say the least, a pretty good pelting, besides compelling them to listen to a recital of which they could not understand a word, for the Zend language is now spoken only by the priests, and very few of them understand it. This completed the ceremony; and when the thread of union was taken off they were man and wife.

By permission, I copied from a Parsee book, both in Zend and English, the following, which is presumed to be a translation of the words repeated:

PARSEE MARRIAGE CEREMONY.

Benediction Pronounced on the Bridal Pair.

1. May the Ormuzd (the Almighty God) bless you with sons, and a numerous progeny to your sons. May he bless you with wealth, good friendship, strength in body, and a long life of one hundred and fifty years.

Query to the Guardian of the Bridegroom.

2. That the Zoroastrian community of this place has assembled itself to witness the solemnization, in conformity with the laws of the Mazdiashnyan religion, of the marriage of the bride with the son of your family at this hour of the —— day of the —— month in the year of 1250 of Ezdezord Shuhriar, the last of the Sassanian dynasty of Iran (Persia); and in the presence of these people assembled, have you, the guardian of the bridegroom, with honest heart, sanctioned the consummation of this marriage contract, with a present to the bride of 2,000 Nishapuri dirams of pure and unalloyed silver, and two gold dinars (mohors)?

Query to the Guardian of the Maiden.

3. Have you (with mutual agreement entered into) completed all the arrangements in connection with the marrying of the maiden of your family with the son of —— —— in order to promote the beneficent objects of the union, with a true heart, honest conscience, and sincere intention?

Answer: Yes, I have.

Query to the Marrying Couple.

4. Do you both consent to conform yourselves honestly to the terms of this marriage contract through your life?

Answer: We do.

(The foregoing questions are thrice repeated.)

EXHORTATIONS.

5. In the name of God Ormuzd, may you both enjoy a happy life; be ever famous; attempt to do good works; be victorious; learn purity; be worthy of good praise. May you both learn to adhere to truth, and be always pure in your thoughts, as well as actions (and always try to please the Almighty, who is the lover of truth and righteousness). May all wicked thoughts be banished; all wicked words be despised; all wicked works be burnt up. Praise truth and purity; shun deceit and sorcery; praise the Mazdiashnyan religion. Accomplish work after full consideration; gain wealth by honest means; tell the truth to the rulers, and be obedient to them; use sweet and modest words with your friends; do not slander any one; do not be angry; commit no sin to please (any one); be not covetous; torment not any one. Be not envious unlawfully; be not haughty. Be remote from bad intention; treat no one dispitefully; rob not the property of others; abstain thyself from wives of others; do good works with good activity; impart benefit to the honest and faithful. Enter into no strife with a revengeful man; be not partner to a covetous one; be not companion to a culminator; enter not into company with one of ill-fame; enter not into work with an unskillful one. Combat the adversaries with right; go with friends as are agreeable with friends; enter into no strife with those of evil repute; before an assembly speak only pure words; before a king with consideration. From ancestors inherit (good) names; in nowise displease your mother. Keep your own mind pure and just.

6. Be of immortal body like Kai-Khoshere. Be understanding like Kaush. Be shining as the sun. Be pure as the moon. Be renowned as Zarathousht. Be powerful as Rustorn. Be fruitful as earth. Keep good friendship with friends, brothers, wife, and children, as body and soul (hold together). Keep always the right faith, and good character. Recognize Ormuzd as Lord, and Zarathousht as ruler. Exterminate Ahriman and the devs.

BENEDICTIONS.

7. May the god Ormuzd bestow gifts on you, Bahimon, thinking with the soul; Ardibihist, good speech; Shedrivar, good working; Safundarmad (give you) perfect thoughts (good faith); Khurdad, sweetness (contentment); Amerdad, fruitfulness.

8. May god Ormuzd bestow gifts on you; Adar promote your brightness; Ardri-sara, purity; Khurshed (the sun), exalted rule; Mohor (the moon), increase seed of the Goshpund and fortunate of earning; Toi, liberality; Gosh, good abstemiousness.

9. May god Ormuzd give you gifts; Maher, equitable justice; Sarash, guardianship; Rashne, right conduct; Fawardin, increase of strength; Banheram is the bestower of victory; Ram, perpetual delight; Govad bestows great might.

10. May god Ormuzd bestow gifts on you; Deen, enlightment of wisdom; Arsharwary, gain wealth of majesty; Ashted, increase science and art; Asaman, increase industry (cultivation); Zamiyad, firmness of place (seriousness); Marafund, good head; Aneran, delight of body.

11. Good are you. May good come to you. May you rise to the dignity as a zoatee of Meaz of Izshni-ghah. May you receive the reward which is earned by the zoatee, as one who thinks, speaks, and does much good. May that come to you which is worse than the evil.

12. May good come to you from doing kind actions. May your descendants become worthy of praise. May you attain to the highest degree of purity. May that come not come to you which is worse than the evil; so may it happen as I pray.

The God bless you with long life.

Keep justice always right;
Gain wealth, health, and victory;
Never tell a false story;
In love and peace, and without quarrel,
You both remain until the end of this world.
Mobed Aspundiarjee Burjorjee Punthakee.

After the ceremony was over a rich wreath of flowers was placed around my neck and the necks of the other guests, coming down to the waist; rich bouquets were placed in our hands, and we were invited into an adjoining room to partake of refreshments. The repast consisted of several articles of pastry and sweetmeats new to me, but which were very nice. The whole was indeed a most pleasant affair, and it was with sincerity that we wished the newly-married couple much happiness and a long life.

I learned from Mr. Shroff that some change has taken place among the Parsees in the matter of courtship; formerly the engagements were made entirely by the parents, and the bride and groom had but little to say about it; but latterly the European system has gradually come into use, and the young couple are allowed to keep company and "court" much as with us. It would be well if the Hindoos would make the same change and discontinue the absurd practice of betrothing girls when little childen, and even before they are born.

The Parsee women look bright, happy, and intelligent, and they are not subjected to the same cruel exactions as are the Hindoo women; but as a rule they are not educated, save in household and home duties. Female education is not much in vogue, though more so than formerly. With their readiness to espouse European customs, it is to be hoped they will soon give females the same opportunities for education as males. I understand the Parsee women to be unusually virtuous, few or none of them resorting to a life of prostitution.

When we reached the place for the second wedding, the ceremony was well over, but we were in time for more bouquets and more rich suppers, of which we partook with all the appetite we could command, wishing the married pair in this case also all the happiness they could reasonably expect. I learned that some fifty weddings took place among the Parsees of the city on this same evening, now being regarded a favorable time for tying the nuptial knot. The Parsees, like the Hindoos, are strong believers in astrology, and the priests consult the stars to ascertain when it is a favorable time for the young people to join their fortunes for life, and when the right time comes they seem to improve it with alacrity. It is a regular harvest time with the priests, as for the ceremony, dice-throwing, etc., they get forty rupees, a rupee being equal to fifty cents. When the evening had become considerably advanced we returned, knowing considerably more about Parsee weddings than before.

PARSEE FUNERALS AND DISPOSITION OF THE DEAD.

I have witnessed two Parsee funeral processions. No coffins are used; the corpse is placed upon an iron frame, covered with a shroud, and carried by a set of men detailed for that special service, and never by any others. About fifty or a hundred feet behind the corpse-bearers follows the procession. First, the priests with white turbans and white robes, and then some fifty mourners and attendants, all dressed in white, and each couple holding between them a white cloth, six feet in length, and doubled together. The meaning of the white cloth I did not learn, and was told that it is an old custom of the people, the purport of which is lost.

THE TOWERS OF SILENCE.

The mode of disposing of the dead among the Parsees is unlike that of any other people in the world; they neither bury nor burn, but expose the bodies to the action of vultures, which eat all the fleshy parts of the body in less than an hour. I visited the grounds on Malabar Hill, owned by the Parsees, in which are located some half a dozen structures called "towers of silence." These are made of stone in a circular form, some seventy-five feet in diameter, and nearly the same in hight. The walls are of solid mason work, and plastered over and whitewashed, and having a single iron door. Within the wall are three circles, the outer one for males, the middle one for females, and the inner one for children. The mourners and friends do not go nearer the towers than one hundred feet, where they halt and attend to the ceremonies due the occasion. The bearers take the body within the tower, leaving it in the appropriate place, and in a denuded condition, closing the iron door when they come out, and the vultures, which are in waiting, immediately commence their part of the service, while the friends and mourners wait outside. In a time not exceeding sixty minutes the naked bones only are left. In the center of the structure is a pit into which the bones are duly deposited after a few days, and there they slowly decompose, the rain that falls within the tower running down the gentle incline, washing the bones, and then running through a subterranean passage to the sea. In time the bones are powdered and are washed into the ocean.

In this way the body is quickly disposed of, and there is no chance for poisoning the air, or springs, or wells with the poisonous gases arising from decaying bodies. It strikes one as a little repugnant to one's feelings to think that a dear child, sister, or mother is being torn and devoured by vultures, but it is not much worse than the slow decomposition and decay of the grave, with the deleterious gases which are generated. There is nothing pleasing in the reflection that a near friend is inclosed in a dark, silent grave, and that ultimately earth worms must prey upon his body, and that that form once so loved must become a disgusting mass of putrefaction, only sending forth the most deadly and polluted gases. Prof. Huxley not long ago had in the Nineteenth Century an article showing how earth worms arise from graves and pollute the grass and other vegetation in the immediate vicinity which cows and other animals eat, poisoning the milk and flesh which are eaten by human beings, and causing the most fearful forms of death. The gases, also, which arise from burying-grounds is fearful to contemplate, and doubtless by inhalation and the poisoning of the water in the earth engender most fatal diseases. The vultures prevent all this; in a few hours the body is eaten and digested, and placed beyond the possibility of decomposition and decay. It is a question which is the better mode of disposing of the dead—the vultures of the Parsees, or the burning of the Hindoos. I visited the grounds of the latter; the body is simply burnt on a pile of wood sufficient for the purpose, and the ashes are sent to and deposited in the Ganges. The poor are burnt with common wood, while the rich are burnt with the odorous sandalwood. I think my preference would be in favor of burning, though the results attained are about equal. The vultures were imported from Persia for the express purpose of taking care of the dead, and some three or four dozen are constantly in attendance. They are a huge, ill-looking bird, and they are sitting on the tops of the towers and on the neighboring trees, waiting for a customer. It is said a sentinel or two is kept on the look-out for funeral processions, and a long time before the procession arrives they well understand that a feast for them is coming, at the prospect of which they are placed in a joyous mood.

The grounds contain some twenty-five acres, and beside the towers there are beautiful gardens of flowers, places for meditation, a house for rest and prayer, etc. They are kept very neatly, and one would hardly think it a place for the deposit of the dead; but the grim-looking towers and the voracious looking vultures, watching for another meal, inevitably bring an unpleasant chill over the feelings of the visitor, probably because he is unused to that sort of thing. With the Parsees it is a matter of course with them to be eaten at last by the vultures, and they have no more dread of it than we have of being buried, decaying, and being eaten by earth worms.

The city authorities have raised several remonstrances against the Parsee manner of disposing of the dead, and have endeavored to get their grounds containing the towers of silence away from them, as the same are very desirable grounds, and are a portion of the pleasant suburbs of the city in which are beautiful residences and attractive grounds; but the place is sacred to these people, the object is perfectly legitimate, and their process of disposing of the dead is far more sanitary and healthful than the Christian mode of interment. They will undoubtedly be allowed to retain peaceful possession of their portion of Malabar Hill, and they, their children, and their children's children will continue to be eaten by vultures.

RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT PERSIANS.

It may not be amiss in this connection to take a brief view of the religious beliefs of the people of which the Parsees are the remnant and descendants. Zoroaster, which is the Greek form of the real name Zedthurst, or Zarathusta, was the founder of this religion, and he lived a long time ago.

The oriental scholar, M. Haug, holds that Zoroaster lived 2,300 years before the time of Christ, which would take him back nearly three hundred years before the time of Abraham, and about the time of Noah and his big freshet; while Aristotle, one of the greatest minds which the world has produced, and a man of great learning and much information, wrote 300 B.C. that Zoroaster lived six thousand years before the death of Plato, who died 350 B.C., thus placing the great Persian reformer and teacher more than two thousand years before the time of Adam. That men lived on the earth tens of thousands of years before the time allotted to Adam is now well understood and freely conceded by the learned. Whether such a man as Adam ever had an existence is a matter of very great doubt, but that there was in ancient Persia such a religious teacher as Zoroaster, and that there might have been two by that name is a matter of the highest probability. It must be admitted that the great Grecian scientist and philosopher is far more reliable authority than the unknown copyist of the Chaldean fable 500 B.C., about the creation of the world, and the first man and woman, Adam and Eve, together with the absurd story about the flood; for it is very certain that Moses never wrote them, and had he done so they would have been of less value than the statements of such a man as Aristotle.

It may also be stated that Xanthos of Lydia, who lived more than a century before the time of Aristotle, and who was a contemporary of Darius and Xerxes, reckoned that Zoroaster lived still a hundred and fifty years earlier than the time fixed upon by Aristotle. Again, Hermippus of Smyrna, an ancient authority on the magian religion, and highly esteemed by the Greeks and Romans, stated upon the authority of Agonakes, a magian priest, that Zoroaster lived 5,000 years before the Trojan war, which occurred about 1180 B.C., still carrying the period of Zoroaster 6180 B.C. So we have the best ground for supposing that the Persian teacher lived long before the time of Moses, or Abraham, or Noah, or even of Adam.

That there was another Zoroaster who lived in the time of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, is generally conceded, but that the original Zoroaster lived 8,000 years ago may be taken as far more than probable. The name from whence Zoroaster was derived is said to have been as common in Persia as Jesus was in Syria, or as John and James are at the present day, so it is quitely likely that there might have been several distinguished persons who bore the name of Zoroaster.

It is believed that the great teacher bearing this name was born in Bactria, that he was an excellent man, passing through many hardships and temptations, and that he became one of the revered priests who attended upon the sacred fire. He was a man of great mind and deep religious feeling. He gave his life to the study of the infinite, and he conceived the existence of the great impersonal Ahura-Mazda, the source of all existence, the great spirit, the mighty one, of whom Ormuzd, the special god of the Persians, was the representative. Zoroaster also taught the existence of an evil principle, which he personified in Ahriman, who was the brother of Ormuzd, and that the conflicts between them for supremacy were great and constant. He also taught the existence of good and bad spirits, who were respectively engaged in the service of Ormuzd and Ahriman, and that the final result of the conflict of these opposing forces was to be the triumphant victory of the good over the evil, and the eternal happiness in the regions of bliss of those who took part with Ormuzd, and the endless unhappiness and punishment of those who were the followers of Ahriman. It is a question not easy to decide whether the Persians or Egyptians were the first to teach a future life, a heaven and hell, the happiness of the good and the unhappiness of the wicked in the future world, for both nations taught it and believed in it not less than a thousand years before the Jews denied that they ceased to exist when death visited them, and that they simply slept with their fathers. It was not till two thousand years after the time that Zoroaster and the priests of Egypt taught the doctrine of future rewards and punishments that Jesus was said to come forward and teach the same doctrine, though in a less clear, and more ambiguous and imperfect manner. It is positive that Christianity and Mohammedanism were the last great religions that recognized the doctrine of existence after death. The Jews certainly did not recognize this doctrine when the books of the Old Testament were written, which was at most but a few hundred years before the time of Jesus.

Mithra, a personification of the sun, was held to be the son of Ormuzd, and he was greatly adored by the ancient Persians. His birth was set on the 25th day of December, for on that day the sun begins to rise again in the heavens, every day growing stronger and shining longer, after his six months of declension, and gradually sinking into night or death. It was the custom of that people to gather upon the summits of mountains and do reverence to the great central orb of our system. On the 25th of December they held a great festival in honor of the sun, and assembled upon the mountain hights and made sacrifices, and performed other acts of devout worship, expressive of their great joy that the sun of righteousness, the son of the god Ormuzd, was born, and would again rule over the earth. There can be little doubt that this custom was the origin of the Christmas festival since held in various parts of the world, and it was because of this popular festival in the pagan world that the early fathers of the Christian denomination selected the 25th of December as the birthday of their son of God. There is not a word in either of the four canonical gospels that intimates that Jesus was born in December, while it is true that every month in the year has been claimed by various Christian authorities as being the time of his birth. The truth is, the year is not known in which he was born, much less the month or the day of the month. It is but stating a matter of fact, that it is not known that he was born at all, and the 25th of December was set as his birth because for many centuries it had been a noted and popular festival in the pagan world, because it was believed to be the period when the birth of their son of god took place. In many instances the early Christians exhibited the disposition to appropriate the popular features of the pagan religions. And I may state again here, what I have insisted upon many times before—and proved it as well—that there is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony which goes to make up Christianity that was not long before cherished and believed in in the pagan world, and I challenge the combined priests of Christianity, with all the learning and talent they possess, to show the untruthfulness of this statement.

Zoroaster wrote the Zend-Avesta, and there, before Jesus cast out a devil, or manufactured wine; before he uttered a word; before Daniel had a vision; be- Isaiah prophesied; before David sung a psalm, or seduced Bathsheba, and then murdered her husband; before Samson slew a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass, or dallied with Delilah; before Joshua killed his hundreds of thousands of Canaanites, in peaceful possession of their hill country of rocks and narrow valleys; before he stopped the sun and moon to enable him to put to death a few hundreds more of men who were fighting for their homes; before Balaam and his ass spoke; before Moses met Yahweh on Mount Sinai, when thunderings and lightnings took place to excite awe in the minds of the people; before the pair worked forty days and nights at engraving two tablets of stone, with ten commandments upon them, and which Moses easily carried in his arms; before Yahweh showed his back parts to Moses (which is supposed to have been an interesting view); long before Moses led the children of Israel, with the stolen jewelry and valuables of the Egyptians, across the wide and deep Red Sea; before Abraham set about putting his boy Isaac to death, to please his God; before he went down into Egypt and sold the charms of his old wife, nearly ninety years of age, for gold and silver, camels, asses, and sheep, which made him rich; before all these, Zoroaster penned the sublime Zend-Avesta, with those high morals and pure sentiments, of which the following may be taken as samples:

Blessed is he—blessed are all men—to whom the living, wise God, of his own command, should grant those two everlasting powers (immortality and purity). I believe thee, O God! to be the best thing of all; the source of light for the world. Every one shall choose thee as the source of light; thee, thee, holiest Mazda!

I ask thee—tell me it right—thou living God! Who was from the beginning the father of the pure world? Who has made a path for the sun and the stars? Who (but thou) makes the moon to increase and decrease? This I wish to know, except what I already know.

Who holds the earth and the skies above it? Who made the waters and the trees of the field? Who is in the winds and storms that they so quickly run? Who is the creator of the good-minded beings, thou wise? Who has made the kindly light and the darkness—the kindly sleep and the awaking?

Who has made the mornings, the noons and the nights; they who remind the wise of his duty?

Now, I shall proclaim to all who come to listen the praise of thee, the all-wise Lord, and the hymns of the good spirit.

Hear, O man, with your ears what is best; perceive with your mind what is pure, so that every one may for himself choose his tenets before the great doom. May the wise be on our side.

Those old spirits, who are twins, made known what is good and what is evil in thoughts, words, and deeds. Those who are good distinguish between the two, not those who are evil-doers.

When these two spirits came together they made first life and death, so that there should be at last the most wretched life for the bad, but for the good blessedness.

Of these two spirits the evil one chose the worst deeds; the kind spirit, he whose garment is the immovable sky, chose what is right; and they, also, who faithfully please Ahura-Mazda by good works.

Let us, then, be of those who further this world. O Ahura-Mazda! O bliss-conferring Asha (Truth)! let our mind be there where wisdom abides.

Then, indeed, there will be the fall of the pernicious Druj (Falsehood), but in the beautiful abode of Vohumano (the Good Spirit), of Mazda, and Asha, will be gathered forever those who dwell in good report.

O men, if you cling to these commandments which Mazda has given, which are a torment to the wicked and a blessing to the righteous, then there will be victory through them.

It will be seen that this great teacher had the most exalted adoration for the works and phases of nature, which are the grandest objects of true worship, and that his moral sentiments have hardly since been excelled by any later teacher.

The ancient Persians were a branch of the great Aryan family, and it is believed that a portion of this race settled in Iran, or Persia, about the same time that another portion penetrated to the valley of the Indus and the plains of the Ganges, while still later on other portions journeyed toward the west and settled the countries of Europe, founding the language and institutions of that continent; thus it will be seen that the valorous and the civilized and the intellectual Aryans became the parents of the greatest nations and the highest literature that have been known in the world.

It is perhaps hardly to be wondered at that a spirit of rivalry grew up between the branches of this great family which settled respectively in Persia and India, in matters of religion as well as in matters of national import, for in all ages of the world religious beliefs have been among the most fruitful sources of quarrels and contentions, of war and bloodshed. It is not strange, perhaps, that, in this growing animosity between two rival nations and religions, the gods of the Vedic hymns became the demons of the Zend-Avesta; and, vice versa, that the god of the Zend-Avesta became the demon of the Vedic system. In the Zend-Avesta Indra is an evil being, and in the Vedic belief Ahura is a demon. In fact, the gods and devils of all ages have been so nearly alike as to be hardly distinguishable—the devils doubtless being the earliest conceptions, and the first to be prayed and sacrificed to to placate them and secure their good will—while the devisers of the different gods from time immemorial have been the most bitter enimies; they could always quarrel and fight about their gods when there was nothing else on hand to fight about. But it is gratifying now to see the decendants of those ancient peoples living quietly and amicably together.

Zoroaster and his followers have never been idol or image worshipers, and through all these sixty centuries have been consistent worshipers of one divine principle whose highest representative and symbol is the sun. They formerly sacrificed animals to their god, but for ages this has been discontinued; they have also had but few temples, the boundless universe being their grand temple, where they most delighted to worship. It is pretty safe to decide that the religion of Zoroaster has been one of the most reasonable, one of the most moral, and one of the purest which the world has known during all these ages of religious struggle and research. Of course I reserve Buddhism for future discussion when I reach Ceylon, where it flourishes, and I must confess right here that I believe that system of religion the grandest, the greatest, the purest, the most peaceful, and the least aggressive of any of the great systems which man has engaged in. In these respects it is unquestionably far in advance of the bloody, cruel, and impure system called Christianity, as the world has known it.

It is not strange that the disciples of Zoroaster should have imputed to him the power of performing miracles, and even claimed that he was begotten by divine power, without the agency or contact of any man. That sort of claim has been made in nearly all ages of the world, and in connection with nearly all its greatest religious teachers. It was made with regard to Zoroaster, to Rama, to Christna, to Buddha, to Horus, to Plato, to Quirinus, to Apollonius, to Jesus, to Merlin of Wales, and to many others in the various ages of the world, and probably with just as much truth in one case as in another. Sensible people ought to be able to accord to those claims just the amount of credit due them and no more. They ought all be regarded as the silly demands of ignorant, superstitious, and partisan adherents of such religious teachers, and as more at home among the marvelous and the impossible than the real and actual domain of nature.

"Since death was the dark deed of Ahriman, the dead body has been looked upon with horror; and as the Parsees believed that the evil demons had secured it, it could not be permitted to pollute the pure elements, which Ormuzd had created—earth, fire, and water. So it was put on some exposed place, some 'Tower of Silence,' where birds of prey devoured the flesh, and the sunlight bleached the bones, which were afterward buried in the earth; and such is the practice to this day. But the Zoroastrians had a good hope that the demons had not touched the pure soul, which passed away beyond the eastern mountains to the sun-lit paradise of the holy, and there entered rest" (Prof. Clodd).

The history of Persia is replete with interest. It may be regarded as the first of the Aryan nations which rose to decided importance. Under Cyrus it became a mighty empire, its boundary stretching from the Indus to Asia Minor. It was during the reign of Cyrus that the Jews were released from their Babylonian captivity, and were allowed to return to their own country and city to reëstablish their religion and its national rites and ceremonies. It was after this period that the greater share of the books of the Old Testament were written. Darius and Xerxes followed, and their names and prowess are well known in history; but Alexander the Great proved temporarily too strong for the nation, and for a while the Macedonians held the country under subjection. Philosophically does Max Müller remark: "There were periods in the history of the world when the worship of Ormuzd threatened to rise thriumphant on the ruins of the temples of other gods. If the battles of Marathon and Salamis had been lost and Greece had succumbed to Persia, the state religion of the empire of Cyrus, which was the worship of Ormuzd, might have become the religion of the whole civilized world." In that case the world would undoubtedly have been saved the terrible infliction of the bloody and cruel Yahweh, who planned the death of his own carefully begotten son to make amends for his own blunders and deficient plans which had filled the earth with wretchedness and misery. Happy, indeed, would it have been for mankind could the simple, natural, and grand religion of Zoroaster have prevailed over the civilized world, in place of that of the monstrosity, Yahweh of the Jews, with that of his son. Better would it have been had a thousand Ormuzds reigned in the hearts of men than a single Yahweh; and as the nations of Europe deemed it incumbent upon them to import a god of eastern manufacture, it is ever to be regretted that they could not have selected Ormuzd, of Persia, or Osiris, of Egypt, instead of Yahweh of the Jews. Almost any god would have been better than that.

The creed of the Persians and of their descendants may be said to be of the simplest character. It is to fear God, to live a pure life, to perform good deeds, and to die in the hope of a future existence. Their kings flourished and were powerful for a long time, but ultimately the devotees of the youthful system of Mohammedanism overpowered them, driving a part into exile and subjecting those who remained to its own sway, and compelling them to accept and proclaim the teachings of the later prophet. Thus has one nation and one religion triumphed over another since the history of man has existed.

The Parsees, like the Hindoos, pay no attention to the Christian Sabbath, save so far as when in the employ of Europeans they are compelled to desist from labor on that day, but they in fact regard it as it is, no holier or better than either of the other six days intervening. They regard all the diurnal revolutions of the earth as equally holy, none having a precedence in this respect over the others. The Parsees have four days in the month set apart for prayer and religious observance, not that they believe those days any more sacred or holy than the other days, but as a religious observance. The various sects of the Hindoos have also three days of festivals, purification, and extra religious observances, but they pursue their occupations of all kinds on Sunday precisely the same as other days. The bazars are open, mechanics and farmers are at work, and the factories are running, and it cannot be perceived that they are in the slightest degree immoral on account of it.

THE BRAHMA-SAMAJ.

I will mention one or two of the many religious sects into which the Hindoos are divided. One is the above; it was founded by a learned Hindoo by the name of Rajah Rahmohun Roy, who was of the Brahman caste. His desire was to reform the abuses of idol-worship into which the people through many centuries had fallen, and to restore the original simple Vedic worship, doing away with all idols and with animal sacrifice. He believes there is but one God, and that polytheism is all wrong. He wrote and taught against idolatry, and instructed his disciples to pray to the one God and to worship no other. He also opposed the cruel custom of burning widows upon the funeral piles of their deceased husbands, as well as the betrothal of them while in a state of infancy and immature childhood. He made a journey to England, where he died in the city of Bristol in 1833.

Another of his countrymen, named Keshub Chunder Sen, espoused the reform movement, and though bitterly opposed by the regular orthodox Hindoo sects, the Brahma-Samaj believers, who were really Unitarians and unbelievers in the infallible inspiration of any writings, grew to considerable numbers, amounting to a few millions throughout India, and which still exist, though it is not claimed that they are increasing now. Their worship consists of prayer, hymns, and listening to religious instruction, and their places of worship are devoid of idols and images. They have some half a dozen organs or publications which advocate their views, and branch associations in England, Belgium, Holland, Italy, Spain, and the United States. It is said that O. B. Frothingham and W. B. Potter took considerable interest in the movement in our country. The following is given as an exposition of its creed:

God is spirit, not matter. He is perfect, infinite, and eternal. He is omnipresent, omnipotent, omniscient, all-merciful, all-blissful, and holy. He is our father.

The soul is immortal. Death is only the dissolution of the body; the soul lives everlastingly in God. There is no new birth after death; the life hereafter is only the continuation and development of the present life. Each soul departs from this world with its virtues and sins, and gradually advances in the path of eternal progress while realizing their effects.

Brahmoism is distinct from all other systems of religion; yet it is the essence of all. It is based in the constitution of man, and is therefore ancient, eternal, and universal. It is not sectarian, not confined to age or country.

All mankind are of one caste, and all are equally entitled to embrace the Brahmo religion. Every sinner must suffer the consequences of his own sins sooner or later, in this world or in the next; for the moral law is unchangeable, and God's justice irreversible.

It is the aim of the Brahmo religion to extinguish caste, hatred, and animosity, and bind all mankind into one fraternity, one brotherhood of souls.

It must be confessed that this is a pretty good creed, if a god is deemed necessary, and it indicates a man of broad and intelligent views capable of bringing it out.

THE ARYA SAMAJ.

This is a much later sect or system of religion. The founder, known as Dayanand Saraswati Swami, is still living and in the vigor of manhood. He makes his home, at least a part of the time, in Bombay; at all events, he is here at the present time. He is a profound scholar, a deep thinker, and an excellent orator. As nearly as I have learned, he advocates a return to the original doctrines of the Vedas, stripped of all the superstitions and errors which through the ages have been attached to it. He is a believer in nature, pure and simple, and discards all personal gods. He does not believe in supernaturalism of any kind, but accepts nature as being quite sufficient to cause every result that takes place. As a consequence he does away with many of the superstitions and excesses which have worked into the beliefs and worship of the people of the country. He is also a man of great purity of life, and has sacrificed much in consequence of his honest convictions, and has incurred much opposition from the orthodox element of the land. His career has been one of interest and evinces the trouble and unpopularity, even in this country, which a man brings upon his head who ventures to mark out a course for himself that deviates from the beaten path of custom and long received opinions.

He was born of a Brahma family of the Oudichya caste, in a town belonging to the rajah of Morwee, in the province of Kattiawan. At the age of five he began to study the Devngari characters, and his parents and the elders of his caste began to train him in the ways and beliefs which they themselves had been brought up in. He was required to commit to memory long series of hymns, mantras, stanzas, and commentaries. At the age of eight years he was invested with the sacred Brahmanical cord (triple thread) and taught the Gayatri Sandhya, with its practices and Yajur Veda Sanhita, preceded by the study of the Rudradhaya, a chapter about Rudra, one of the names of Siva. As his father belonged to the Siva sect it was the object to get him initiated into its religious mysteries, and thus he was early taught to worship the uncouth piece of clay representing Siva's emblem known as the Parthiwa lingam, in connection with which there is much fasting and various hardships. His mother thought the requirements too severe upon him, while his father insisted upon his submitting to all the severities. In the mean time he studied Sanskrit, and committed the Vedas by heart, besides accompanying his father to the shrines, temples, and places of the Siva-worship. At the age of fourteen, having completed his studies, his father required that he should pass through the painful ordeal of of practicing Parthiwa Puja, which includes fasting and watching without sleep in the worship of the lingam. But early he began to have doubts about the truthfulness of the claims of the religion which he was required to believe. Thoughts blended with doubts crowded through his young mind. He asked himself, Is it possible that this semblance of man, this idol of a personal god, that I see bestriding his bull before me, and who, according to my religious teachers, walks about, sleeps, eats, and drinks; who can hold a trident in his hand, beat upon his dumroo (drum), and pronounce curses upon men, is it possible that he can be the Mahadeva, the great deity; the same who invoked as the lord of Kailasa (a portion of the Himalaya Mountains where Siva's heaven is supposed to be), is this the supreme being and the divine hero of all the stories of him in the Puranas? In his doubts he appealed to his father for explanation as to how the lifeless stone image before him could be the great God which governed heaven and earth. The father endeavored to explain to his young mind how that the great Mohadeva being invisible, the image was designed to represent him, and that the great God was just as well pleased with the adoration and worship bestowed upon the symbol as though he was really present to receive it. But this was not satisfactory to the inquiring mind of the youth. He could not believe that an omnipotent living God would allow mice to run over his body and pollute it. He ceased to have faith in stone gods, and resolved to no longer worship them.

A loved sister of his, dying suddenly, the uncertainty of human life was forcibly impressed upon his mind, and that he might die in the best possible condition so as to enter into Muktee (the final bliss in a liberated soul, absorption into Brahma), he more than ever resolved to no longer worship idols or practice the mummeries of external mortification, penance, etc.

Not long after this his father decided that the young man should be betrothed at once, and be married as soon as he had reached the age of twenty; but his repugnance to the married state became so great that he resolved to evade it by all means in his power. When his father discovered this, the parent was only the more determined that his son should become a married man. To defer the marriage the young man proposed to go to Benares to prosecute his studies in the higher branches of learning. The father consented to this, but the mother then interposed and objected to his leaving home. A compromise was made by his employing a teacher some six miles away, to whom he went, and to whom he ultimately divulged his aversion to taking a wife, which his parents were resolved he should do. This information was very soon transmitted to his parents, and they decided that the son must be married at once. He was summoned home, and preparations were made for his nuptials; and now it was that, as a last extremity, he placed an eternal barrier between himself and matrimony. . . .

He resolved to leave his parents and home forever, and proceeded to carry out his resolution without delay. He accordingly left home secretly, and passed the first night in a village eight miles away; and rising three hours before the dawn, he walked thirty miles without stopping. He carefully avoided villages, public thoroughfares, and all who would be likely to recognize him. It was well that he did this, for he had been away but three days before he learned from a government officer that his father had sent out a large number of men to hunt for him. He hastened on, and met with a company of begging Brahmans, who kindly relieved him of what money he had, and induced him to part with his gold and silver ornaments, rings, bracelets, and other jewels, upon the plea that the more he gave in charity the greater his reward would be in the future life. He then made his way to a society of pious mendicants living in the town of Sayale, and they persuaded him to join their order, and to don their peculiar garb, of a reddish-yellow color. In this new apparel he proceeded on to a neighboring principality, where he met a person well acquainted with his family, and to whom he was induced to impart the information that he was on his way to join in the Mella of Kartik, a religious gathering of pilgrims which often numbered hundreds of thousands. He continued on and joined a company of ascetics, and abode with them some time, but the person to whom he had imparted his purposes proved treacherous and sent word to the youth's parents as to his whereabouts; and for this cause his father was induced to come where he was, with a company of sepoys, and in the greatest wrath appeared before his son. The parent reproached his offspring for bringing eternal reproach upon his honorable family. The young man deemed it the best course to appear to yield to the violence of his father, and at once fell at his feet and begged pardon. But notwithstanding this humility, the father reached forth his hand and tore the yellow garment from his son, converted it into shreds, snatched his tumba (a drinking gourd) from the son's hand, reproached him with being a matricide, and placed him in the rigid charge of the sepoys, commanding them to keep close watch over him day and night.

The determination of the young man, however, was as firm as that of the father; and at 8 o'clock that night, when the sepoys had fallen asleep, he crept out and made his escape, and took shelter in the branches and foliage of a large tree which shaded a pagoda, or pagan temple. In a short time the sepoys were upon his track and pursued him even to the tree; but his hiding-place secreted him so well that they abandoned the search in that quarter and sought him elsewhere. He, however, remained quietly a whole day; and when darkness again come, he made his way to Baroda, where he had prolonged conversations with several of the Bramacharis and Sanyasis upon the Vedanta philosophy, who convinced him to his entire satisfaction that Brahma, the great deity, was no other than his own self; that he was at least a portion of Brahma; Jiva (soul) and Brahma, the deity, being one. He adopted the view that he was a part of the great deity. He again joined a society of ascetics called Diksheets, on the the basiks of the sacred Nurbada, who were initiated Yogs, or a class of men who study and exercise the occult science. He was placed under the charge of a profound tutor, and studied Vedantsar, Arya Harimide Totak, Vedant, Paribhasha, and other philosophical treatises. He retained this connection and advanced to higher degrees in the sacred science of Yoga, and became what may be called a religious magician — one who can embrace the past and future in one present, a man who has reached the most perfect state of clairvoyance and has a thorough knowledge of the occult powers of nature, though quite distinct from miracles and supernaturalism. He had the ablest of teachers, and here he progressed in his studies, and became proficient in the Sanskrit grammar. He traveled from place to place and became acquainted with those far more advanced in occult knowledge than himself, and learned more and more of the exclusive and hidden knowledge embraced in this not well-understood science.

To follow him in all his travels, his self-denials and hardships, when footsore, weary, hungry, sometimes crossing rivers in the mountains, in very cold weather and when he nearly perished with the cold, and other times attacked by wild beasts, and all this in search of the hermits and weird teachers of Yoga who dwelt in the mountains, will require more space that it is worth while to occupy; besides, the data are not all at hand, as the publication of his adventures and experience is not yet completed. Suffice to say he spared no labor or hardship in search of the men with the greatest amount of the hidden knowledge he was in search of, and ultimately prepared himself to be the great teacher and philosopher which he is to-day. There are probably few more intelligent or able men in India. His style of teaching is most effective, and he is having listeners and followers in great numbers. Those who have embraced his views number nearly one hundred thousand, and he is still working energetically and still winning thinking people to his ranks. As before stated, he is at present in Bombay, and it was he who wrote the first note of challenge to the slanderer Joseph Cook, which I gave you in a former letter. He is assuredly no believer in the claims of Christianity, and is not disposed to tamely allow the calumnies of Cook to pass unnoticed. At the time appointed he delivered, in his native tongue, a rousing reply to Cook's misrepresentations. I was not in the city at the time, but I am told his speech was one of great ability. Long may he live to spread what he conceives to be the truth, and, so far as I can understand him, what I also conceive to be the the truth. This letter is long enough, and I will stop right here, and bid you good-bye for a day or two.

It is said that an edition of the New Testament was printed with Paul's advice given as "Bray without ceasing." This, at any rate, is evidently adopted as the correct version by most Christian ministers.

General History of India, in Brief.

Bombay, Jan. 26, 1882.

Dear Friends: Before entering farther into India, perhaps it will be well to take a slight glance at its general history; but be not frightened at this suggestion, for a history of this great country, extending from 8° to 35° north latitude, from 68° to 98° east longitude, containing 1,500,000 square miles, over 250,000,000 inhabitants, comprising some thirty distinct races of people, or natives, speaking as many different languages, if written in full, would require several volumes; but what I intend to say will be comprised in a few pages.

There is little doubt that India was one of the earliest peopled countries on the globe, though of its early history but little is known. It is not known at what period the Aryan race or races crossed the Indus, and settled the great plain of which this country is principally composed, nor is much known of the races of aborigines which they found here when they made their ingress. That they found uncivilized races here is very well understood, whose descendants, with more or less mixed blood, still occupy the broad lands. There can be little doubt that, in the prehistoric period of man's existence on the earth—before the wild nations had a literature, a written language, or a history—what was afterward called India was a densely peopled country. It is not to be supposed that the early races emerged at once into a state of comparative civilization. It must necessarily have taken long ages for man to have progressed from his original low estate, a slight remove above the brutes, to reach a position where he perfected a language, and began to keep a record of historical events.

It is to be regretted that the early inhabitants of India were more zealous in producing religious writings, or sacred scriptures, than in writing an accurate history of their age, and the national events which then transpired. Their Vedas are unquestionably the oldest records upon the earth, unless, indeed, the Chinese may have something which out-dates the ancient Hindoo or Aryan sacred hymns. The Chinese claim that they have records reaching back twelve millions of years, though that claim has to be taken with great allowance; but that they are also a very ancient people there is no room for doubt.

Like all ancient countries, the early history of India is so blended with mythologic fable that in our time it is hard to distinguish accurately the fable from fact—to tell that which was accomplished by men from that which was attributed to the gods and the very holy individuals which have at all times been believed in. Among the earliest traditions of the country is that ten Brahmadicks, or children of Brahma, were the first born of men. Their names were Marichi, Atri, Angrias, Pulastya, Critu, Daksha, Vasishta, Bhrigu, and Narada. From these the Menus are said to have sprung, which, according to some, numbered fourteen persons, and to but half that number, according to others. One of them, named Satyavrata, is claimed to have lived in time of a great flood, from which the Brahmadicas were saved by a huge vessel or ark. This legend is said to reach back to a period when the Chaldeans and the Jews say the flood of Noah took place, and it is quite probable that it was the original, from whence the later legends were taken.

It is held that a class of priests or holy men, called Rishis, sprang from the Brahmadicas, and these were they by whom the Vedas were written. It appears that Brahma became disappointed in his arrangements for peopling the earth, perhaps because the Richis did not increase and multiply so fast as he intended they should. He therefore gave two sons to Adima (original mother), the wife of Swayambhuva, from one of whom descended Aja, and from the other Prithu (after whom the world was called Prithibi), both being contemporaries of Satyavrata at the time of the flood. These three persons were saved from a watery grave, and when the waters had subsided, began to repeople the earth. The partiality of the Hindoos for trinities or triads is well known, and some authorities contend that the three persons were one and the same patriarch, from whom the people of India descended.

There are several legends about this long-ago flood, some of them asserting that there was a war between the crocodiles and elephants, that a churning of the ocean took place, that the moon was fished up from the bottom of the sea, and that the earth was itself lifted up on the tusk of a huge boar. These wild legends, of course, possess very little value, but probably are of about the same character as the other flood legends which other nations indulged in the pleasure of reciting. The claim that a great flood once took place, when the tops of the highest mountains were covered with water, which hid itself away from the sight of men, and which they have never since been able to find, is equally absurd and untrue wherever told.

But, the flood once over, the waters disappeared, and the earth soon began to be repeopled, and two lines of kings were established, to wit, of Satyavrata, the race of the sun, and that of Atri, the race of the moon. Some of both races must have survived the flood, if any flood really took took place. The names of the princes of these two lines are given, many in number, but there is evidently more of myth than real history blended with them. The solar line, it is said, counts fifty-seven princes from Ikspwaku to Rama; and Sagara is said to have had a hundred sons, all of whom were destroyed by flames exhaled in anger from the eyes of Kapila, the sage, but who were afterward restored to life by the advent of the Ganges, brought down from heaven by the prayers of Bhagirath. The Ramayana gives a different account, and probably equally truthful, that Rama married the daughter of Janaka, king of Mithila, also of the solar line; another branch had its headquarters at Benares; Rama, with an army, went to Ceylon and established a kingdom. In fact, the whole of India seems to have been made up of small nationalities, much as Greece was at a later period. Some authors name ten principal divisions, into which the country was divided, but they throw little light upon the early history of the country; suffice it to say there is no end to the legends and myths connected with the gods, kings, princes, and races of this land.

Among what are called the historic records of the early age is an account which says that, leaving out the traveling expedition of Osiris, king and god of Egypt, next came the invasion by Semiramis, the queen of Babylon, which is said to have been approved by Stabrobatis, who was at that time king of all India. He is claimed to be the same as Virasena, otherwise called Sthabarpati. Ctesias states that Semiramis was defeated by him, he assembling against her forces an army of four millions of men. A later expedition was conducted by Sesostris, of Egypt, who is said to have overrun the whole of India to the Ganges. A third invader was Shishak, otherwise called Bacchus, also king of Egypt, who, being very powerful at sea, advanced first to the mouth of the Indus and conquered all the country in the vicinity of that river; and then, doubling the point of the peninsula, advanced northward to the mouth of the Ganges, where he made other extensive conquests. He placed on the throne of India a king of his own choice, whose successors retained command till the invasion of India by Hercules, though the particular time when that was accomplished is by no means certain. Before the invasion of Shishak the people of India are said to have led a pastoral life, for which they were more noted than for regular agricultural pursuits or the use of arms; but all this is very foggy with the mists of antiquity.

Both previous to this time and after it the Scythians are said to have made serious incursions into the country. Wilford, in one of his essays in "Asiatic Researches," refers to an attack of this kind about 2000 B.C., when Rajah Bahu, the king, was defeated till his son Sagara came out with his agniastram (firearms) and repelled the barbarians. The Mogul chief, Oghuz Khan, whose era is placed at about 1800 B.C., is said to next have invaded India and occupied Cashmere, its northern province. He had three sons, Kiun, or sun; Ay, or the moon; and Juldus, or the star; and it is furthermore said that the empire of the Moguls in Tartary was shortly after this subverted by the Tartars, on which the descendants of the sun, moon, and star were obliged to disperse. But aside from all the mythical speculations it is very safe to conclude that for ages India was common fighting-ground for the fortune and booty hunters of many nations, and irruptions within her extensive borders were made again and again.

This much is certainly known, that the Tyrians carried on a very profitable trade with India by means of the Red Sea, and that later the Greeks, beginning with Alexander and ending with Antiochus, penetrated into India as far as the upper portion of the Ganges, taking possession of large tracts of country on each side of the Indus; that the dominion of the Greeks was succeeded by that of the Scythians, who also invaded Bactria, and that these in there turn were driven out by the Tartars. Next came the followers of Mohammed, under Mahmoud of Ghuzni, who about the year 1000 of our era carried into effect his father's project for the conquest of India, and after repeated expeditions established Moslem authority from west of the Ganges to Guzerat. From this event until the middle of the eighteenth century the power of these warlike invaders augmented until nearly the whole continent came under their yoke; the government of the various provinces being vested in the nawaubs, or nabobs, who exercised sovereign control, with a reservation of obedience or fealty to the supreme power of the great Mogul, who reigned in absolute despotism at Delhi. In all these conquests and despotism, however, no European power interfered. All that the nations of Europe had done up to this time with India was in commercial operations. The Egyptians and the Romans followed the Tyrians, sending their argosies down the Red Sea to the Malabar coast, and receiving in exchange for their commodities the rich stuffs, drugs, dyes, spices, gold, silver, ivory, and other valuables which were the staples of western India. The subjugation of Egypt by the Saracens threw the whole trade of the east into the hands of the latter, who made great efforts to extend it by carrying their enterprise beyond the extreme point of the peninsula of India to the islands of the eastern archipelago, thence to Siam, and ultimately to China. But the Saracens held no intercourse with Europe. Shutting the port of Alexandria against Christian nations, they preferred transmitting their return cargoes to Constantinople, through Asiatic Turkey and the Black Sea. The city of the sultan, consequently, soon became the great mart for East India and China produce, and this of course easily attracted the attention of Venetian and Italian traders and capitalists.

For a long time, however, the antipathy which the rival religionists, Christians and Moslems, bore each other formed a bar to commercial intercourse of any kind; but at length the cupidity of the caliphs overcame their religious hatred and a traffic commenced, which, while it gratified the anxiety of the Christian nations to possess the products and manufactures of the far East, conferred wealth on the believers in the prophet. In this state the trade with India continued until the Crusaders gave territorial possession and influence to the southern European powers, and converted the expeditions, which were originally of the "holy" character, into commercial and secular enterprises. Partly by means of conquest, and partly through negotiation, the whole of the East India trade at last passed from the Saracens into the hands of the Italians, and the port of Alexandria, until then closed by Moslem hatred, was reopened to the ships of the Mediterranean. Florence, Genoa, and Venice were the first to reap the fruits of the great monopoly; but the latter, by deputing an embassador to India to open a communication with ports until then unknown even by the name of Europeans, obtained exclusive supplies and benefits, which soon gave them an immense preponderance over their neighbors. To these great advantages were shortly to be added the diminution of the Genoese trade by the destruction of Constantinople, where they had established themselves to the entire exclusion of the Greeks. Thus, at the close of the fifteenth century, Venice supplied nearly all Europe with the products of the East, and soon raised herself, by her wealth, to an eminence that excited the jealousy and hatred of surrounding nations. Great efforts were made by several states—the Dutch, the Germans, and the Spaniards—to obtain a share in this great and lucrative commerce; but neither intrigue nor the most tempting offers made to the rulers of Egypt and Syria could shake the standing of the Venetian power. Events at length, however, occurred, perfectly independent of commercial rivalry, which struck at the root of the great monopoly, and diverted nearly the entire oriental commerce into new channels. Christopher Columbus had discovered the western continent, and the Portuguese had found a way to India round the Cape of Good Hope. The credit has been almost universally accorded to the Portuguese for the discovery of this passage to the East, while the truth is, according to Herodotus, that Necho II., one of the Pharaohs of Egypt, had more than two thousand years earlier made the same discovery; he caused a fleet to be fitted out, which, steering down the Red Sea, passed into the Southern Ocean, and, rounding the cape, came up the west coast of Africa, returning to Egypt through the straits of Gibraltar. Pliny also later states that Hanno, of Carthage, made a similar expedition, and wrote all the details of his voyage. It is accepted as a fact with both of these expeditions, because both brought back the report that the sun was rising on their right hand when they faced the north and as they sailed along the African continent. This could not have been the case had they not doubled the cape.

In 1497 the king of Portugal deputed Vasco de Gama to India to ascertain where the riches of Venice were derived, and to endeavor to open a trade with the same people by the route available to Portuguese ships. The mission was successful; the key to the vast wealth of India was obtained, and the then enterprising Portuguese lost no time in taking advantage of the discovery they had made. Fleet after fleet was fitted out. Every port in India was visited; possession of many places was taken by force, particularly on the Malabar coast, the islands lying between Madagascar and the Moluccas, and the island of Ormus in the Persian Gulf. A papal grant was obtained confirming the prior discovery of the Portuguese, and thereby checking for a time the rivalry of other Catholic nations. Prodigious efforts were made by the Venetians, supported by the Mameluke government of Egypt, and subsequently by the sultan of Constantinople, to counteract the advantages enjoyed by the Portuguese, but the efforts were of no effect. While on the one hand the Portuguese defended with great skill and bravery their acquisitions in the East, including the Gulf of Persia, from their enemies in the Red Sea, and the coasts, they on the other continued to pour into Europe the products of the oriental world in quantities and at a price against which the Venetians could not possibly contend, and from that time the commerce of Venice became almost as nothing. For more than a century this trade remained in the hands of the Portuguese. But ultimately the highroad which they had discovered to the great Eastern storehouse of wealth became equally open to other European nations, and the Portuguese in turn had to give place to the enterprise of superior nations. From this cause the maritime power of Holland greatly increased, and as her domestic cares diminished, her people found excellent reasons for turning their attention to the great productive East. The example of Holland did not long wait for a follower in England, who ever shows herself ready to enlist where a legitimate profit is to be made, and under the reign of Queen Elizabeth she took a recess from foreign quarrels and religious discords long enough to step in and share with Portugal and Holland in the profitable trade with India. From the hour of the arrival of these Protestant powers the Portuguese date the downfall of their influence in the East. Through the combined influence of religious hatred and the conscious possession of superior physical force, the English and Dutch were guilty of measures of oppression wherever they obtained a foothold, and in this way they raised up enemies among the natives of the same character, and from the same cause, as had existed toward the Portuguese. Contests soon arose between the competing contestants, and as a matter of course came the expulsion of the weaker; the Portuguese were compelled to abandon all their lucrative advantages in Asia, and the English from that time have been the proud victors.

In 1602 the English obtained a charter from their own sovereign permitting them to trade to the East Indies, and securing to them a monopoly of the advantages of such commerce, and they soon began to establish factories at different points on the coasts of India, under the protection and with the consent of the different potentates then ruling over these shores. On the Malabar and Coromandel coasts, as well as on the Hoogly River, they planted their feet, first as humble traders, and thus as the years have passed away they have become the heavy-handed lords of the entire country. Bombay had been acquired by the Portuguese, but was early ceded to the English, as a part of the dowry of the Infanta, who became the consul of Charles II., and very soon afterward the chartered merchants commenced a trade also with China, the tea of which country was fast acquiring a degree of popularity with the English people. The success of one company or one set of English merchants naturally suggested the formation of the second, and the British government, in its urgent need of money, likewise conferred a charter upon the new aspirant; but this course easily led to disputes and complications between the competitors for trade, and eventually to a union of the two companies in 1702 under the name of the East India Company.

The advantages derived by England and Holland in their oriental commerce naturally aroused the jealousy of France, and that government also formed an East India Company, and ships were sent out with permission to establish agencies in Pondicheny and Chandermagore. These three nations, with the Danes and the Spaniards who had also obtained small possessions, now constituted the European trading community in India, and through their enterprise and rivalry the whole of the Western world was supplied with everything which the rich soil of India and the ingenuity and industry of her inhabitants could produce. Some little molestation to their trade was occasionally caused by the somewhat barbarous and covetous of the rajahs and princes in whose domains they were operating, and to counteract these slight difficulties small bodies of soldiers were allowed by the home government to be stationed at these trading points to protect the factories in their commercial enterprises. But it was not till the year 1745 that the corner-stone was laid of these occurrences, which ultimately converted these humble traders by degrees into the almost unscrupulous and oppressive masters of the entire country.

In the year 1746 the Nabob of Arest having died, the succession of his son to the musnud was disputed by a cousin named Mirzafa Jung. This pretender, aware of his own want of strength, applied to the Dupleix, who commanded the French troops in India, for aid, which was promptly accorded, under the obvious hope and expectation of reaping certain advantages from the connection should the enterprise prove successful. The legitimate heir to the musnud, and the Nabob of the Carnatic, Anaverdy Khan, on the other hand, sought the support of Major Laurence, who was in command of the British soldiery at that locality, and that officer was nothing loth to interfere in favor of the legitimate claimant. Hence arose a collision, which, with but occasional intervals of peace, continued for a century afterward, until native power after native power has succumbed to British power and cunning, and what was thus gained by finesse and intrigue has been maintained by treaty and the strong arm of the British government. Every victory which was obtained from the French and Mohammedan sovereigns of course redounded to the benefit and wealth of the English, and inevitably brought an extension of British possessions and the strengthening of British power. The home government, to aid the merchants in their contests, sent out reinforcements of troops and ships. The French authorities in a similar manner recruited their eastern forces, and it was not till ten years had passed away that the French sustained a final defeat. This took place at Plassy in Bengal. Dupleix, the French commander, had acquired immense power through his espousal of Mirzafa Jung, and he now aimed at the establishment of his dominion over the entire country. But Clive, a young British captain who had succeeded Laurence in the command of the English forces, and took Arcot, the capital of the Carnatic, defended it afterward against an immense force, and established for himself a high military reputation, which he subsequently increased by a series of brilliant and successful operations. Large tracts of country in the south were ceded to the English. Clive was made governor of Fort St. Davids. But events called him to Calcutta. A frightful massacre of Englishmen, merchants, and factors had taken place in that town. Surajah Dowlah, the viceroy of Bengal, who hated the English, for which he doubtless had sufficient cause, and who probably coveted the wealth their industry and enterprise had accumulated, sought a quarrel with them, and, laying seige to their forts and factories, seized upon them and shut them up in a small apartment where one hundred and twenty-three out of one hundred and forty-six were suffocated. Such cruelty called aloud for vengeance. Clive headed a force against the Nabob; it was small but compact and disciplined, and pursuing the Nabob, gave him battle and defeated his army of 40,000 men on the plains of Plassy. From that date—1757—the establishment of the British empire in India really began.

But now permanent enemies had arisen while Clive and his successors labored in Bengal. The great chieftain, who divided the sovereignty of the Deccan, the Carnatic, in short, the whole peninsula of India not occupied by the British, beheld with dismay the growth of the new European power, and formed alliances for its destruction. Hyder Ali, a political adventurer and soldier of fortune, undertook the lead in this movement, and proved a formidable antagonist. He wrested from the English several of their possessions, wasted much of their territory by fire and sword, threatened Madras, and compelling a large British force to lay down its arms, massacred nearly every man. For thirteen years were the whole resources of the British applied to resist this warrior, who, aided by the French, between whom and the British a war had arisen in Europe, vigorously prosecuted his operations, now gaining certain advantages, and at other times suffering severe defeats.

Hyder Ali died in 1782, but his son, Tippoo Saib, continued to wage war with the British, who also found abundant employment in a contest which had arisen with the Mahrattas, another tribe of India, on whom, for certain considerations, it was deemed expedient to attempt to force a rajah whom they had expelled. It is hardly worth while to follow the course of history through the multitudinous wars which were dovetailed into each other from the time Lord Cornwallis, after his surrender to Washington at Yorktown, deprived, in 1792, Tippoo Saib of half his territory. Scarcely was the sword sheathed in one quarter before it was drawn from the scabbard to chastise a new enemy in another direction. Sir John Shore, who succeeded Lord Cornwallis as governor-general of India, was engaged in a war with the Rahillas. The Marquis Wellesley, in 1798, found Tippoo Saib actually employed in new intrigues against the British, while the confederated Mahratta chiefs directed their hostility to the British power in western and northern India. Aided by his brother, the Duke of Wellington, and General Lord Lake, the marquis applied his energies and the resources of his command to the destruction of these formidable opponents, and although their operations were guided and directed by able officers, engineers, and artillerists, he entirely destroyed the power of Tippoo, annexed his dominions to those of the East-India company, broke the Mahratta confederacy, and added 33,000 square miles to the British possessions. In accomplishing this work the British used great finesse, and took advantage of the spirit of antagonism which existed between the Indian races. By humoring this antagonism, increasing it when they could, setting one party against another, they succeeded in accomplishing much that they effected. And herein lies the great weakness of India; the country is made up of tribes of natives in contention with each other, and by working with one party apparently to injure another, the English have effected what they have, and herein is their great hope for the future. Were the people of India a homogeneous, united people, the English could not have subdued them in the way they did, nor could they hold them in subjection to-day in the manner they do.

The Marquis Wellesley was succeeded in his government by Sir George Barlow and Lord Minto, whose rule was more distinguished by domestic dissensions, intrigues, and the settlement of the provinces acquired, than by campaigns against external foes. The Marquis of Hastings assumed the reins of government in 1813, and during his administration deemed it necessary to take the field against the Pindarries, the kingdom of Nepaul, and a host of Mahratta chieftains, whose restless spirit, or perhaps whose love of country and liberty, induced them to violate the engagements they had been caused to enter into, and endeavor to reëstablish themselves in independent authority. After a long campaign, the Pindarries were exterminated, an advantageous peace was made with the Nepaulese, and many states hitherto independent were compelled to become tributary to the company. The effect of the policy of the Marquis of Hastings, though capable of great cruelty, was to spread peace and submission throughout India, and the attention of the home government was now turned to the means of consolidating the vast empire which had been won by the sword and by finesse. The army which had proved strong enough for conquest in detail, was not of sufficient extent to preserve the territory intact and suppress fresh attempts at insurrection. It was, therefore, largely augmented in 1824, and as the close of the war which had devastated Europe for a quarter of a century now placed many experienced soldiers at the command of the British government for employment in the colonies and elsewhere, advantage was taken of the circumstances to send troops to India under the command of some of those generals who had most distinguished themselves in the field against Napoleon and his generals. The results of this policy was soon manifest in the conversion of a partially irregular but brave and devoted force into a large, well-disciplined, and well-organized army, capable of holding comparison with the most effective troops on the continent of Europe.

Scarcely, however, had the country rested from the turbulence of war, and the troops been dispersed over the empire to occupy ports which best protected the people in their peaceful pursuits, and held in check the aggressive spirit of neighbors, when the trumpet again sounded the alarm. In 1820 an expedition was dispatched to the Persian Gulf, under Sir W. Keir Grant, to put down the pirates which infested its shores. In 1821 another force, under Sir Lionel Smith, proceeded thither to avenge the treachery under which a garrison belonging to the first had been put to the sword. In 1824 the Burmese had done that which made it seem expedient for the government of Lord Amherst to dispatch an armament against them, to punish the invasion of British territory, which produced a contest which continued for two years, terminating in the surrender by the Burmese of fifty thousand square miles of territory to the English, with the agreement to pay the sum of one hundred thousand rupees to meet the expenses of the campaign.

In 1826 Lord Combermere, then commander-in-chief in India, reduced the fortress of Bhurtpore, and took prisoner its principal officer, charged with "intrigue," it being feared his talents and machinations would unsettle the peace of the whole of Upper India. From this time and during the twelve subsequent years the operations of the military were confined to the somewhat petty warfare in the county of Coles, Bengal, in the rajahship of Coorg in Rajpootana, and the unsettled districts in the south of India; but in 1838 events took place which gave employment to nearly every soldier in the British service, and led to a campaign, the disasters of which exceeded anything previously experienced in the country. The designs of Russia upon the British possessions in India had for a long time been a subject of discussion and suspicion. Excepting, however, in the instances of her advances upon the Persian frontier, nothing had occurred to awaken particular alarm, or to render any measures beyond those of the commonest precautions at all necessary. But in 1837 it became apparent that the emissaries of Russia were at work in Afganistan to foment and keep alive disputes between the ameer ruling in Cabul and the government of the Punjaub, with which the English were on terms of amity, and there was good reason for the English to suppose that if they did not interfere to check the progress of the quarrel, the Afghans would approach near enough to India to precipitate a dangerous collision between the British and the power supposed to be instigating the aggression. Overtures of friendship were consequently made to the ameer of Cabul, Dort Mahomed; but failing of effect, it was resolved by the English to send an army to dethrone the ameer, and to place on the musnud in his place an exiled sovereign, Shah Soojah, who was well understood to be more favorable to English interests, and in his kingdom it was believed that the British would be permitted to retain a force that would at once protect Shah Soojah in his seat, oppose a barrier to Russian advances from the north, and promote English interests generally. Accordingly an army of 15,000 men, under Sir John Keane, was dispatched during the government of Lord Auckland, to place Shah Soojah upon the throne, and to enter into alliance or friendly arrangements with the people occupying the large tract of country lying between India and Afghanistan. Sir John Keane "went, saw, and conquered," and returned to England to enjoy, in a peerage and a pension, the reward of his easy victory.

Shah Soojah retained his throne for three years, with the continued help of British bayonets, but at the end of that time, the chieftians, whose power had terminated with his restoration, combined to dethrone him and expel his allies; a measure which they were enabled to effect, partly through a division of counsels in the British camp, and partly through the extreme severity of the season. The British troops were driven to capitulate, and while marching out of Afghanistan, in the depth of winter, destitute of supplies and ammunition, were assailed in the mountains, and massacred almost to a man. This sad blow to the British arms was avenged a year afterward by a fresh body of troops under Generals Pollock and Nott, acting under direction of Lord Ellenborough, who had now become governor-general of India; but the original purposes of the first expedition having been frustrated, and further intervention in the affairs of Afghanistan offering no visible compensation, either present or prospective, for the great expense of occupation, the country was seriously desolated and abandoned.

While the events named were taking place in the northwest of India, occupation was found for a considerable portion of the British army in China. The Chinese government had insulted a British envoy, imprisoned British subjects, and sequestrated and destroyed British property. To chastise affronts like these, to obtain indemnification for the pecuniary injury, security against further wrongs of the kind, to secure safety for future commercial dealings, and possibly to obtain some more oriental territory, expeditions were fitted out, and after a contest of two or three years' duration, a peace was obtained—though not a piece—which, perhaps, was as honorable to the arms of Great Britain as it has proved fruitful of advantage to her trade.

Many at this time hoped that strife and bloodshed had reached a termination, and in confidence of this belief, the governor-general proclaimed perpetual peace in Asia, declaring his purpose of abstaining from all intervention in foreign affairs. Hardly, however, had the pacific declaration been published in every corner of the empire, when it was deemed necessary to punish the Scindians for alleged treacherous conspiracies against a part of the force retiring from Southern Afghanistan, and for certain overt acts of hostility subsequent to the British evacuation of that country. The ameer of Scinde refused the satisfaction demanded from them, took arms, and attacked the British residency at Hydrabad while negotiations were yet on foot, gave battle to the small army under Sir Charles Napier, which had been employed to sustain the demand for reparation, were defeated, and their territory, of course, became a part of the British empire. Subsequently, toward the close of the year 1843, the British government found it necessary to interfere with the state of Gwalior, to enforce the fulfilment of that portion of the treaty which regulated the succession to the musnud. This intervention was a very convenient mode of commencing a conflict which must end in adding more territory to the vast expanse which had already been acquired.

The death of the Maharajah, and the serious disruption which resulted therefrom, rendered the state a scene of hostilities, and caused a complete change in the government. The Baee, the widow of the late prince, herself a girl of thirteen, belonging to a family of historical distinction in Mahratta annals, had adopted a boy of eight as her son. An application was made, as usual, to the British government, as standing in the position of the mogul emperors, and enjoying the paramount authority in India, for the confirmation of this choice. Lord Ellenborough gave his sanction both to the adoption and to the appointment of the Mama Saib as vizier. Soon after, the Dada Khasgee obtained the confidence of the young Baee, by a seraglio intrigue, and ignominously expelled the minister of the British approval, and placed the country in a hostile attitude toward the English. Remonstrances were offered, but to no purpose. The British government was set at open defiance, in the face of the other tribes and countries of India, and they conceived that they had but two alternatives before them—that of vindicating their authority, regardless of whatever opposition the durbar might be able to bring against them, or of relinquishing the paramount influence and power which they had gained in the country. It requires not a moment of study to understand that the English decided upon the former course. An army of exercise was assembled on the Gwalior frontier, "to give weight to the representations of their minister;" but his efforts to restore pacific relations, however sincerely made, proved without effect. The Gwalior army of 20,000 disciplined troops, with 200 pieces of ordnance, animated with the remembrance of former triumphs, had meanwhile become unmanageable by the durbar. The English neighboring province of Bundlekund had been for nearly two years in an unsettled state, and the anarchy at Gwalior, of course, tended to keep alive the spirit of insurrection. It was nearly impossible for the British government, responsible as it was for the security of its own subjects, and the peace of India, to remain quiescent, with a hostile durbar and a mutinous army within one hundred miles of their northern capital. As the season for military operations approached, the remonstrances of the governor-general became more urgent, but the only effect they produced was to restore harmony between the Gwalior court and army. The governor-general proceeded to Agra, and ministers were sent from Gwalior to meet him; but there was so evident a manifestation of the usual Mahratta perfidy in all their negotiations—or, at least, this was claimed by the English—that the British army was ordered to take the field, and march toward the capital.

As the army advanced, the Mahratta negotiators were instructed to assure Lord Ellenborough of the entire submission of the Baee and her couselors, and his lordship was induced to halt three days, in daily expectation of her coming into camp, together with the young prince. But far different were the designs of the court. The time thus gained was devoted to the most active preparations for resistance. The young Baee appeared like an Amazon, superintending the dispatch of troops, punishing the lukewarm, and animating her followers by every consideration of honor and profit to resist to the death. The governor-general's eyes were at length opened by shots fired on Col. Sleeman, who had called at Gwalior on his way from Bundlekund to the camp; and the British troops advanced to the city. They soon afterward came unexpectedly upon the batteries which had been erected during the night at Maharajpore, unknown to them, and a bloody engagement ensued. It was perhaps the first time in which the British troops were nearly matched in number by those of the natives, and this was one of the best-contested battles that the natives have ever fought with the English. The bodies of the natives lay in heaps around their guns, and nothing but British valor carried the day. Another battle was about the same time fought at Punniar. The British were victorious at both places. The kingdom of Gwalior was prostrate at their feet; but they contented themselves with a new treaty (for the appropriation of territory was at that moment an unpopular subject with the home government), providing that previous treaties be enforced, save as far as they may interfere with this new one, that the durbar obligates himself to appropriate the revenues of sixteen districts, to the extent of 1,300,700 rupees for the support of the British subsidary force, and if there should be a deficiency in the amount, he to make it up; that the civil administration of those districts should be conducted by British officers; that the army of the durbar should be reduced to nine thousand men, thirty-two guns, and two hundred gunners, the other troops being immediately disbanded; that the Maharajah's minority should cease at the age of eighteen years, and that the persons entrusted with the management of the goverment during his non-age should act by the advice of the British resident on all matters whereon advice should be offered, and that no change should be made in cabinet council without the consent of the British resident. Other stipulations were also made in the treaty, but these are the most important; and it will be seen they largely favor the interests of the English.

In the year 1845 Runjeet Sing, the founder of the Seikh empire in the Punjaub, having died, and his immediate successors having met with violent deaths, the military force of the Punjaub became greatly disorganized. There pay being much in arrears, and their chief incapable of controlling them—the sovereign, an infant, and the queen mother regent, an unscrupulous and intriguing woman—the Seikhs now clamored to be led across the river Sutledge that they might have an opportunity of plundering the British possessions. Every effort was made to restrain so mad, audacious, and unjustifiable a step, but without avail. They assembled in great force and invaded the Cis-Sutledge provinces. Sir H. Hardinge, the then governor-general, advanced with a small force, commanded by Sir Hugh Gough, to repel the incursion. Three severe battles were fought, in each of which the Seikhs were defeated; but it was impossible to drive them across the Sutledge without a reinforcement of troops. These were sent for. Previous to their arrival, the Seikhs had strongly intrenched themselves on the left bank of the Sutledge, near the village of Sobraon. Reinforced, the British attacked and penetrated the line, drove the Seikhs into and over the river, and pursued them to Lahore, where they submitted. A government was thus established at Lahore under British surveillance, but the helplessness of the king, a minor, left the country at the mercy of the sirdars or chiefs, one of whom caused the murder of British officers at Mooltan, while others revived hostilities and assumed a menacing posture. New operations now became necessary. Lord Hough (he having advanced to that honor) moved forward with a considerable army against the Seikhs, defeated them signally at Goozerat, dispersed and disarmed them, and the Punjaub was by the new governor-general, the Earl of Dalhouise, at once annexed to the British possessions.

Thus was the vast extent of India placed permanently under British power. In 1852 the Burmese governors of Rangoon were charged with oppressing British subjects. Satisfaction was sought for, but not accorded. An army and a fleet were therefore equipped for Burmah, and after a prolonged cam-

A Little Logic and a Forgery.

This paragraph is going the rounds of the religious press:

"A secular paper, commenting on Mr. Miln's denial of the existence of a personal God, asks the following pertinent questions: Does the man Miln believe in himself as an organized personality? If so, could he, an effect, come from anything less than an organized personality as a cause? If there is no personal God, can there be a personal man? Can an effect be greater than its cause? There are others besides Mr. Miln who might consider these questions with profit."

Those who pretend to reason logically should be prepared to go where logic leads them when carried out. But the Christians make a loud show of appealing to logic, and go back on the chain of cause and effect as far as "God," and then stop. They are like the Hindoo who says the world rests on the back of an elephant, and the elephant on the back of a tortoise. When asked what the tortoise rests on, he wraps himself up in his dignity and remains silent.

If an organized personality, as a man, must hav as a cause a preceding organized personality, then it must follow that that organized personality must hav had a like preceding cause, and so on ad infinitum. This necessitates a cause for God. A syllogism is the simplest form in which to put it, and it may be stated thus, taking the Christian statement for the major premis:

1. There can be no personality without a preceding cause.

2. God is a person. [Also a Christian statement.]

3. Therefore he must have had a preceding cause. [The inevitable logical deduction.]

There is no escaping this. If no effect can be greater than its cause, then the cause of God must be at least equal with him. What was that cause? and where is it now? And what was the cause of that cause? Where shall we find the first cause? It could not be God, for he, being organized personality, must hav had a cause, and that cause must hav been an organized personality (on the Christian statement that one organized personality must come from a preceding one). And so we go on with an endless succession of organized personalities or gods. The chain would never end, as the chain of cause and effect never will. It could not hav had a beginning, and it cannot hav an end.

How much easier then, and how true, is the scientific statement that the universe always existed! Every effect must hav a cause, and every cause produces its effect. There is no end either way. "God" cannot be plumped down in the middle of the chain and set at work both ways. The chain cannot be wrenched apart and a link put in longer than the whole. If he is a cause, he must likewise be an effect. There is no room for two infinits. Logic is the last thing for Christianity to appeal to, for it inevitably destroys the whole fabric. The leaders recognize this fact and confine themselvs to dogmatic assertions, which they endeavor to bolster up with false statements and forged documents like this, which is also going through the more ignorant religious papers:

"There livs at this time in Judea a man of singular virtue, whose name is Jesus Christ, whom the barbarians esteem as a prophet, but his followers love and adore him as the offspring of the immortal God. He calls back the dead from the graves, and heals all sorts of diseases with a word or a touch. He is a tall man, and well shaped; of an amiable and reverend aspect; his hair of a color that can hardly be matched, falling into graceful curls, waving about and very agreeably touching upon his shoulders, parting on the crown of the head, running as a stream to the front after the fashion of the Nazarites; his forehead high, large, and imposing; his cheeks, without spot or wrinkle, beautiful with a lovely red; his nose and mouth formed with exquisit symmetry; his beard thick and of a color suitable to his hair, reaching below his chin, and parting in the middle like a fork; look, innocent, dignified, manly, and mature; in proportion of body, most perfect and captivating; his hands and arms most delectable to behold. He rebukes with majesty, counsels with mildness, his whole address, whether in word or deed, being eloquent and grave. No man has seen him laugh, yet his manners are exceedingly pleasant; but he has wept frequently in the presence of men. He is temperate, modest, and wise, a man, for his extraordinary beauty and divine affections, surpassing the children of men in every sense" (Description of Jesus by Publius Lentulus, president of Judea in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar).

This is a very clumsy forgery, commonly attributed to Jerome Xavier, who lived and lied about the year 1600. No Christian of any note is willing to risk his reputation by quoting this. Publius Lentulus is only supposed to hav preceded Pilate; it is not known either way, but the probabilities are against him. The only Publius Lentulus of any note was he who headed a rebellion in the Roman empire, 63 B.C. At this time he was a man of years, and unless he lived to be one hundred and fifty years old, or such a matter, he could not hav preceded Pontius Pilate. This letter is not considered of any account by anybody, and is only quoted by those entirely ignorant of the evidences for Christ. There is absolutely no evidence of the existence of Christ in "profane" history. The passage alluding to him in Josephus is acknowledged to be spurious, and Philo and Justus of Tiberias never mention him. All the early and later Christian forgeries hav been exposed, and the gospel stands alone in its record of impossibilities. This particular story is a very thin attempt by an ignorant priest, and the friend who sent it to us can tell his Christian friend who gave it to him that it is a fraud all the way through. Publius Lentulus never wrote it, even if he ever lived.

When and Where?

PRAIRIE CITY, OR., April 25, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If you will please state in THE TRUTH SEEKER the time and place that the manuscript was put together that constitutes the old Bible, you will confer a favor on a constant reader of your noble paper.

E. L. SANDFORD.

Our correspondent has asked us a question which we cannot answer, and which no one else can, for the very simple reason that no one knows. The testimony in regard to the books of the Bible is more negativ than positiv. It is certain that the majority of them were not written by the authors assigned by the Christian authorities, but privately acknowledged by them to be false. They are mostly compilations from preëxisting manuscripts, and no one knows how, when, or by whom they were written, and no one knows by whom they were compiled into the now existing Old Testament. Out of the thirty-nine books twenty-six are admitted to be by authors other than those given, and of the remaining thirteen very little is known. To Ezra (who is supposed to hav lived about 450 B.C.) the credit is usually given of putting them into shape with the help of Nehemiah, who is also supposed to hav lived in the same century. When the canon was finally closed is not known. It was not considered inspired by its writers, and the belief in inspiration did not become general till the first century before Christ. It was changed at the whim of the compiler. The last Jewish council to act on the canon was at Jamnia, in Palestine, which town was the seat of the Sanhedrim from 70 to 135 B.C.

The New Testament is as much, if not more, mixed than the Old. The four gospels were not written by the evangelists, and only a few of the books of the New Testament have any pretense to authenticity. It would occupy too much space to giv all the history of the Bible, and our friend is referred to Bronson Keeler's "Short History of the Bible," which is devoted to an examination of this question.

Before dropping the subject, however, it might be appropriate to remark that every copy of the Bible published by the American Bible Society bears a lie upon its title page, i.e., "translated out of the original Greek." How a book can be translated out of a language in which it does not exist, nor ever did, the society does not explain; but it will not deny the fact that there is no "original Greek" version of the Jewish scriptures, which are about as likely to hav first existed in Greek as the Morey letter is to hav been originally written in Chinese. If Mr. Sanford happens to hav ever contributed anything toward the maintenance of this society, it looks to us as though he might recover damages from it upon the ground that it has obtained money under false pretenses.

"When Rogues Fall Out," etc.

The following, from the Methodist, is very good so far as it goes, but the whole truth is not told. There are many institutions in this city as bad as this, and they are by no means all Catholic:

"Some revelations recently made respecting the Roman Catholic Protectory, just beyond our city limits, in Westchester county, bring to light about the biggest specimen of ecclesiastical greed on the one hand, and of political subserviency and corruption on the other, that we hav lately fallen upon. There are in this institution, at this time, about two thousand children (formerly, there were fewer), sent there chiefly by the criminal courts of the city; and, though it is legally and practically a church institution, owned and governed in all things by its own officers, who are exclusivly and intensely Romanists, and in its whole system of instruction and management it is altogether a Roman Catholic school, it is still fed by the public funds to the tune of nearly a quarter of a million a year. For the years 1869 to 1881 (both inclusiv) its receipts from the public treasury rounded up $2,639,296—a little over $200,000 per year, and very considerably more than five dollars per week for each inmate during all those years. It professes to copy the example of the House of Refuge in preparing these children for activ life, afid then for places in the families of those who may wish their services; but quite lately a number of families in the neighborhood applied for children and were refused—simply because the applicants were not Romanists. This is what the Roman Catholic authorities hav the effrontery to ask and do; this is what our politicians of both parties help them to do; this is the way that Protestants allow themselvs to be taxed for the support of Roman Catholic breeding establishments. Was there ever such fatuity elsewhere?"

It remains for the Methodist to come out squarely now, and tell how many thousands of dollars its church has plundered from the public treasury in the way of aids to ostensible charities, and how much the government has been deprived of by exempting its churches from the visit of the tax gatherer. It has millions of dollars' worth of property all over the country which does not pay a cent toward its own protection. Up in New Hampshire last year the legislature passed a law that the churches should pay taxes on all property valued over ten thousand dollars. Did the disciples of Wesley walk up to the collector's office and settle? Hardly. The bald-headed old deacons took their hats in their hands and went to the boards of aldermen of the cities, and the selectmen of the towns, and humbly begged off—wanted the assessment set aside, as they were "God's houses." In the little city of Keene, where we used to liv, the Methodists begged and borrowed money enough to partially build a $35,000 church, and put a mortgage on it to complete it. When this law was passed last year, did the trustees call at the assessors' office and pay taxes on $25,000? Not much. The old deacons went to the board of aldermen and said they owed something yet on the church, and didn't feel able to pay. Many of the members of this church are known tous personally, and we know they hav money enough among them to afford to be honest, but it never occurred to them to be so.

At the rate of taxation in New Hampshire this church should pay $62.50 into the treasury of the town every year, but it does not pay a cent, and will not if it can help it. And this is only one church among the thousands all over the country. Figured up in cold cash, it will aggregate hundreds of thousands of dollars the Methodist church robs the people of by pious beggary and political truculency. The other churches are just as bad. They all go around with their hats in their hands and beg from rich and poor, from state and people, with a brazenness that can only proceed from an utter lack of shame and honest principle. Before the Methodist spends any more strength on the beam in its Catholic sister's eye, it should endeavor to remove the mote from its own. Honest consistency is a priceless jewel.

How Long Did the Jews Stay in Egypt?

LUDLOW, VT., April 28, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Can you tell me where in the Bible I can find authority for the statement that the Jews remained in Egypt 215 years? There is a claim that it was 430. Yours truly, H. P. GIBSON.

When Christians see what a dilemma the setting of 215 years for the Jews' sojourn in Egypt leads them into, they grasp at a straw to help them out. This straw is found in Exodus xii, 40, which says: "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years." But this does not help the case. The verse does not say that all their sojourning was done in Egypt, while the other copies of the Bible—the Vatican copy, the Alexandrian version, and the Samaritan—say the sojourning was done in Egypt and the land of Canaan. St. Paul says that the time, from the making of the promis to Abraham to the giving of the law, was four hundred and thirty years. From the making of the promis to the going down into Egypt of the seventy souls, was two hundred and fifteen years, according to the generations given. Subtracting this two hundred and fifteen years from four hundred and thirty years, leaves two hundred and fifteen years as the period the Jews stayed in Egypt. This is also in accordance with the dates assigned in the marginal notes by the Bible compilers. God told Jacob to go down into Egypt, and said he would go with him. The account of this is given in Genesis xlvi, and the date assigned is 1706 B.C. After they got there the Egyptians oppressed them sorely, but the Jews stood it till Moses was born, and then he headed a rebellion. God told them, through Moses, to borrow all the Egyptians' jewelry—a command they obeyed with wonderful alacrity, and a scrupulous fidelity to details, adding, on their own hook, the old clothes of the Egyptians—and then get out of Egypt between two days. This the Jews did. The date of this confiscation and flight is assigned to 1491 B.C. Therefore, the time they sojourned in Egypt can be stated with exactness, or else the Bible lies:

Time Jacob went into Egypt	1706 B.C.
Number of years they stayed in Egypt .	215

Josephus, the Jewish historian, givs this period, and he is sustained at the present day by the best biblical scholars. Of course, all these dates are taken from the Bible itself, and are true if it is true, and false if it is false. If the Jews went into Egypt at all, they "sojourned" this length of time. The authorship of the Pentateuch is unknown, and at best is a very imperfect history. The account of creation is now positivly known to be false, and if Genesis is false the rest of it probably is. The kindest thing we can say of it is that it is legendary; that on the top of a very little truth the writers piled an immense amount of falsehood. They may hav told these tales, and heard them told, so often they finally believed them; but that is no reason why the world, with its added knowledge, should now do so.

We hav in press (ready for mailing in about a week) the "Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh." Our readers all know its merits. It is a considerable improvement on the Bible chronicles, inasmuch as it contains sound sense, and a truthful description of Palestine. We hav extracted it from the second volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and printed it in this form to accommodate the many who hav expressed a desire for it to loan to friends without breaking the set of travels. It is some 460 pages, bound in cloth, and sells for one dollar, postpaid.

Mr. Follet sends for two more charters for Leagues in Illinois; one at Braidwood (Ferris Burr, secretary), and one at Dana (James McHenry, secretary). The friends at Vineland, N. J., hav also organized and applied for a charter (Mrs. M. E. Tillotson, secretary). This is the way the League dies, Mr. Underwood.

J. H. Burnham is speaking before the Liberal League of Pittsburgh, Pa., during May. His address is care G. W. D. Carpenter, Neville ave., Mt. Washington, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Our friend Jamieson is going to start a local paper at Pepin, Wis. It will be devoted to building up the great Northwest, and tearing down Christianity.

A Note from Mr. Green.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Allow me to say to the Liberals of the state of New York, and especially to those of the western part of the state, that I shall be home June 1st and thereafter up to August 23d, when the Freethinkers' Convention will be held. I desire to devote my time to lecturing and organizing Leagues in that state, and I hereby request all who desire my services to at once address me at Salamanca, N. Y. H. L. Green.

The Newark Blasphemy Case.

It is reported that on April 14th W. H. Rosentrauch, of Newark, N. J., was arrested for blasphemy at the instigation of a person who is a German Catholic. The accused gave $250 bail. Blasphemy is a crime in New Jersey, punishable by fine or one year's imprisonment. But it appears that the blasphemy charged is alleged to hav been committed against the Virgin Mary, which makes the case really interesting. I presume that the New Jersey law in referenbe to blasphemy was framed with very little, if any, reference to the holy madam, nay, indeed, perhaps the first legislators of that state would hav considered it as good or as bad as blasphemy even to assert that disrespectful mention of the Virgin constituted blasphemy. To render the Virgin a blasphemable person the law must regard her as a goddess—a deity, in fact. Well, that is what she really is, but is she that in New Jersey law? That is the question. From a Roman Catholic point of view, the Virgin being a goddess, and a modern successor of Astarte, Isis, and Venus, the defendant is guilty of blasphemy. But if the defendant is not himself a Roman Catholic, the question arises, How can he be obligated to the Virgin Mary's religion, and be held amenable to its penalties? This question we ask in the United States, and not in Spain. The laws of these states were not intended to be any particular protection to the above goddess, unless she could succeed in another incarnation of herself, and be born as a citizen of the republic, or naturalized to it as an alien, and I hear of no signs of her presence among us, or the probability that it will happen. For all that, it is not impossible that the Protestants of New Jersey may conspire with the Roman Catholics to convict the defendant. If so, and they succeed, let the defendant bravely bear the burden unjustly laid upon him, and console himself with the fact that the day of their visitation is not very far off. Cabalist.

The accused is indicted under the sixty-sixth section of the Crimes act, which reads as follows:

"If any person shall wilfully blaspheme the holy name of God by denying, cursing, or contumeliously reproaching his being or providence, or by cursing or contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, or the Christian religion or the holy word of God (the canonical scriptures contained in the Old and New Testaments), or by profane scoffing at or exposing them or any of them to contempt and ridicule, then every person thus offending shall on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $200, or imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding twelve months, or both."

The section of the Crimes act immediately preceding the one just quoted is even more imbecil and brutal. It provides that

"All impostors in religion, such as personate our savior Jesus Christ, or suffer their followers to worship or pay them divine honors, or terrify, delude, or abuse the people by false denunciations of judgments shall on conviction be punished for every such offense by a fine not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both."

The following is the complaint made before Edward M Weiss, the justice who held the accused to bail:

"State of New Jersey, county of Passaic. Before Edward M Weiss, one of the justices of the peace in and for said county, personally appeared Gotfried Deutschle, and being duly sworn, saith that Wolf Hirsch Rosenstrauch did, on or about the 27th day of December, 1881, in the city of Paterson, county of Passaic, at the place 502 Main street, in said city, in the presence of his family, wilfully blaspheme, curse, and contumeliously reproach Jesus Christ and the holy mother of God by saying Jesus Christ is a ——, and exposed Jesus Christ to ridicule and contempt against the laws of this state without cause."

Another Old Truth Seeker Gone.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It is with much regret that I hav to tell you, and the readers of our paper, of the death of Lorenzo Tabor, whose body was consigned to the silent mansions of the dead on last Sunday. Mr. Tabor had resided in Adrian over forty years. He was a lawyer of the most open, candid, honest, intelligent and benevolent kind, always wanting to get at the truth of the facts in the case, so that justice might be done, and peace maintained among the people. He had been, for a long number of years, an open and an avowed Infidel to what he called the Christian superstition, though his wife, a very worthy woman, had a seat in the Christian church. I made her a call this morning, to sympathize with her in the great loss that she had met with in the death of so worthy a husband. In the course of my remarks to her, as a comforter, I proposed to write a little obituary concerning the life, character, and death of her husband, to be published in The Truth Seeker, as he had been one of its patrons so long; but she declined to accept my offer, and most respectfully asked me to drop the editor a card, telling him to stop the paper, which, of course, I consented to do, and will also comply with her request not to write any obituary of her husband's private and domestic character, though I feel certain that it was equally as honorable to him as his public character was, in the capacity of a man and citizen. Of course, his public character, which he leaves behind him, belongs to the public, and it is for us to make what use we can of it to build ourselvs up with. Therefore, let us be wise enough to hav an ambition to try to emulate his virtues, as Freethinkers, and to avoid his mistakes, in intimating, even in a playful way, that we would be willing to hav a Christian clergyman, while he is an acknowledged orthodox teacher of what we except to as a superstition, hold forth as a religious exponent over our dead bodies, before the people, even if he should promis (as it seems this benevolent divine did Mr. Tabor) to giv us a free pass into their orthodox heaven, on the ground of good works. For, allowing that Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, Rahab, Solomon, and all that class of liars, bigamists, and murderers are there, as the church say they are, who of us wants to take even a free ticket for their abode? and echo answers, Who? Let any one that has been well acquainted with Mr. Tabor here, as a man that was always very choice of his company, just imagin him, if they can, taking his seat in the orthodox heaven among that class. My own opinion, honestly expressed, is that Mr. Tabor would rather go to the other place, where he would hav the company of such men and women as Servetus, Bruno, Bacon, Paine, Shakespere, Galileo, Gibbon, Hume, Voltaire, Buffon, Lucretia Mott, Mrs. Anthony, and others of this class of mind, that Mr. Tabor was more or less acquainted with here, through their writings; all of whom the church has closed their heavenly door against.

Mr. Tabor was always ready with his donation to help to support the National Liberal League. When the Christian church, through its minions, made the attack on The Truth Seeker, by an open and shameful prosecution of its editor, because he stood up for his common rights as an editor and bookdealer, Mr. Tabor, like a true American citizen, which he was, said, "This won't do; I will defend Mr. Bennett in his rights as an American citizen, and I will commence at once." Through your correspondent, he sent on his five dollars for one year, with Viscount Amberley's great work on the religions of the world. Then the second year, when he renewed, he got Paine's works complete. He was ever prompt with his name, and the cash for the renewal of The Truth Seeker, which is a virtue worthy of imitation by all. While the Christian church leaders had Mr. Bennett shut up in their bastile at Albany, Mr. Tabor's sympathies were deeply mortified by the most cruel and outrageous prosecution against an American bookdealer. Mr. Tabor was deeply moved by Mr. Bennett's letters during that time, they savored so of the greatness of the man. At one time, on meeting me in the street, just after he had been reading one of those letters, he said to me, "Mr. Moore, I don't believe there is another man in this country, who, under the same circumstances, could write such cool, intelligent letters."

Some years ago, at a Spiritual camp-meeting a few miles from the city, a certain doctor was addressing the audience, and in the course of his remarks he was telling the Bible story about the forty-two children torn up by the bears. He said those little children were out playing, and by and by they saw an old man coming along without much hair on his head One boy said to the others, "Let us hav some fun with him." And as the old man came up to them, he said, "Go up, thou bald head, go!" and at this God sent two bears out on the little boys, and they were torn all up. "Now," said the doctor, in his peculiar way, and with emphasis, "that was a dumb fool of a God."

It so happened that there was a hardshell Baptist within the sound of the doctor's voice, who immediately became alarmed for the honor of God, and after sweltering over it for about two months, came down to the city with the case, and as Mr. Tabor was always ready to giv a little legal counsel free of charge, he went to him and laid his case before him. Mr. Tabor was not long in giving his judgment in the case, and that was, that he ought to go home and attend to his own business and God would attend to his. But this did not quell the Baptist's religious indignation. He went off to the squire's and filed a bill against the doctor for blasphemy, and had him duly arraigned before the law. The case was adjourned over for trial. Mr. Tabor was retained by the doctor. The doctor and I went into the squire's office before the time fixed upon for the trial. I saw there some eight or ten rich farmers who had been at that camp-meeting, all Liberal in thought, but the plaintiff was not there. I went out and soon met Mr. Tabor. He asked me if I was at that meeting. I told him that I was. He then asked me what the doctor said. I told him as above. He said that he supposed the doctor meant that God who showed Moses his back parts and not the God of the universe. Of course I said it was this Bible God that the doctor was talking about, and here we parted, I going up to the squire's office, and he going to look up this hardshell Baptist.

Time passed on, and finally, nobody appearing as a complainant, the case was dismissed. Soon after I met Mr. Tabor, and he told me that he had taken this hardshell Baptist up into his office alone, and told him he had better just drop the case and go home. "Oh, no," he said, "that would not do; this blasphemy must be put down," and so he went on at some length on the importance of standing up for God and his dear son, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. I told him, said Mr. Tabor, that I had been up to the squire's office, and had seen the men that were there, and knew they meant business. "If you lose your case," said he to the hardshell, "which you will, you will be arrested for perjury before you leave the city." Mr. Tabor said at this the old man began to shake in his boots. "I then told him," said he, "that the best thing he could do would be to go right down, get into his buggy, and go home, and off he went in a hurry."

The funeral of Mr. Tabor was held at his own residence, which was a large one. The religious services were conducted, as I hav said, by an orthodox Christian clergyman. Mr. Tabor had been on very sociable terms with this gentleman for some time, their residences being near together. Mr. Tabor had often named him to me as a very Liberal man in his views. It was only a matter of time, he thought, if he kept on reading and investigating the claims of Christianity from the Freethinker's standpoint, when he would be out of that old superstition. He had read Greg's "Creed of Christendom," "Supernatural Religion" by Prof. Newman, Judge Waite's work, etc., and he seemed to be well pleased with this class of scholarly and Infidel reading, all of which establishes the claim that there is no foundation for orthodox Christianity in truth and in fact. It is, as Judge Waite calls it, the grandest system of fraud that ever was palmed off on the human race.

During his discourse over the dead body of Mr. Tabor, the Baptist divine claimed that there was an understanding between Mr. Tabor and himself that in case Mr. Tabor died before he did he (Mr. Holmes) was to preach his funeral sermon. What kind of a real and earnest understanding this was on the side of Mr. Tabor, while he (Mr. Holmes) was in good and regular standing as an orthodox minister in the Christian church, that Mr. Tabor had denounced in my presence, but a few days before his sickness, as the offspring of harlots—the Roman Catholic church being their mother—I will leave any one that was acquainted with Mr. Tabor as an out-and-out and outspoken Infidel to what he called the Christian superstition, to judge for themselvs.

The foundation of evangelical Christianity, is vicarious atonement and the total depravity of every human being; this is what the Rev. Mr. Holmes, as an acknowledged minister of that church, must profess to believe in order to maintain his position as minister. And this is what he calls truth, when he told Mr. Tabor, with tears in his eyes, "I wish you could see it as I do." And then he tells us over Mr. Tabor's dead body that he answered him with as much feeling and with intense seriousness, "I wish for my sake, and for the sake of others, that I could."

Now I do not pretend to say that Mr. Tabor did not say these very words, but if so he must hav been in one of those eccentric fits that the lawyer speaks of him as having at times. In all my acquaintance with Mr. Tabor for the last twelve years, I never saw anything like this condition of brain present with him. It was always that of Christianity being a superstition growing out of former superstitions, and he could no more believe in this Christian Holy Ghost story than he could believe in the former ones out of which this one grew. Of course everybody that knew Mr. Tabor knows that he would be the last man to say that he would wish to believe, under any circumstances, something that he had the evidence to prove was a myth and had no existence in truth and in fact.

But Mr. Tabor has left us in person, and, as has been said, his character as a moral and intelligent Freethinker and an upright man in all his dealings with his fellow-man is still with us and worthy of imitation by all, whether inside or outside of the Christian church. S. D. Moore.

paign, a large portion of the territories of the king of Ava was confiscated and added to British territory, making their entire East-India possessions amount to nearly 2,000,000 square miles—an expanse of territory at least eight times that of Great Britain and Ireland, with a population five times as numerous.

THE SEPOY MEETING AND MASSACRES.

There is little doubt that this rebellion might have been avoided had the English shown more consideration to the prejudices of the native soldiers, or sepoys. These had shown themselves valorous and loyal on many occassions, and these qualities would unquestionably have continued had not needless causes of offense been heaped upon them. The loyalty of the sepoy in time came to be taken for servility; his faithfulness to duty came to be regarded as a proof of his meanness. Cowardness could not be imputed to him, for he had fought bravely in too many exposed positions for this charge to hold. Though he worked for one-tenth the money which the English soldier cost his government, he nevertheless fought with nearly equal bravery, and endured hardships with as little complaint; and it was hard that that faithfulness should be contemned, that he should be laughed at, and his religious predjudices broadly abused. These causes, which really existed, began gradually to give birth to a feeling of discontent, which culminated on the annexation of the province of Oude, from which a considerable portion of the Indian army, particularly the Bengal portion, had been drawn. It was not so much that the sepoys felt particularly aggrieved by the annexation; they of course knew that under the English rule the country would be better cared for than would be the case under native princes; but their connection with the chiefs of the province were of a friendly character, and those chiefs found it easy to play upon their feelings.

The ostensible cause of the meeting was fear of religion and caste; but it was not the only or even principal cause. Other deep causes had for some time existed. The English officer was at one time loved and feared even as a god; but that was when he indentified himself with the very natives whom he commanded. It is related of Lord Gough that he often partook of the sweetmeats of the country, which his native soldiers brought him, and this endeared him in their esteem; but later on the English officers became more haughty, and unmistakably showed by their overbearing conduct the contempt with which they viewed the native soldier. An officer who scorns his subordinates cannot reasonably expect love and affection in return. The larger share of the officers were unacquainted with their men and held themselves aloof from them, and this distant conduct in itself nurtured a feeling of hatred on the part of the rank and file of native birth.

With the want of affection which naturally grew up among the native element, it was very easy for them to be keenly alive to the danger of their religious prejudices and their rule of caste being interfered with. It matters not whether the grounds for their fears were tenable or not, they were real to them all the same. It is said that Russian spies made themselves officious in sowing the seeds of discontent among the native troops, a sort of compensation for their Crimean defeat, though there may not have been as much of this as has been supposed. But strange conceits took possession of the minds of the native soldiers, some well founded and some without foundation. They believed that the imported salt was adulterated with ground bones; the ghee, or melted butter, was cheapened with animal fa (for which they have the greatest abhorrence). Such stories were freely circulated among them, and they firmly believed them true, as they doubtless had grounds for. Even the powdered bones of cows (for which they have a sacred reverence), they believed to have been mixed with their flour, and the water of the wells they believed to have been polluted by flesh of animals being cast into them. When inquired of what reason there was for such deeds to be done, the reply would be: "Simply to make one caste of us all," which was the constant burden of the song of all the missionaries. It is also said that Russian spies had industriously circulated the statement that the rule of the English in India was to continue but for a hundred years, and having begun in 1757, it must terminate in 1857, which date was at hand when these discontentments were fomented.

The mine of discontent may be said to have been thoroughly laid throughout the country, and but a spark was needed to fire it from end to end. That spark was furnished when the Enfield rifle was introduced, the cartridges of which had to be greased to facilitate their passage along the bore of the barrel. The fat of beef and of hogs was furnished the soldiers for this purpose. This was worse than poison to them, and they could not use it without doing the utmost violence to their religious feelings.

The first symptons of open discontent were exhibited at Dum Dum, a military station, and a suburb of Calcutta. This was in January of 1857. A low caste lascar had applied to a Brahman sepoy for water. This was a great indignity to him of the superior caste; he indignantly refused to comply with the request, and demanded how the low caste lascar dared to make such a request. The reply was that the caste upon which Brahman prided himself so much had no existence in fact, for all sepoys, of the Brahman caste and all other, were alike required to make use of cartridges smeared with the fat of cows and pigs. This taunt, in which there was too much truth, ran like wildfire from Dum Dum to Barrachpore, where discontent was shown by several acts of insubordination. The bolder men among the sepoys led off in various attempts to arouse the spirit of insubordination and revolt, and some daring attempts were made to carry out the wild schemes they formulated.

The Nineteenth native regiment stationed at Berhampore simultaneously exhibited the spirit of avowed insubordination. They positively refused to receive the detested ammunition, and afterward broke into the armory and took possession of their muskets. They however vacillated, regretted the steps they had taken, laid down their arms, and were discharged from the service.

About the same time two sepoys of another regiment in Calcutta planned a mad attack to take the fort at that place, and were punished. At Umballa the 36th native regiment was still more disaffected and gave vent to incendiary acts on a large scale. At Lucknow the 7th Oude Irregulars became infused with the same spirit of dissatisfaction, and being drawn up in line for the purpose of being disbanded they simultaneously threw down their arms and fled. Some were overtaken, brought back, and punished as deserters.

The general revolt, however, dates from the outbreak of Meerut, in the first week of May, when eighty-five men of a Bengal regiment of cavalry refused to receive any cartridges, though not of the kind to which they objected on account of the animal fat, but those which they had been accustomed to. They were tried and sentenced to imprisonment from six to ten years, and then marched off to jail. On the following day the jail was broken into by their comrades and they set at liberty. The 3d cavalry was then joined to the 11th and 20th—all natives—and they rushed to arms and butchered every European they could meet, not even sparing women and children; they also put many natives to death, and fired many buildings. They also proceeded to Delphi, incited that city to revolt, and then initiated there the same mad deeds they had enacted at Meerut. After killing men, violating women, and then hacking them to pieces, and tossing little children on their bayonets, they proceeded to the palace of the king, an old man of eighty years, and proclaimed him sovereign of all India. He joined the mutinous movement more from fear than any other cause. It is, of course, greatly to be regretted that human nature, when smarting under a load of oppression, in throwing off the restraints that have bound them, will resort to cruel and enormous deeds, but such, unfortunately, is often the case.

The garrison at Delphi consisted of three native regiments and a battery of native artillery; all these joined in the mutinous movement of their comrades from Meerut, as well as the rabble of the city. They attempted to gain possession of the immense supply of war material in the city; but Lieut. Willoughby wisely ordered the magazines to be blown up, though he was himself so severely injured by the explosion that his death was the consequence. Many of the mutineers were also killed, which fortunately enabled the remaining European inhabitants of the place to escape to Kurnal, though they were hotly pursued on way.

When the news of these bloody movements reached Calcutta, of course they caused the most intense excitement, and it is not strange that many of the European inhabitants swore vengeance, though in bated breath. Perhaps the only man equal to the emergency, and who possessed the requisite coolness and good judgment, was he who most of all needed it, and that was the governor-general, Lord Canning, who was loyally aided by many of the white citizens of the town. He had but two European regiments at Calcutta, and, of course, it would not answer to dispatch them nearly a thousand miles to Delhi, for he knew not what moment there might be an uprising there at the government headquarters, and they be greatly needed there; but he immediately sent to Lord Elgin and Gen. Ashburnham, who were on their way to China at the head of an expedition directed to that country, begging them to return to India. He also at the same time urged the governors of Madras and Bombay to promptly send him all the assistance within their power. The China expedition were not able to arrive at Calcutta in time to take much part in suppressing the rebellion, though they did service at Lucknow, which was fully brought to terms in the following November. But the bare assurance that they were coming was a source of great hope and strength, and enabled the English to accomplish the stupendous work they had to perform.

The infection spread from Meerut and Delhi to Lucknow and Cawnpore, and from thence to other places. At Lucknow the earliest symptoms of disaffection were shown by the Oude Irregulars in the very forepart of May, from which a general discontent existed among the native troops, and by the end of the month nearly all the native regiments rebelled together, and fled towards Seetapore, whither they were pursued by Gen. Lawrence, though he was unable to capture them. This was followed by an insurrection in the city, and the assemblage of some seven or eight thousand of the mutineers on the Fyzabad road. These Lawrence promptly attacked, but was beaten back, and finding that the cantonments and forts could not be safely held, he, with all the Europeans of the place, withdrew within the residency, where they were closely besieged.

On the 3d of June the native regiments at Azimgurh rose in revolt, but they did not go to the extent of committing massacres, but rode off in the direction of Ghazerpore. This led to an attempt on the following day to disarm the Thirty-seventh Native Regiment at Benares, which being resisted, Colonel Neill ordered the Madras troops to fire upon the refractory regiment, which at once sent them flying in utter confusion.

At Cawnpore the Second Native Cavalry and the First Native Infantry broke out on the 4th of June, and on the next day were joined by the Fifty-third and Fifty-sixth Native Infantries, over all of whom the notorious Nana Saheb of Bithoor, a titled desperado, the adopted son of the deposed Peichwa, who had been engaged in Mahratta rebellion, assumed a sort of general command. There were nearly a thousand Europeans there, including men, women, and children, and they, under Gen. Wheeler, hastily took refuge within a feeble entrenchment, improvised for the occasion, and there they withstood the mutineers for nineteen days, after which time they capitulated, the perfidious Nana pledging himself to have them safely conveyed down the Ganges to Allahabad. Gen. Wheeler was deceived by this fair promise, and placed himself and over nine hundred of his companions to the care of Nana's men, but no sooner were they in the boats for the transfer than the natives commenced firing indiscriminately and mercilessly upon them, and the thatched roofs of the boats were set on fire, and between the two kinds of firing only four persons out of the whole number escaped. Those who were not killed by the firing were taken prisoners and were put to death in cold blood in their prison house, and this but a single day before Gen. Havelock arrived with a force to relieve them. Nearly a thousand of the bodies of the butchered Europeans were thrown down a well for sepulcher, and there they were buried, the men of Gen. Havelock not having time to dig separate graves for them.

The next revolt was at Allahabad, where, on the first week in June, the Sixth Native Infantry, after having voluntarily come forward to be allowed to be allowed to march against their brothers who had revolted at Delhi, and these mutineers were soon joined by the Oude Native Cavalry. A Mohammedan moulavi setting himself up in his place as the representative of the emperor of Delhi, directed all acts of violence that were perpetrated, till Col. Neill was able to save the station, when, however, as was the wont of the colonel, the innocent and guilty were punished together.

The centers of the rebellion were thus at Delhi and Lucknow, Cawnpore being regarded as the chief outpost of the latter. The infection also spread to Juanapore, Futtecogurh, Rohikand, and several of the important stations in Ouder. In central India several districts were greatly agitatated, while Jhansi was regarded as the capital of the revolt in that quarter. There was also revolt in the dominions of Holkar and Scindia. Though the chiefs themselves did not rise against the English, their troops marched off at their own instance to aid the rebellion in other localities. There were risings at Murdun, Jullundhur, and Loodiana, in the Punjaub, as well as at other places in the same district, but they were soon disarmed, and comparatively but a small number were able to escape to aid the revolters at Delhi.

The British forces made their first advance upon Delhi under Sir H. Barnard, who laid seige to the city on the 8th of June. He was opposed in taking his position with much vigor, and, to the shame of the British subjects be it said, the rebels here were led by traitors from the English ranks. It is hard to blame the native troops for fighting in what they deemed the defense of their own dear rights when Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen proved utterly faithless to their own cause and turned in and led the natives against the English forces, and this for money which was promised them in pay for their shameful perfidy. The mutineers were often beaten back, but Barnard was unable to take the place by a coup. He was unable even to invest the city, and had all he was able to do to repel the attacks of the insurgents. At last, worn out by fatigue and vexation, the poor man died, and his successor, Gen. Reid, resigning from ill-health, the command devolved upon Brigadier-General Wilson. The entire British force was about seven thousand, while the mutineers numbered more than twice as many, and were daily increasing. Fortunately, Brigadier-General Nicholson arrived with reinforcements on the 14th of August, and soon active operations were commenced, and a victory was gained over the rebels on the 24th at Neozuffgurh.

Preparations to cannonade the city were vigorously pushed, and two breaches having been effected, an assault was made on September 14th. The contest was a bloody one, but mainly successful to the British forces. The assaulting party had been divided into four columns, of which but one was defeated and driven back, while the other three gained the towers, bastions, and ramparts which they contended for, and without an exception. The combat was continued through the 16th, 17th, and 18th of September, on which latter day a considerable part of the southern portion of the city was taken. An attack upon the palace was made on the 19th; one of the gates was blown open, after which the British troops gained possession of the entire city. No quarter was given on either side. The king and his family fled, but the old man was pursued and overtaken by Captain Hodson, and thus the siege was closed. Nearly four thousand of the English troops fell on the battle field and in the hospitals, and the loss of the native forces were fully twice as great. The pursuit of the rebels was conducted by Col. Greathed with activity and severity.

In other directions, and at an earlier date, the movements of the English forces were as active as the nature of the case would allow. The first battle of Havelock with the rebels took place at Futtehpore, and the next near the Pandos Nuddee, in both of which he was successful. It is stated that this second action, which took place on July 15th, hastened the catastrophe at Cawnpore; though it is thought that Nana had previously planned the enormity which he committed. He was defeated at Akerwa on the 16th, Havelock proceeding thence to Cawnpore on the 17th, to find, with great grief and chagrin, that he was one day too late. He pursued Nana to Bithoor, and hurled the rebel's palace to the ground, but the villain seemed to have a charmed life, and effected his escape. Neill was now sent for from Allahabad, and was left at Cawnpore, where he perpetrated those frightful acts of vengeance—such as shooting live sepoys from the large guns—which have justly cast such a deep discredit upon the English character. These horrid cruelties were also practiced in other parts of the country, and it is to be hoped that, for the honor of the nation which claims to be the most enlightened, the most intelligent, and the most humane, its fair name will never again be blackened by such terrible deeds of atrocity.

Havelock, in the mean time, endeavored to move on to Lucknow; and, on the passage, to give Nana another terrible defeat at Oonas; but the rebels were too strong for him, and he was forced to fall back and unite his forces with those of Neill; and he was, moreover, unable to move forward again until Gen. Outram came up with further reinforcements, about the middle of September, when they all resumed their march upon Lucknow, after winning a victory on the 21st at Mungulwar. The joy was great at the Lucknow garrison upon the arrival of Haveloek and Outram, and their two thousand men and somewhat more, while the insurgents numbered about fifty thousand. The command of operations was assumed by Gen. Outram, who was senior in command; but they were confined for a while to beating back the enemy, which were too numerous for them to openly attack. Fresh relief at last came with Commander-in-chief Sir Colin Campbell, in November; but with his army added to those there before, the English numbered but six thousand men; operations were, therefore, necessarily confined to a series of isolated sieges and bombardments, but Sir Colin conquered his way, step by step, to the Residency; and, on the 17th of November, the garrison was relieved, and for greater security was changed to Cawnpore. Several attacks were made on the outposts at Cawnpore by the Gwalior contingent, which had arrived, but were beaten back; but on the 6th of December a general engagement took place, in which the rebels were thoroughly defeated, and driven toward Bithoor.

Cawnpore being thus considered safe, the forces again moved upon Lucknow, sustaining some active operations while on the march, while Jung Bahadoor approached more slowly from Nepaul. In March, 1858, the English forces at Lucknow numbered some 23,000, and it was deemed best to make active movements. The first few days were employed in skirmishing, after which the rebels retaliated by a series of assaults on the besieging force, which were every time repelled. On the 9th of March the English batteries opened fire, and on the 10th the outer line of the rebels was taken. The resistance was desperate, and blood flowed freely on both sides. By the 17th of the month the English were complete masters of the field; though the entire dispersion of the rebel forces did not take place till sometime afterward. But from that time, in all parts of India, the war was only a series of pursuits after armed bodies of natives; which bodies divided up into smaller bodies, causing the pursuit to be more labored and tedious. Leader after leader was pursued and taken; traitor after traitor was captured and severely punished. The arch-traitor Nana alone escaped, and has not been taken to this day. Some claim he is dead, while others insist that he still lives in Nepaul or Thibet, among the mountains. The final proclamation announcing the entire suppression of the rebellion was issued in 1859.

It would be a long and painful recital to narrate the hardships which the numerous fresh regiments sent out from England were forced to endure in this heated climate, and landing here in the most torrid part of the year. The conflicts on the battle-field were but a small share of the hardships they had to submit to. The power of the burning sun struck many to the earth, and fevers, dysenteries, and other climatic ills proved the death of many thousands of the poor boys fresh from the green fields and hills of England, Scotland, and Ireland. While active operations were on foot they had much to keep up their spirits and to nerve them on, but when these were over, and dull camp life was only before them, the listlessness was more severe upon them than marches and battles, and many thousands of them left their bones to decay in this fervid climate. In many of the regiments the proportion of deaths, even after the war was over, amounted to forty and fifty per cent. But greater bravery has hardly ever been displayed. Nothing more heroic than the reconquest of this great country has yet been written. Having won it the second time, it would seem the English should now be considered the legitimate owners.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

It has been truthfully said that the history of the British empire in India has no parallel in the records of time. For so small a country as England, and which has probably at no time had more than about 60,000 of her people here in this great country, to be able to subdue, and re-subdue, a country containing 250,000,000 of human beings, is indeed the most wonderful event, or series of events, that history tells us anything about. As we have seen, the first appearance of the English upon this soil was simply as traders, and they made for a long time no attempt to conquer territory. They were not even armed against the native races, but their contests were with other Europeans, the Portuguese, the Dutch, and the French. Their entire object at first was to make money from the wealth of India, and the enterprise of taking the entire country under their own power, and to make it a part of their own empire, was an after-consideration—an evolution, so to speak, which seems at most a natural consequence of their enterprise and their long residence in the tempting country. The English East India Company was founded in 1600. Its first fleet was sent out the following year, and commenced operations on some of the islands southwest of the peninsula. The factories on the main-land, at Surat, Ahmedabad and Cambay were established in 1612. Ten years later they were started on the Coromandel coast. In 1640 the first factory was started on the Hoogly River, the west branch of the mouths of the Ganges, and upon which the city of Calcutta is built. Those at Bombay were not established until 1667, in which year this district was obtained from the Portuguese. The disruption of the Mogul empire led to the arming the factories for protection. Upon the decline of the Mogul power the native princes were reinstated, and they were glad to enter into alliance with the friendly English traders among them. For a hundred years the Portuguese, Dutch, and the French were the English rivals, the latter ultimately becoming nearly equal with the English. They got at loggerheads, and one had to leave the country. It fell to the lot of the French. The French power collapsed about 1760, and this led to extensive annexations to English territory, especially in the southern portion of the peninsula. The conduct of the English during their increase of power cannot be justified. Though the home government impeached the cruel conduct of Warren Hastings, a long black catalogue of heartless enormities stands on the wrong side of the ledger.

The sovereignty of the East India Company commenced in 1765. The political importance gained had become so great that in 1772 the English Parliament decided that all civil and military correspondence regarding India should be submitted to the king's ministers; that a supreme court of jurisdiction should be sent out to India by the Crown, and that the country should be divided into three presidencies and made subject to a governor-general and council, the former of whom was to be approved by the king. The three presidencies were those of Bengal, the capital of which was Calcutta; the Bombay district, with that city as the capital; and Madras and the southern part of the peninsula the third, the headquarters at that city. Later on a viceroy is sent out by the home government to rule over India entire, whose residence is at Calcutta, the capital of the country. His term lasts for five years, when he is succeeded by another incumbent at home. In consideration of the unhealthiness of the country, and to repay the noble lords for that exile from their own green isle for half a decade, the very munificent sum of nearly £20,000, or $100,000, is annually paid them, which of course is drawn from the revenues of the country. The salaries of other English officers in the country are in similar munificent proportion, but India is found to be rich enough to pay the bills, though many millions of her sons and daughters are groveling in the most abject poverty.

The law-making power is a legislative council composed of the lieutenant-governor of Bengal, the commander-in-chief of the forces, the principal secretaries of the different departments of the government, the legal member of council, with certain leading European officials and gentlemen, with some of the native rajahs and officials, who are appointed and now elected by the people. The people have no voice in chosing the law-makers or any others of the officials of the country. The rule of the English here up to the present time has been a pure despotism. That this rule is not excusable to some extent at least, I will not attempt to dispute, though it would be gratifying to see the lords in power more solicitous to elevate and benefit the down-trodden masses, rather than to draw from the country such enormous salaries for the comparatively slight services performed. There is no question but what the English have done much to improve India in the way of the construction of railroads and telegraphs, encouraging agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, in facilitating education, and particularly in affording a stable government, but that she might also effect other great benfits for the country is also equally unquestionable.

The revenue of India amounts to nearly £60,000,000 sterling, annually, or $300,000,000. The expenditures, however, nearly equal the same heavy sum. Thus it will be seen that the country has to pay most handsomely for the privilege of being ruled over by such distinguished, noble, and able men as England sends out here, and all the people have to do is to bestir themselves and dig from the soil the vast sums which is required to meet these enormous salaries, and the numerous stipends paid to officers and soldiers for life who have served a stipulated time in the country.

The imports of merchadise into the country, which of course is nearly all from England, is estimated at £46,000,000, or $230,000,000; and the exports £60,000,000, or $300,000,000, annually. A dependency as rich as India was never possesssed by any country before.

A word should be said about the subordinate governments of the country, analogous perhaps, somewhat, to the state government in America. In addition to the three presidencies named, there are two other departments or divisions, to wit, the Central States, and the Northwest Provinces, including the Punjaub and the territory around and north of Delhi, thus making in all five departments or provinces, while each has a somewhat separate goverment, partially independent of and partially connected with the general goverment, each having a governor of its own, appointed, of course, by the home government; but just the precise nature of these governments I will not undertake to state, not having before me the necessary data for the purpose. Almost everything in the country, however, including railroads, canals, telegraphs, etc., is under government jurisdiction. It owns a large share of the land of the country, and nearly everything else in it. The government being despotic, is of course all-powerful.

THE ROCK TEMPLES OF INDIA.

One of the most interesting features of this country is its rock temples, mostly cut out of the solid rock, and beneath or partly beneath the earth's surface, while another portion is above ground. Feeling particularly anxious to visit some of these rock temples, I availed myself of the opportunity for doing so. The first one visited was the elaborate Elephanta Caves, on an island in the harbor of Bombay, and some six or eight miles from the Apollo-Bunder, where we took what is called a steam-launch—a small steamer—chartered for the purpose. As companions for the trip I had Dr. Dudley and three of his children, a native of the United States, but who, with his interesting family, is now making Bombay his home. I had the pleasure of making his acquaintance a few years ago, when he was home on a visit, and was most glad to meet himself and his very pleasant Boston wife away out here in this oriental world. I find them most genial and kind, and it does one good to meet with such friends on this reverse side of the globe. He is practicing medicine here, and I am glad to say is meeting with excellent success. Both the doctor and his wife are earnest Freethinkers, which, to my tastes, makes their society all the more interesting.

"Do you think," asked a college student of a professor of theology, "that the lion and the lamb hav ever yet lain down together?" "I don't know," answered the professor, "but if they hav, I hav no doubt that the lamb was missing from that date." Dickens said that when the lion and the lamb lay down together, the lamb would be inside.

We are sometimes so impressed by a fellow-man's estimate of his importance that we tremble at the mere suggestion of what might hav been if the Lord had forgotten to make him.

Letters from Friends.

OVOCA, IOWA, May 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is my "V," which, if it is too late to send the editor off, or yet bring him back, may still be in season to welcome him home. Please send the books to my address.

Yours truly, CLARA A. DEMING.

SALIDA, COL., May 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5, for which you will please send me Bennett's books of his travels. I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and an sure the books will suit me better than the Christian Bible. OTIS WHITE.

ASHLAND, April 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find a money order for five dollars, for which send the two or three volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," to A. D. Helman, Ashland, Oregon. Send mine bound in leather. I received the first volume all right, was much pleased with it, and I got you a subscriber for it. The reason I wanted mine bound in leather was, I think it will last longer, and I want them to last as long as possible, for I am bound to believe that D. M. Bennett's history around the world will do more good than all the histories that hav ever been written by man. I suppose by the time this reaches you he will be nearly home. That he will reach there safe and sound is the prayer of your humble servant, O. COOLEDGE.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: A friend of mine (Mr. Garwood, of Baltimore) tells me he has just been to see the Hackers, and that poor old Mrs. Hacker is actually sick from need of proper food! I hav appealed to you often in behalf of this old couple, and many of you hav kindly responded with needed help. But something more is required than spasmodic assistance. These old people are past helping themselvs, and we must do something that shall be permanent. Mr. Garwood kindly offers to receive and forward remittances, and convert postage stamps into money for Mr. Hacker's use, and proposes that fifty or one hundred of us Liberals shall donate 25 cents a month regularly, and send it to him.

Now I, for one, will do this, and I will to-day send in my first contribution. I am sure fifty readers of my pet paper can and will do as much. It is but little for us, but will make the old couple comfortable as long as they live. All donations will be acknowledged in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please begin at once, right now, and send the first month's instalment of 25 cents to C. Garwood, Box 878, Baltimore, Md.

It is not charity, but justice, that I ask for on behalf of this poor old couple, Hopefully, ELMINA.

OREGON, Mo.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Roberts's letter, with no address but "Yates City," speaks of Jeremiah Hacker, an Infidel worker of old time, being in want. Surely we ought to do as much for our own as the poor deluded zealots of hell-fire and the devil do for theirs. This old man has suffered in our cause. We can understand how he must hav been treated who dared to openly avow his admiration of the illustrious immortal Paine fifty years ago. Thirty-five years ago an Infidel came to Mt. Vernon, Ohio, lecturing. His arguments were calm, but conclusiv as geometrical demonstrations—albeit in manner and words free of offensivness. On the second night, after he was nearly through, a miserable, cross-roads pulpit pounder got up, and for fifteen minutes denounced him with hell-fire, depicting him on his death-bed howling like Tom Paine and Voliter (meaning Voltaire) for mercy. "Never was any man so completely used up," said almost everybody, "as is this cursed Atheist." A mob began to howl, stones and eggs were hurled. "I'm a Christian, by God," cried a great drunken bully, "and no man shall liv who talks of my savior as that man does." "Hurrah! Give him h—l, d—m the d——d Infidel." Next issue the papers spoke of how "the man's arguments were riddled by the Rev. Poundtext," all of which I saw, and part of which I was.

Let us hav Mr. Jeremiah Hacker's address, and let every Liberal contribute what he judiciously can, We ought to sustain one broken-down preacher of light if they can sustain hundreds and thousands of oracles of darkness. C. I.

[Jeremiah Hacker's address is Berlin, New Jersey. He needs help, and should hav it from the Liberals of the country. It is an argument of the churches, that Liberalism has no public benefits. In the matter of colleges, we can point with pride to Girard and James Lick's and other donations to science and education. We are going to hav an orphans' home at Liberal, Mo., and let us at least hav the case of Jeremiah Hacker to instance where the Liberals hav taken care of their poor.—Ed. T. S.]

HARWICH, MASS., May 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find within $1 for Jeremiah Hacker. I wish it were thousands instead of one. Years ago I took passage in the Portland Pleasure Boat, and partook from week to week of the precious viands of truth with which she was freighted with great profit to myself, and circulated it among others with more or less good results. I remember the captain used to keep some groceries for sale in small quantities to accommodate the poor who were not able to buy in any other than small quantities, and about that time, one autumn, I was skipper of a small fishing craft off the coast of Portland, and put into that place for a harbor. Being entirely out of flour, and not having the money to get a whole barrel, I bethought me of father Hacker's store, and forthwith made him a call, and found him "eating of the tree of knowledge"—an apple. There was much practical significance, thought I, in that act, for sedentary men, and a putting into practice what he in his paper had previously recommended as a diet instead of the flesh-pots of Egypt. Who wonders that his paper was stored so full of useful knowledge when its editor fed on such fruit as once grew on that famous tree in Adam's orchard? It happened, however, the captain had no flour on hand, but, in obedience to the promptings of his large bump of benevolence, he immediately offered to lend me cash enough to get a barrel if I would pay him in three weeks. I thanked him for his kindness, but declined, saying I would swap some mackerel for some flour. "Well, then," said he, "I will tell you where to go to get it." He then mentioned the house, number, and street, and said the men were men of honesty and principle. I called on them and told them who sent me, and was told if I would always do what Hacker told me I should do well. I got my flour and found it remarkably good, and I remember I wondered why I could not get as good flour in Harwich for the same price. The name of one of the firm was York; the other I hav forgotten.

I remember also reading in his paper an account of his disguising himself and attending a phrenological lecture, where he was put forward for examination, and was recommended to the audience as just the person with whom to deposit charitable gifts for distribution among the poor.

These things may be considered trivial, but they, with other evidences, portray the character of the man and show why he is now dependent upon his friend for aid. Had he been less unselfish he probably would hav been a man of means.

MR. EDITOR: My religion is humanity; the world, my church. My philanthropy, my principles, lead one to do something to help the laborer, the actual producers, out of the snare of the monopolists who consist of the government and the thing called religion, which are summed up in legislation of church organizations, cliques, rings, thieves who base all their operations on that one accursed word, belief. Belief, the catchword of all speculation, deception, trade, trespass, fraud, and rascality. All you hav to do is to appear sanctimonious, serious, and plausible enough to make your victims believe that you are honest and true. Then you hav them. Preach to them the scarecrow stories of that old book, the Bible, that no one knows when, where, or by whom, or for what purpose it was written, until you hav so frightened them that they will put their hands in their pockets and hand out enough to build up yonder gaudy edifices, with their tall steeples, filled with foolish people, dedicated to God, and protected from his wrath by a lightning-rod. Heathen idolatry, from beginning to end, so that the priests, the clergy, are nought but a set of gospel gamblers, either fools or knaves. If they are really honest, and believe what they preach, they are fools; if not, why, then, they are knaves; doubtless more knaves than fools. This hereditary transmission of ignorance is passed down from generation to generation, therefore the dulness of progress in all past ages, so, if one is satisfied with what they hav, whether the almighty dollar or ignorance, they will eternally remain where they are—in ignorance. All that is wanted in speculation, or enterprise, is to make your customers believe. Keep them in ignorance of what your designs are, and you are sure to accomplish what you wish.

In all our schools for education, particularly where the higher branches are taught, the disposition is to complicate, mystify, to put on the finishing touch, to make them experts in deception. Scoundrels, rascals, prepared to deceive and take advantage of the producing classes—to fit them for legislatures, to establish monopolies and rings; to enrich the few, and oppress the many; which makes the government and the church, politically and religiously, the worst gambling machine the world has ever known. Belief, belief, belief, the catch-word to promote all deception, all rascality. I hav seen for a long time that the attention of the masses needed to be called to an exposition of the facts. The vile and vicious monopolizers will never let up, never become honest enough to ease up, until the masses are informed of the facts sufficiently to rise in rebellion to their oppression,

Of the professions, such as doctors, ministers, lawyers, politicians, and the press are all united to carry out the gambling; as long as they can make the masses believe that they are needed to take care of them, so long will they rule and swindle the people. To inspire your customers with belief, supposition, confidence in what you tell them, the bargain is made, your object gained, your project sure, hence, followed up, your fortune is made.

Turn to your lexicographers, and you find the word belief is defined to mean the absence or want of knowledge, ignorance; and if the absence of knowledge, ignorance, does not make a fool, I do not know what will. Hence all reformers should cease to use that most pernicious of words. "Believe or be damned," but I say unto you if you believe you are already damned. Believe, or I will kill you, and if I do not believe you will kill me. Such has been the basis or the beginning of all wars, in the history of the whole world of the past. The word belief is, or ought to be, discarded in all courts of justice. No witness is ever allowed to go upon the stand and testify to what he believes, but what he knows of the case. As long as the church people can make the thing called government believe they ought not to be taxed, so long we, who are Liberals and reformers, are compelled to support the churches whether we wish to or not. For my part I am sick of it, and propose to rebel, and seek for justice and peace if I hav to fight for it. I choose the true weapons of love if by them I can gain my ends.

N. H. DILLINGHAM, M.D.

CHENEY, W. T., April 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: While stopping in the town of Sprague a few days, I visited many of the leading men, and finding an element that, if rightly managed, will prove a success, I purchased a lot, and offered to deed it to the town of Sprague for the purpose of erecting a Liberal church. After making the proposition I was offered other lots for the same purpose. I would hav addressed the people there on the issue, but there is not a hall in the place. The town is growing fast. The N. P. railroad shops are a great help. The country is as yet sparsely inhabited, and sectarianism is not yet the ruling power. There will be a meeting held to consider the subject as soon as arrangements can be made. What I want to know is if we can expect any help from the old Empire state.

B. F. WARDWELL, Box 165.

SALESVILLE, MON., April 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Since the publication of my letter in your issue of March 25th, I hav received many letters from Liberals in various parts of the country, asking about Montana. For their benefit I hope you will publish this letter.

It seems that railroad monopolists are publishing this country, of course for their interests, and are no doubt coloring the picture. The circular, therefore, should be received with many doubts. Another fact to be remembered is that distance lends charms to the scene. Many will come here to be disappointed. Some will expect to find money growing on the sage bush. There are untold millions of the precious metal hid away in the grand old mountains, but it takes work to get it out. This bunch grass will furnish food for thousands of stock that will bring money. This virgin soil will yield beautiful crops of grain, and clear, cold, never-failing streams are not wanting to turn the spindles of manufacture, but then all take work and money. This far-off mountain country is now being penetrated with one of the great trans-continental railroads, the Northern Pacific, which is being rapidly pushed to completion. It has already built a branch railroad from Oden to Butte, the great Leadville of Montana. These roads are giving life and activity to all kinds of business. These will bring thousands of people here, many with scarcely money enough to get here, and the demand for laborers that now exists may be overdone. Wages are now higher than last year, and as far as I know, higher than anywhere in the states. Farm hands get from $35 to $50 a month, and are scarce at that. Girls receive for doing housework from $25 to $40 a month. By the way, women are scarce here, there being at least five times as many men as women. We are greatly in need of ten thousand or more good, virtuous, young women, for wives for bachelors. It seems, however, that wages for labor keep up, notwithstanding the numbers who come. I think all who come for the next two years can get work. The railroads will be completed by that time. Those who hav money to set up for themselvs can find no better field than this. There are thousands of acres of fine land to be had simply for the taking of them. There is plenty or water running back to the ocean to irrigate the land with. There is an abundance of good pine timber on the mountains, free to all. Our great mining camps giv us a sure market. Stock of all kinds do liv the year around. On the range some die, but the loss will not exceed ten per cent, and that is cheaper than to feed over in Kansas. We hav to irrigate, but that is no detriment. We can grow twice as much per acre as any state or country where it rains. We hav sprouted grain in harvest time here. Our grain is the very best, and I believe the census shows the average yield of oats and wheat is the highest in Montana. Our society is fully as good as anywhere in the states.

We hav a good system of free public schools, and one that does not allow the Bible to be used in the schools. We are not cursed with any Christian Sunday law. We can work or play, dance or pray, and no Comstock can hav us arrested. That is, we hav no statute making it penal to work on Sunday. Under the rule of the common law some good Christian judge might fine us. There are more outspoken Liberals here than church-members. No one need be afraid to say he is a Liberal here; our foremost and best citizens are outspoken Infidels. We hold the trumps, and mean to use them, too.

The climate of Montana is much milder than in the states east of here in the same latitude. Gallatin Valley is nearly five thousand feet above the sea, and in latitude 46, and her winters are milder than in Iowa. From April to October we hav continual spring; never hot; temperature ranging from eighty degrees down to fifty; nights cool; want to wear flannel clothes, and sleep under blankets at night; but few insects, scarcely any snakes, and none that are dangerous. There is no danger of Indians; you can settle anywhere with perfect safety.

Now, any one who has the will to work we will welcome to Montana, and he who can't make a living here would starve in Paradise, and ought to.

W. J. Stover.

New River, Tenn., April 16, 1882.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed $15.00, and accept my thanks to our dear friend and Liberal, Mr. Bennett, for continuing to send his paper so long without pay. The people here are at least one hundred years behind the times. You see no improvements. Everything here has a neglected look; no school or church, but plenty of preaching, and lots of ignorance, so it is easy for the people to believe what their divine tells them. An old darky, who works for us, the other day remarked to my husband: "Mr. F., I does like to work round such Christian gentlemen as you are. I don't heah no swearin' or cursin' round heah like I does up round the depot or saloon. I ain't zacly a preacher, but lean mighty that way. I think that the industry, prosperity, and moral element in the North, is largely due to the Christian church, don't you? Mr. F., what church do you belong to?" But we do not agree with him. I think it is owing to the broad, level acres, good soil and climate, and railroads, with the natural energy and industry of the people; but the church claims all the credit. I think if one-half the money that is in church property could be used to teach the masses truth and reason, it would be a good thing. My father likes your paper, and thinks it just O.K., and he is liked by all who know him in spite of his Liberal views. The people are beginning to see that one can liv a good, honorable life without religion. Yours for truth,

Mrs. Ferrell.

SCIENCE BAFFLED, BUT NOT SPIRITUALISTS.

West Farmington, Ohio.

Mr. Editor: Please allow me a short space in reply to my good brother Putnam's last, then I am through. What I mean by science being baffled is simply this: The tiny rap, the moving of tables, etc., are well-known phenomena admitted by skeptics to take place; yet science has been unable to account for the same upon any other hypothesis except that claimed by Spiritualists; hence, science is baffled so far as the skeptic is concerned. What is science to one, is not always science to another. Spiritualism is a science to me, but not to brother Putnam. Science is but a fact demonstrated. Immortality has been demonstrated to me; therefore, is to me a scientific fact. Brother Putnam says: "What I deny as proved is the existence of this subtler physical body," etc.; and, he says, "has not been demonstrated." If brother Putnam had added the words, "to me," after demonstrated, it would hav left him on a sound basis; but, I insist, he asserted what he had no right to assert, and what he can in no wise prove. I asked friend Putnam to prove that there is not such a Spiritual body. If brother Putnam simply denied my assertion, then I would hav no right to ask him to prove a denial, but he affirmed that there was no evidence of a finer body, and that immortality has not been demonstrated, that it is a matter of faith. Here are positive affirmations, and I insist that he should prove his assertions. I say it has been demonstrated to me; but brother Putnam makes the sweeping assertion that it has not been demonstrated. Now, brother Putnam, giv us the proof. I sincerely hope that our matter-of-fact Materialistic friends will learn to cease making such broad assertions, because it places them in an awkward position. What! tell me and many other Spiritualists that we hav no evidence of immortality! I am quite at a loss to know how our orthodox and Materialistic friends can know what we hav had, or hav not had. If they would say it has not been demonstrated to them, I should not object; but I am tired of their telling me that I don't know what I know I do know; and what I know, I know as well as anybody.

A. Allen Noe.

Manchester, Iowa, May 4, 1882.

Mr. Editor: There is a time for sowing seeds and a time to harvesting the results. There is a time for them to sprout, to bud, to bloom, and bring forth delicious fruit. In the years gone by the advocates of science, of education, and progress hav been busy casting the seeds of truth; slowly and surely hav they grown, until, at last, as a result of their labors, we see the blooming fields and trees of intellectual progress, and in a short time will reap the sheaves of truth and eat the fruit of joy.

Priests hav ever done all in their power to stay the real progress of the world, but they hav failed to check its slow but mighty stride. What a priest says now has but little effect, and the seeker after truth considers him of no importance. A priest is what has been; they lived in an era that has passed, and there is no hope of their ever retrieving their lost power and prestige.

School-houses and teachers are becoming far more numerous than churches and preachers. The people are learning to appreciate a good thing. The average of people nowadays will donate far more liberally to build a school-house than a church, and will giv a teacher a larger salary than they would a preacher. A teacher is a necessity, while a preacher they hav no use for, and people can easily get along without them.

People are fast learning who to respect and appreciate now. A man who is honest, kind, and liberal, and who expresses his honest thoughts, is considered equally as good as a priest. A man with a wife and children, who treats them kind and loving, is considered equally as good, and as useful to the world, as a priest who practices celibacy, and who looks upon a woman as a disgrace, and a child that has not had water sprinkled on its head as fit for damnation. A mother with loving children is considered equally as good as a nun. In fact the men and women who liv for this world, and try to make life a joy, are considered equally as good, in the eyes of all intelligent people, as those who treat this world only as a stopping place to get ready for the next. The men and women who liv only for this world are fast superseding those who are sojourners here for the next. Liberty is taking the place of slavery, and the more liberty, the more intelligence; and the more liberty and intelligence, the more truth; and the more truth, the less falsehood and superstition; and the less falsehood and superstition, the more humanity, liberty, and happiness.

Infidels are increasing rapidly every day. To be an Infidel now, is to be regarded as a man of intelligence and of progressiv ideas, to what it used to be.

I think, Mr. Editor, the prospects for the years to come will prove gloriously rich for the cause of Liberalism, looking from my limited horizon. I feel a warm pride and interest for the cause; I wish I could do a great deal for it, if I had the means; as it is, I must be content to do what I can, in my humble way, by circulating my books, pamphlets, and papers among those with whom I think they will hav an influence. Every Liberal should do this; every Liberal should take an activ part, to the best of his or her means and ability, to spread the light of truth, and advance the cause of Liberalism.

All can do some good; we can set a good example; we can do a good deed; we can speak a kind word to all; we can say a good word in defense of the cause, and, all together, it will do much good. We can all help check and destroy a lie, and assert a truth in its stead, and we can all be brave enough to do it any place where duty demands, at all times; and, by so doing, we will help raise the standard of Liberalism gloriously and grandly over the stained and polluted banner of the church.

Yours truly, E. Ingersoll.

Milwaukee, Wis., May 5, 1882.

Mr. Editor: The notorious liar, Anthony Comstock, delivered his stale discourse on the suppression of vice question in the opera house here last night. He was accompanied to the platform by four of the most insignificant ministers Milwaukee could produce. Of course, the first thing was prayer by one of the divines. Then Anthony was introduced to a small audience, consisting mostly of Christians. A few Liberals were present, mostly through curiosity, to see what kind of a looking face the vile wretch is possessed of. The lecture consisted mostly of abusiv lying about men that are as far above him as the heavens are above the earth. He bragged considerably about the noble work he pretends to hav done in suppressing vice. He said he had confiscated twenty-four tons of obscene matter. Is there a shadow of truth in that statement? I wonder what scales he weighed his obscene matter on; the unbalanced scales of theology, I guess. He spoke in very strong terms of the opposition he was receiving from the Liberal League of Philadelphia. He considers R. G. Ingersoll at the head of the opposition to his noble work. He calls Ingersoll the fifty-cent blasphemer; he is jealous because he cant't get fifty cents for blaspheming Ingersoll. He spoke in a most contemptible way of the Spiritualists—the long-haired men and the short-haired women, as he called them; but they can stand it. Anthony thinks Wisconsin is behind the times; he will find it is not far enough behind to be duped by Anthony Comstock. His vile works are pretty well known to Wisconsin. We hav Liberal men, and men with brains, in our legislature, who are not going to sit down and let Comstock's bills be rushed through the legislature, in the manner they tried to get one of their suppression of vice bills rushed through just before the closing of the session this spring. Anthony had better confine his work to Delaware, or some of the states that are not behind the times.

After Mr. Comstock had finished his discourse, he was introduced to a few of our citizens, among them Robert C. Spencer, the head of the Spencerian College, and a Liberal. Mr. Spencer and Comstock had some lively talk, in which the names of Bennett and Ingersoll were freely used. We hope Mr. Spencer did not forget to giv the devil his just due.

Yours for truth, Wm. F. Hislop.

Pipestone, Minn., April 14, 1882.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed $6 to pay for The Truth Seeker. I thank you for your kindness in sending it after my time ran out, and wish to add my testimony in praise of the fearless, outspoken Truth Seeker, and a heartfelt wish for the safe return to friends and home of our absent brother. My curse—my lasting, life-long curse—on that foul carrion, the church and Comstock.

Job Whitehead.

Dallas, Ark., April, 23, 106.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed fifty cents for The Truth Seeker for three months; I am well pleased with it. It advocates the ideas of my youth, and facts, as I find them to be, when weighed on the scales of reason and common sense. Having suffered through life with mental imprisonment, and being desirous of liberty, I feel inclined to come to the front and let my light shine, regardless of all the scorn and indignation that may be heaped upon me. My situation forbids my doing much this summer, but by next winter I will try what virtue there is in truth. I am so determined on the elevation and ennobling of the human family that I could not bear the idea of a superstitious woman becoming the mother of my offspring. In this lies the great secret of heredity. If we be wounded in the brain before birth, we cannot reasonably expect to outliv it, with the surroundings that we hav to contend with.

G. M. Calvert.

Leadville, Col., April 26, 1882.

Mr. Editor: I am very much pleased with the first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," which I received on my return from Pueblo. The book greatly exceeds all expectation, and I cannot comprehend how Mr. Bennett could write a book with so much information in so short a space of time. I wish Bro. Bennett good health and a long life, and hope to see him some time. My regards to all the truth seekers, and I remain sincerely one of them,

Franz B. Woelke.

Lanark, Kan., April 24, 1882.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed you will find a two-dollar William (the last one in Bradley county, I think), for which you will continue my Bible, The Truth Seeker. After reading the history of that pile of rocks known as the Promised Land from the time I was seven years old, and reading accounts of different travelers up to the present time, you hav given us more honest Indian on the subject than all put together. Such hard times, such distressing times, hav never been known in this country, and the history of the overflow in the Mississippi valley you are acquainted with. I liv only about forty miles from there. Numbers of people here can hardly get bread to eat. Nothing more at present. I remain one of your greatest admirers, T. H. Montgomery.

A little fellow who knew Mother Goose better than he knew his Bible was asked in his class, "Who were thrown into the fiery furnace?" This was too much for him. The question was passed. The answer came promptly, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego." This was a mortification to the little fellow, and when the next question came, "Who put them in?" he answered with a jump, "Little Jonnie Green."

A parson was asked to read the following notice: "A man having gone to sea, his wife desires the prayers of the church." Unheeding the punctuation, the white-chokered sky-pilot gravely told the congregation that "a man having gone to see his wife, desires the prayers of the church."

During a lesson on the life of King David, a class of girls was asked, "Who killed the giant?" whereupon one replied, "Jack."

Balaam.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

A strange event once came to pass;
While Balaam rode upon an ass,
The ass got scared to death, almost,
At meeting on the way a ghost.

Out of the road she made a bound,
And her old master jerked around;
He pounded her to turn her back,
But still she would not keep the track.

In fact, she would not go at all,
But jammed his foot against a wall;
Then slap upon the ground she fell,
This made old Balaam mad as h—l.

And he began the ass to smite—
He thrashed the beast with all his might;
Then, strange to tell, the ass began
To talk and reason like a man.

Few are the wonders this surpasses;
Though men may sometimes talk like asses,
Yet no one, since the world began,
Ere heard an ass that spake like man,

Balaam was not surprised the least.
But talked an argued with the beast;
His rage was such, he wished, he said,
He had a sword to kill her dead.

Then suddenly it came to pass,
He saw the ghost that scared the ass;
A fighting ghost we understand,
For a bright sword was in his hand.

Old Balaam had just wished for one
To slay the ass he rode upon;
It can be seen at the first glance,
To borrow one, this was his chance.

'Tis queer he never thought of that;
Instead, he on his face fell flat;
Now man and beast were on a level,
God's agent did it, not the devil.

Then to this prostrate congregation
This ghostly parson preached salvation;
He held aloft a threatening sword,
And ordered them to serve the Lord.

'Tis likely when the ghost departed
His converts were quite brokenhearted,
And, weeping, sang the sad refrain:
"Oh, when shall we three meet again?"

A Letter from London.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The various religious sects in this country are making frantic efforts to regain their former power over the minds of the masses, and one of the latest moves has been amongst the Roman Catholics. What they are pleased to term a "holy war" has been carried on in South Wales just lately, and the mission was closed last week in a good old-fashioned way by a priest known as Father O'Hare. It appears that two families amongst the Irish in Cardiff preferred remaining in an unregenerate state, and refused to giv any evidence of repentance, so it was decided that the "curse of God" should be pronounced upon them. So the priest adorned himself with his cassock and a crucifix, and accompanied by two acolytes and a bodyguard of believers, marched around the town, cursing these two hardened families and blessing the believers. I hav not heard that the curse has begun to work yet. However, if it did not hurt those outcasts from the flock, it frightened others, and so I suppose the desired end was gained. It brought 2,000 persons to perform the act of cannibalism called "holy communion" in the space of four days, and as each would hav to giv something toward the funds, the business must hav paid very well. The members of the league hav to wear a small cross, giv up all intoxicating drinks, and pray day and night for the success of the "war." I do not fancy this will last very long, and when the excitement is over the usual effects will follow. If it were not pitiable that there are so many poor, ignorant people ready to believe that any evil result could come from being cursed by a priest, the whole affair would be most ludicrous. It is really sad to find the most degrading superstitions still so powerful, and Freethinkers hav much up-hill work to go through, for many years to come, in emancipating the people from such hideous bonds.

The Salvation Army is still going ahead, and the boss of the show, "General" Booth, has all the plunder handed over to him, and as he givs no account of his expenditures, he must be making a big pile. No doubt when it is as large as he wants it, he will hav a call to some other sphere of labor across the sea.

The Rev. Dr. McCann, who debated with Mr. Charles Bradlaugh a short time back, finding that his arguments did not convert any of the Freethinkers who heard him, is going to get at them in another way. He has started a weekly paper with the modest title of The Champion of the Faith Against Current Infidelity. In his opening address he informs his readers that his aim is high, and could not well be higher, being to help those who are seeking for truth to find it. His method is also high; he claims to be considered honest in his own convictions, and the same claim shall be yielded, as far as possible, to those who hav different convictions. I greatly admire that clause, "as far as possible;" we well know what that means. He intends, week by week, giving replies to the Infidel statements of the Infidel papers of preceding weeks, when there are any which call for reply—another sweet little saving clause. Of course, all the hard nuts that he cannot crack by any means, will be considered as statements not calling for reply, and will be quietly ignored. How childlike and bland some of these pious folks are; it is quite refreshing to meet with so much innocence now-a-days. The editor claims courtesy for himself, and promises to giv the same to his opponents, and he disclaims all personalities. To show he intends to keep strictly to this, one of his articles is headed "Secular Desperadoes," in which the writer abuses some of the more prominent Freethinkers, mentioning them by name. One ingenious gentleman on his staff is going to put all the scientists right, and commences by attacking the geologists, who he shows, at all events to his own satisfaction, are all wrong, unless they agree with our old friend Moses.

The reverend doctor does not intend by any means to hide his light under a bushel, feeble though it may be, for he is not going to confine himself to putting Infidels in their proper place, but he is also going to show the orthodox party where it is wrong. A column is to be devoted to showing the true meanings of "misrepresented texts," and everybody will be enlightened all around.

The missionary societies here are very much distressed because the mikado of Japan will not adopt the religion they want to introduce, and he is being prayed for pretty considerably. It remains to be seen whether the prayers of the faithful will induce their God to soften his hard heart, though as Japan is out of his jurisdiction I fear their efforts will be futil.

The Rev. Mr. Baxter, the only genuin prophet of modern times, and the sole individual who understands how to work Daniel's numbers correctly and giv the right names to his very remarkable beasts, has found out a slight mistake in his calculations, and it seems the world was not to be destroyed last year after all, but the catastrophes are to come off some time this century, probably about 1890, so we hav some eight years or so to think over the matter and repent us of our unbelief.

The tithe question is again coming to the front, and husbandmen cannot quite see what advantage they derive from handing over to the parsons so much money. Curiously enough the clergy cannot at all understand why they should reduce their demands; they prefer sticking out for hard cash, being afraid to trust to the Lord to support them. They are certainly wise in believing that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, though not quite honest. J. S. D.

Shall the Chinese Go?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Judging by the tone of the Eastern press, I apprehend the Chinese question is entirely misunderstood, and having been in this state since 1850, and having employed Chinese labor somewhat in that time, and being pretty familiar with the subject, I thought I would send you a few items.

Probably there never was a system of labor so unique and convenient for capitalists and monopolists as the Chinese system. The Six Chinese Companies in San Francisco controls all the Chinamen in the state, and wherever a camp is located one Chinamen acts as agent, and if a person wants to hire one or a thousand men, all he has to do is to call on the "boss" and order so many men; and, the price and security for pay being satisfactory, the men are placed at your disposal, and you need hav no trouble with the men whatever; there will be a head man in the gang, who will receive their pay, when due, and if any of the number do not suit, he will send him away and get another in his place. The Chinamen board themselvs, and do their own cooking—except house servants.

To show how impossible it is for Americans to compete with Chinamen, I will relate a little of my experience. Some years ago there was competition between rival Chinese companies, and at the time they were preparing to build the road between the landing and the town of San Luis Obispo. I had fifteen Chinamen employed clearing land, and the "boss" of my band told me if I would secure the contract for supplying men to grade the road, at one dollar a day per man, his company would pay to me one dollar per month for every man who worked, whether fifty, or five hundred, or more, and guarantee all good, sound men. I called on the agent and put in my bid. I did not get the contract, and the agent told me afterward they accepted a better offer at headquarters. Now, I think I hav said enough to convince sensible men, that however well the Chinese system of labor may suit monopolists, both of this and the invisible theologic world, it is not exactly adapted to the American idea of democratic republicanism, and I do not believe the Liberals can compete with minions of superstition in toadying to the great monopolists.

If Arthur, by the grace of God and Guiteau, President of the United States, has turned this country over to his imperial highness of Pekin, as would seem by his returning a bill to Congress with the Chinese minister's objections, it appears to me it should be the duty of Congress to investigate the matter, and inform the people if the president alone, by imperial ukase, has the right and power to constitute this republic a province of a foreign state?

I do not think it possible to abolish the Chinese system of slavery, as they will not come into our courts, except when dragged in as criminals. There is no probability that they will ever strike for liberty, or would accept it if offered; and as the supply of men in China is practically inexhaustible, you will see, if President Arthur's arrangement is carried out to its legitimate results, it will require but a few decades to completely Chinaize this country.

Yours truly, FRED ROBINSON.

Elmina Abroad and Still at Home.

DEAR FRIENDS: It seems long since I wrote you last. Since then I hav seen many of our brave Liberal spirits in New York, among whom are Mrs. Burnz, the publisher and editor of our "Liberal Hymn-Book." And right here let me recommend every Liberal who does not own this little book to send at once to THE TRUTH SEEKER for a copy of it. It is only twenty-five cents, and no Liberal should be without it. Mrs. Burnz is a grand, good woman, and her work for humanity should be far better appreciated than it is, and it would be if you could all know her as well as I do. Then I saw the bold, brave Theron C. Leland, a handsome man in the true sense of the word, intelligent, kind, and earnest in good works. Asa K. Butts came to his office while I was there, so I saw him too. I called on good Dr. Foote at his home, and no one in all New York greeted me more kindly or took more pains to entertain me than he and his son, E. B. Foote, Jr. I brought away pleasant memories of the doctor's pleasant home, and feel more than ever impressed with his grand work for the Liberal cause and his steady, patient, and persistent labors therefor.

But all these good friends I hav left behind me now, and am quietly sitting in mother's pleasant, cosy room in Pleasant Valley, in the old county of Dutchess, where I was born and brought up in the simple, kindly Quaker faith, which still hath charms for me though I hav long outgrown its theological features. But the friendliness and good feeling of Quakerism will always remain a part of my nature. It is my first visit home since the war, and in all these years since I hav lived way down in Dixie, and never seen mother, brother, or sister, or any of the friends and relativs of my girlhood; and it seems almost like getting acquainted over again, for, though white-winged messengers hav weekly flown between here and my Snowville home, yet not until we met again could I realize all that lay between or the changes time had wrought in us all.

A dear friend sends me the following lines which are so appropriate to the occasion that I append them, knowing they will touch every heart with the same kindred spell they wrought for me:

CHILDHOOD'S HOME.

Tune—My Own Dear Sabbath Home

Sweet childhood's home, "more dear to me
Than fairest palace dome,
My heart e'er turns with joy to thee,
My own dear," childhood's home.

CHORUS—Childhood's home, blessed home,
Childhood's happy home!
My heart e'er turns with joy to thee,
My own dear childhood's home.

Here first my trembling, tottering feet
The way to walk were shown;
Here first I learned to love and speak
In this dear childhood's home.

CHORUS—Childhood's home, etc.

Here mother stood with loving voice,
And accents ever mild,
To show the way to every right
And lead therein her child.

CHORUS—Childhood's home, etc.

I saw my father homeward come
When his day's toils were o'er;
He helped to make for childhood's home
The smiles in memory's store.

CHORUS—Childhood's home, etc.

And now, when long, long years hav flown,
I feel its influence still;
Each nook and flower of childhood's home
Will fondest memory thrill.

CHORUS—Childhood's home, blessed home,
My own dear childhood's home!
The freest joys I've ever known
Were found in childhood's home.

The Pittsburgh Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 29th speaks of the commanding position of the Pittsburgh Liberal League. It has driven the clergy to get up lectures to defend the church against the consequences of free inquiry. Some of the clergy hav accepted the invitation of the League to address them at their meetings, and hav been surprised to find that the Leaguers understand the subject of religion better than they themselvs do. As far as influence in awakening public attention goes, the League has evinced more power than all the churches combined; for while no one ever dreams of alluding to the holy rigmarole of the pulpit, on Monday mornings many are desirous of hearing what was said yesterday at the League This verifies the fine argument of T. C. Leland, the secretary of the national institution, that there is power in organization. The League meet in no untaxed house, with cushioned seats, with a choir of fine musicians, and a salaried expounder and defender of their opinions. They hire a hall in the third story of a building, and hav no music to lure the people to come to their lectures. Nothing but the deep conviction that their opinions are correct, and their desire to hav their fellow-citizens enlightened upon them, lead them to pay the expenses they incur in holding their meetings. Yet this comparativ handful of people, by virtue of being an organized body, attract the attention of the public, and wield an influence for good.

The sole support of the churches in perpetuating their old dominion over the minds of the people, consists in their organization, their music, and their wealth. Not one of their doctrins, so antagonistic to each other, can bear candid investigation, and no intelligent people hungry for knowledge would be found at their meetings were they not drawn there by music, or driven there by the four fears—the fear of death, the fear of hell, the fear of the devil, and the fear of God. If the Freethinkers of this country were organized, had halls for lectures, music, and other intellectual and artistic enjoyments, such as they hav in some parts of the country, especially in Michigan, they would conquer the church and take possession of the confidence of the people in twenty years. Methodism, a hundred years ago, began its career in this country by organizing churches if there could be found half a dozen in a neighborhood, forming a "circuit," and sending a preacher once a week, or once a month, to preach to them and keep them in heart. The preachers in most cases were very illiterate men, but manipulating the four fears alluded to above with zeal and steatorian voice, they went on increasing in numbers and power till the church has extended all over the country. Now, we hav at least a hundred lecturers among the Freethinkers, who are men of education, men of logical minds, and men of zeal. We hav more than two hundred Leagues. Divide them into "circuits" as the Methodists did, and assign a lecturer to each circuit, who shall visit each League statedly. Enlist the women, and hav music at the meetings. Let every Freethinker regularly contribute his money to a common fund to keep the wheels of such machinery oiled, and after five years count noses. The public attention has been excited, and the experience of Mr. Green and other lecturers in the west shows that it is not difficult to get audiences who wish to hear the church claims fairly examined. It is not right to ask a man of abilities to devote himself to the missionary work of lecturing and not pay him for his services. See how willing the people are to pay Ingersoll for his most radical lectures. But he makes them pay. We hav other men in our ranks who understand the subject of discussion as well as Ingersoll does. And armed with the same weapons of facts and arguments which he uses, and having the ears of the people which are now open, all our lecturers ought to be at work, and ought to be well paid, too.

A slight family jar has taken place in Pittsburg which, unless quashed for "the peace and welfare of our beloved Zion," may end in something serious. The case is this: The Rev. E. R. Donehoo is a minister and pastor of one of the numerous Presbyterian churches in this city. He seems to be a man of some pluck and independence of spirit. I suspect that he did not receive his theological education as a beneficiary, as so many of the clergy do. It is this charity education that emasculates the clergy and makes them mere eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. The courage evinced by Mr. Donehoo in rebuking church sins makes me think that if he ever were a charity student he has paid back the debt he owed the church in money, and not servility. Well, he is a kind of chaplain to the jail, and consequently learns much of the vices and crimes of society by his reformatory attempts upon prisoners. In the Pittsburg Dispatch of April 28th he charges the Methodist Christian Advocate with advertising in its columns the sale of drugs for the purpose of producing abortions. No doubt can be entertained of the truth of the charge: and no one knows how many matrons and maids, who forget they are not married, believing in the false doctrin that the fetus is not a living being till the fifth month when it "quickens," or the ninth month when it is born, buys these murderous drugs advertised in their religious family paper, supposing that the use of them is not wrong, or they would not be advertised in such a journal. Religious newspapers are read almost exclusivly by church people, and when they advertise abortion nostrums it proves that such expedients are used in the church, and of course are not considered wrong. Mr. Donehoo, no doubt, in his philanthropic labors among criminal men and women, finds instances of the bad effect of these pious advertisments of abortion medicins, and so charged it upon the Christian Advocate. The Advocate blushes and squirms like an eel with a fork through its head, but has to confess tacitly, but not openly and honestly, that the temptation of the pay was too much for its piety and decency.

Pittsburgh, April 30, 1882. DAVID JONES.

Col. Kelso's Book.

This last bomb-shell into the orthodox camp does much to explode the myths of all gods and devils, and shows hell to be a bottomless pit through which damned souls are ever escaping from the other side. The first part, of six lectures, completely analyzes the universal conception of a deity from the fetich of the savage to the more abstract idea of God in modern times among enlightened nations. It shows the colonel to be well versed in the scriptures, and that he has read them through the highest faculty of the mind—enlightened reason.

In his preface he says: "From his fifteenth to his twenty-fifth year his young life was robbed of every ray of hope and of gladness, and nothing but a physical constitution of wonderful power kept him from sinking into an untimely grave;" that he had written this book to save others from the pain and horror of such false teachings.

The second part is in verse, flowing as easily and rapidly as a mountain rill, carrying the pure waters of truth through the filth of Bible narrativ and the valley of dry bones of orthodox faith and credulity. A few of his delineations, full of quaint humor, some may consider too plainly told; yet these stories are given in far better language than is found in the Bible. He has made a much better defense of the devil from this ancient record, than he could find in it of justification for the acts of the Jewish God.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attacks the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin. L. HUTCHISON.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

HISTORY

OF THE

CHRISTIAN RELICION

TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

This work has received the indorsement of the Society of Critical Historical Theology of Zurich, Switzerland. The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religion Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Urprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupfferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

A Short History of the Bible.

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible, should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentive and motive, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the hygiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, cured thoroughly and permanently cured by an which is the Doctor's latest and greatest discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, added by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Gems of Thought.

ATHEISM "logically denies" no moral precept, no real good, no pure, high, and noble principle, and nothing that is instructiv, good, and useful. It builds up hope. happiness, love, and industry here on earth and leaves the unknowable for priests and dogmatists to dispute over.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

DR. SPRENGER was asked by a Mussulman how he (Dr. Sprenger) could disbelieve the religion of Islam, "seeing that Mohammed's name was written on the gates of Paradise." In a less palpable form, the same mode of reasoning is constantly adopted among ourselvs. Either we do not take the trouble to submit the evidence of the facts upon which we create our arguments to a sufficiently rigorous scrutiny, or we fail to perceive that the axioms we take for granted are in reality neither self-evident as our system requires, nor capable of any satisfactory demonstration.—Amberley's Analysis

THE worst religion has its truth; the best religion has its error.—Anon.

A CANDLE, though its light bears no proportion to the light of the sun, yet it resembles it, nevertheless, in giving light, whereas darkness is contrary to both.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

WHEN by night the frogs are croaking, kindle but a torch's fire,
Hal how soon they all are silent! Thus truth silences the liar. —Longfellow.

IT seems a very hopeless thing, nowadays, to try to hold any minds by the mere bonds of authority. The intellectual air all around is too astir for this. There is no system of mental seclusion can well shut out the young from opinions the most opposit to those to which they hav been accustomed. The old safeguards, which were wont to inclose the religious life, as with a sacred charm, no longer do so. Even those who rest within the shade of authority do so, in many cases, from choice rather than from habit. They know not what else to do. They hav gone in quest of truth, and hav not found it; and so they hav been glad to throw themselvs into arms which profess an infallible shelter, and seek repose there. This is not remedy for doubt, but despair of reason. And no good can come in this way.—Principal Tulloch's How to Succeed in Life.

THERE is nothing more unreasonable than for men to liv viciously and yet hope to escape the necessary consequences of their vices.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

WE hear much said in recent days about the irreligious tendencies of people as manifested in the multitudes who do not go to any church; and the prospect is in some respects bad. Yet, to my mind, there is a thousandfold more ground for solicitude concerning the moral and spiritual welfare of society in the fact that there are so many habitual church-goers who are no more religious in their character and lives than if they had no contact whatever with religious institutions, and to whom religious habits hav only become a convenient cloak, not only to cover the want of real moral and spiritual earnestness, but to conceal decently from the public eye positiv moral deformity and rottenness. To such an extent does the insincerity prevail, that it is a wonder the maskers, as they meet in their Sunday pilgrimages to their respectiv churches, do not peep out from under their masks to laugh at each other's attempt at pious deceit.—W. J. Potter.

THERE is a wide difference between truthfulness and mere veracity. Veracity implies a correspondence between words and thoughts; truthfulness, a correspondence between thoughts and realities. To be veracious, it is only necessary that a man giv utterance to his convictions; to be true, it is necessary that his convictions hav affinity with fact.—Fred W. Robertson.

FREETHINKERS are not free from thought, but free in it. Whatever they believe or don't believe, they hav no animosity against facts, duties, natural obligations, or anything which binds human society together in one harmonious whole. They cheerfully accord to the great body of Christians the credit of being far better than their creeds or theological dogmas. And when the churches, as such, insist on having their property taxed equally with all other property, they will accord them such credit for sincerity as is at present impossible —Elizur Wright.

I DO not believe that all parts of the sixty-six books of the Bible are equally inspired or of equal authority and value, nor do I believe that all the books of the Old Testament are critically infallible. —Dr. Thomas, of Chicago.

AMONG the Ibos, a negro tribe, it is the custom for women, six weeks after child-birth, to present a pair of hens as an offering, which, however, are not killed, but liberated, after certain ceremonies. In like manner, the Hebrew woman, after her delivery, was enjoined to bring a lamb and a pigeon or turtle dove; or, if she were unable to bring the lamb, two young pigeons or two turtle doves (Lev. xii, 6-8).—Amberley's Analysis.

A MAN'S regard to his own interest and advantage is, then, only faulty when it is a temptation to him to do anything that is in its own nature evil, not when it is in conjunction with the universal right and reason of things and the happiness of God's whole creation.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

THERE is a long twilight between the time when a god is first suspected to be an idol and his final overthrow.—Froude's Cæsar.

NOBODY will be at such an open defiance with common sense as to profess that we should not endeavor to know, and to think of, things as they are in themselvs; and yet there is nothing more frequent than to do the contrary: and men are apt to excuse themselvs, and think that they hav reason to do so, if they hav but a pretense that is for God or a good cause, that is, in effect, for themselvs, their own persuasion, or party; for to these, in their turns, the several sects of men, especially in matters of religion, entitle God and a good cause. —Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

Odds and Ends.

THEY hav got a new "True Messiah" in Egypt and we guess he is genuin, for he is shedding about as much blood as the old timers hav in that line —The Judge.

A BURGLAR entered a house the other night, and scared a lady so badly that her hair, which was lying in an exposed place on the bureau, turned white in a single night.

"WHAT is the moon good for?" asked Prof Miller; "what are its principal uses to us?" And the smart bad boy looked up from the class and said, "To rest the gas company."

SCHOOLMARMS IN IDAHO.

When he had finished with the climate, soil, and productions of Idaho, one of the group asked:

"How about education facilities?"

"That's the only thing we lack," replied the old man, with a mournful sigh. "We've got schools enough, but we can't keep no teachers."

"What's the trouble?"

"Well, take my school, for instance—only two miles from the nearest house. eminently situated on the top of a hill, and paying the biggest salary. We can't keep a teacher over two weeks."

"Do they die?"

"Some do, though it's no place for dying. We had a young fellow from Ohio. and he met a grizzly and whistled for him. The grizzly cum. We had another, and a widder run him down and married him inside of a month. The third one was lame, and the Injuns overtook him. Then we tried women folks. The first one got married the night she lit down there; I took the second about the middle of the third week, and the next one was abducted by a stage robber.

"Why don't you get the ugliest, homeliest woman you can find—some perfect old terror, like that lantern-jawed, razor-faced female over by the ticket window?"

"Why don't we? Stranger, you Eastern folks will never understand us pioneers in the world—never. That's my wife—the identical school-teacher I married, and she was the handsomest one in the drove."—Detroit Free Press.

A SAILOR'S YARN.

This is the tale that was told to me
By a battered and shattered son of the sea—
To me and my messmate, Silas Green,
When I was a guileless young marine.

'Twas the good ship Gyascutus,
All in the China seas,
With the wind a-lee and the capstan free
To catch the summer breeze.

'Twas Captain Porgie on the deck,
To his mate in the mizzen hatch,
While the boatswain bold, in the forward hold,
Was winding his larboard watch.

"Oh, how does our good ship head to-night?
How heads our gallant craft?"
"Oh, she heads to the E. S. W. by N.,
And the binnacle lies abaft!"

"Oh, what does the quandrant indicate,
And how does the sextant stand?"
"Oh, the sextant's down to the freezing point,
And the quadrant's lost a hand!"

"Oh, and if the quadrant has lost a hand,
And the sextant falls so low,
Its our bodies and bones to Davy Jones
This night are bound to go!

"Oh, fly aloft to the garboard strake!
And reef the spanker boom;
Bend a studding sail on the martingale
To giv her weather room.

"O boatswain, down in the for'ard hold,
What water do you find?
Four foot and a half by the royal gaff
And rather more behind!"

"O sailors, collar your marline spikes
And each belaying pin;
Come stir your stumps and spike the pumps,
Or more will be coming in!"

They stirred their stumps, they spiked the pumps,
They spliced the mizzen brace;
Aloft and alow they worked, but oh!
The water gained apace.

They bored a hole above the keel
To let the water out;
But, strange to say, to their dismay,
The water in did spout.

Then up spoke the cook of our gallant ship,
And he was a lubber brave:
"I hav several wives in various ports,
And my life I'd orter save."

Then up spoke the captain of marines,
Who dearly loved his prog:
"It's awful to die, and it's worse to be dry,
And I move we pipe to grog."

Oh, then 'twas the noble second mate
Who filled them all with awe;
The second mate, as bad men hate,
And cruel skippers jaw.

He took the anchor on his back
And leaped into the main;
Through foam and spray he clove his way,
And sunk and rose again!

Through foam and spray, a league away
The anchor stout he bore;
Till, safe at last, he made it fast
And warped the ship ashore!

'Taint much of a job to talk about,
But a ticklish thing to see,
And such'in to do, if I say it too,
For that second mate was me!

Such was the tale that was told to me
By that modest and truthful son of the sea,
And I envy the life of a second mate
Though captains curse him and sailors hate,
For he ain't like some of the swabs I've seen,
As would go and lie to a poor marine.

ENTITLED

INGERSOLL ON TALMAGE,

BEING

Six Interviews with the Famous Orator on Six Sermons by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, to which is added

A TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

Stenographically reported by I. NEWTON BAKER.

Printed in bold, clear type, on heavy, tinted paper, and handsomely bound in muslin, with heavy boards, beveled edges, gilt top, Octavo, 443 pages.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on "Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, together with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts in the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. As a piece of satire, with earnest purpose, this production stands alone, and in the literature of Freethought has not its equal.

Notes and Clippings.

IN Russia Sunday is the favorit shopping-day of all classes.

THE Rev. Dr. Landis preached last Sunday on "Nothing." Ministers hav been using the same text, under different titles, for a long time.

SUNDAY, the 21st, was appointed by several bishops of the Episcopal church as a day of intercession for the success of missions. It is the opinion of others that the missionary cause is past praying for.

THE first Welsh Presbyterian church in Ohio was founded in 1803. At present that division of the church has three thousand members. So it is only a question of time when the Welsh Presbyterians will save the whole state.

IT is suggested that an itinerant ministry will use bicycles in the future. Perhaps the riding of bicycles is what Ezekiel was attempting to shadow forth in his vision of a wheel upon the earth, and the spirit of a living creature in the wheel.

THERE is a report that the Rev. Mr. Hoyt, who is a member of the civil service examining board in this city, catechizes applicants for Custom House clerkships from the "Union Question Book" of the American Sunday-school Union.

INFIDEL books are extensivly circulated and read by the English-speaking Hindoos.—New York Tribune. The honesty of the Tribune in printing this item now is not so great as its lack of enterprise as a chronicler of contemporaneous events in not having mentioned the fact long ago.

THE Assembly of Southern Presbyterians has decided not to take action approving the revised New Testament at present, but at next year's meeting. This new revision seems to be a sort of literary white elephant on the hands of the Protestant church. If they are wise they will sell it to Barnum, at his own terms, and go back to the "original" Greek.

THE agent of the Bible Society in Brazil makes the following statement in a recent circular: "We guarantee that the Bibles and New Testaments published by the American Bible Society contain in their entirety all the books recognized as canonical by our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles." We should say that they do, and a good many more.

THE Moravian, a religious paper, and the New York Christian Advocate deeply deplore the signing of the anti-Chinese bill by President Arthur. They regard it as unconstitutional. After witnessing the ease with which the religious press bolted the Fugitiv-slave and Comstock law camels, it is hard to see the necessity of its straining at this Chinese gnat.

THE Southern Methodists, in general conference assembled, hav voted that their church members must neither dance nor go to the circus. This is hard indeed. But there is a law of compensation which tempers the ecclesiastical wind to the shorn lamb. They are not prohibited from attending church trials of clergymen, and the world can offer to the curious no such circus as one of these investigations.

IN his address before the Massachusetts Historical Society, Oliver Wendell Holmes gave this testimony in regard to the Liberal religious views and teachings of Emerson: "The ministers denounced his heresies, and handled his writings as if they were packages of dynamite, and the grandmothers were as much afraid of his new teachings as old Mrs. Piozzi was of geology. We had had revolutionary orators, reformers, martyrs; it was but a few years since Abner Kneeland had been sent to jail for expressing an opinion about the great first cause; but we had had nothing like this man, with his seraphic voice and countenance, his choice vocabulary, his refined utterance, his gentle courage—which, with a different manner, might be called audacity—his temperate statement of opinions which threatened to shake the existing order of thought like an earthquake."

THERE is a religious society in this city having about sixty members who reject animal food and fish on religious grounds. They call themselvs "Faithists," and call upon all vegetarian worshipers of Jehovah to join them. What connection there is between Jehovah and vegetables is not explained, but as the supply of cranks is not yet exhausted by the other religious sects, this one will probably continue to grow.

HARRIET MARTINEAU left many personal friends and thousands of admirers in America. Boston women hav raised about $13,000, and before long a statue from the studio of Miss Whitney will be unveiled in that city. The statue represents Miss Martineau in her prime, sitting in a garden chair on her terrace, as she was accustomed when in study. A manuscript lies in her lap, which she has been reading, and the hands are folded over it. A shawl has dropped from her shoulders and partly drapes the figure. The head is lifted and the eyes look out into space as if she were in deep thought.

THE lack of an inspired proof-reader made itself severely felt by the revisers of the New Testament. For instance, from more than 1,500 passages, collated for the purpose, a writer in an English journal shows than an half occurs eight times, a half five times; that hand is preceded by an seven times, by mine forty-three, and my forty-nine times; by thine ninety-seven, and thy forty-three times; that the word heart is preceded by an three, and by a three times, by mine thirty, and my fifty-two times, by thine fifty-two, and thy eighteen times. The only words which never vary is an hundred. The relativ which, when referring to persons, has been sometimes changed to who, sometimes to that, and sometimes retained. There is the same want of uniformity in the use of whence and thence, in many passages from whence and from thence being employed.

AMONG the literary and scientific workers, whose testimony as to the influence of alcohol and tobacco on intellectual labor a gentleman of Manchester in late years obtained, Mr. Darwin was one. He wrote that he drank one glass of wine daily, and believed that he should be better if he drank none at all, although the doctors agreed in urging him to drink it as a cure for giddiness. He added that he had taken snuff all his life, and regretted that he had ever done so. The habit he had often tried to shake off, and for a time had done so, but never successfully for any long period. He felt sure, however, that it was a great stimulus and aid in his work. "I also," he wrote, "smoke daily two little paper cigarets of Turkish tobacco. This is not a stimulus, but rests me after my work, or after I hav been compelled to talk, with tired memory, more than anything else. I am seventy-three years old."

COLONEL INGERSOLL is to be the orator of the Grand Army of the Republic on Decoration Day. It is eminently fitting that he should be; first, because the celebration of the day is in honor of the fallen soldiers of the Union; and second, because he is the most brilliant and eloquent orator of our time. Nevertheless, some pharisaical panderers to the ultra pious sentiment of the community condemn the selection because the day "is semi-religious in character." Indeed! That is the first we hav heard that the Grand Army of the Republic is to hav a prayer-meeting. We had supposed that there was nothing religious about Decoration Day. We thought it was wholly patriotic in character. We presume that the Grand Army were of that opinion too. And we still believe that they are. Never mind the canters, boys! Ingersoll will giv you the best oration that was ever uttered on Decoration Day, and, if you must hav prayers, he will giv you one that will knock the professional prayer out of sight. No more beautiful prayer was ever spoken than that prose poetry which fell from his lips over the coffin of his brother. Away with such hypocrisy! Let us listen to a liberty-loving man, a soldier, and an orator when we gather to express a nation's sorrow for the loss of her soldier sons and her gratitude for their devotion.—Truth.

AN encouraging phase of the strife between the Freethinkers and the Catholics of France occurred in the chamber of deputies recently on the debate on the Civil Interment bill, by which it is sought to place non-religious burials on the same footing as those celebrated with religious rites. Monsignor Freppel (Catholic) declaimed against the idea that Materialists could render honor to "the mixture of physico-chemical elements which is all that remains of the body after death." M. Clovis Hugues (Liberal) replied that Materialists had a better right to honor the remains of the dead than the Catholics, who regarded the corpse as the worn-out garb of a departed spirit. The controversy was brought to a close by the minister of worship, who remarked that when a man died he always left something behind to which funeral honors could be paid, and that in the case of Materialists these last sad tributes of respects were paid to a life consecrated to duty and honor. The bill was accepted by 379 to 89.

THE new statutes, practically abolishing religious instruction and religious disciplin in the English universities, are likely soon to become law. They contain provisions, the London Globe thinks, which must be regarded as "directly hostil to the cause of religion in general, and to the church of England in particular." It appears that the restrictions, by virtue of which colleges were compelled to take clergymen for their president, and to elect a large proportion of clergymen among their fellows, hav been gradually relaxed in the course of the last fifty years. Now it is proposed to abolish them almost entirely, leaving in most colleges only one, and in no case more than two fellowships, confined necessarily to men in holy orders. "The result of such a measure," the Globe says, "cannot be regarded without the greatest apprehension by every one who has any regard for the religious and moral instruction, and supervision of the undergraduates, or who is capable of understanding what results are following in France upon the destruction of the religious element in public instruction."

THE Rev. Dr. George A. Lofton, pastor of the Third Baptist church of St. Louis, is now in bed in a pretty badly damaged condition. He has just had an experience he will not soon forget. According to stories told by a number of people, the reverend gentleman started for a trip of recreation recently. It was reported that he was going on a long Southern tour. The doctor had a bottle of rock and rye in his satchel. At Holden, Mo., a lady boarded the train. The divine looked, and, circumstances would indicate, was immediately captured. He soon began gazing back at the lady in a way to attract attention. Soon after he got up, walked back and took his seat next to the lady. For a moment, while the doctor and the lady talked, nothing was heard, but in a minute the lady and the bystanders state that Dr. Lofton reached his own arm around her and tried to draw her to his manly bosom, while he whispered in her ear. The doctor is a strong, powerful man, with a long arm. The lady screamed, and succeeded in evading the ministerial grasp. She ran out of the Pullman sleeper and into the Louisville car, which was the next behind. The minister followed her, clutching a bottle of beer in his hand. There were gallant men with brawny arms aboard, and the strongest of these was a monte-dealer. There was some loud talking, during which, it is reported, the preacher swore some terrible oaths. In a moment the monte man struck the parson square between the eyes, knocking him all in a heap across the car. A large number of the officers of the Army of the Tennessee, including Gen. Sherman, saw the whole affair, and say the story as told by the conductor, the substance of which is given, is true. The clergyman left the train at Vincennes, taking the next train for home.

A LANDSCAPE and portrait painter died in a New York hospital last week of starvation. He had been without food for six weeks, being too miserly to buy it, and believing that a man could liv without eating, after he once got accustomed to it. Bank books showing a deposit of $6,600 were found in his clothes.

LAST Sunday the Rev. Dr. Steman preached from the text, "Keep yourselvs in the love of God." After the sermon he abused one of his congregation, also a clergyman, and was arrested for provoking an assault. When the reverend gentleman met his accuser in court he dealt him a vigorous blow on the forehead, knocking him down. As he arose, the pastor landed another on his nose. Mr. Steman was then taken away.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

General History of India in Brief.—Concluded.

CAVES OF ELEPHANTA.

On our way to Elephanta we visited a large American freight ship, commanded by Capt. Ross, of New England. His wife is on board with him, with a relative and his wife, the cabin being neatly and comfortably fitted up for their accommodation. We were kindly received by the captain and his family, and had a very pleasing visit with them. Americans do seem nearer and more like relations than any other people of the earth, and it certainly does our hearts much good to meet them in these distant waters.

The ride to Elephanta out far in the bay, and surrounded by many other pleasant and picturesque islands, was a delightful one, the day being as charming as could be desired. Upon the arrival at the point of our destination, we found a pier of independent concrete stones, large and square in form, running several hundred feet out into the water, by the side of which our little steamer landed its select number of passengers, and we found the island, though rocky and elevated, covered with rich growth of tropical trees and plants lovely to behold. Mengoe-trees, palms, bananas, cactuses, with a profusion of plants, creepers, and flowers, met our eyes upon all sides. A well-built stone walk and ascending steps with a walk neatly laid on each side, rounded off with ornamental capstones, erected many years ago by a rich rajah, leads for a thousand feet or two from the water's edge to the magnificent temple cut out of the solid rock.

The name Elephanta comes from the colossal statue of an elephant standing at the entrance of the temple, the figure being cut out of a detatched mass of dark-colored rock of volcanic or igneous formation. The native name of the island—which is perhaps some three miles in circumference, the rocks, partially covered with soil, rising two or three hundred feet in the center—is Gurhpoora, meaning the "tower of purification;" or, according to others, the "fortress-city."

The excavation was made by the believers in Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, the great Hindoo trinity; but as to the precise period when it was done, of course, cannot be decided, though it is believed to have been earlier than the Christian era, some claiming them to be several centuries older than Christianity. I will first give the size of the excavations, etc., and describe the various statues and sculptures further on. The excavation consists of three parts, of which the center is occupied by a great temple, dedicated to the Hindoo trinity, and the sides by two chapels, sacred to Siva and Indra respectively. The extent of the cave from north to south is one hundred and thirty feet; from east to west, one hundred and thirty-three feet. Twenty-six pillars, of which eight are broken, and sixteen pilasters support the roof and the entire mountain which rises above it. Neither the floor nor the roof is in precisely the same plain throughout, and consequently the hight varies from eight and a half feet in some places to eighteen feet in others. The pillars also vary somewhat in size and decorations, but not sufficiently to cause the difference to be noticed by the visitor. All the walls are covered with bas-reliefs, generally of large size, in good proportion, and producing a pleasing effect. The reliefs on the walls are in some cases so high and distinct that they adhere only to the main mass of rocks by their backs. Many of them are of colossal dimensions and remarkably well executed, though it is to be regretted that certain Christian zealots have seriously defaced many of the sculptures. Considerable light is admitted at the main entrance, as well as on the sides, so that no artificial light is required to see the sculptures in the various parts of the excavations. A feeling of awe is not easily suppressed as one stands near the main extrance and views the grand and quiet sculptures, representing the ancient belief of the people who many centuries ago inhabited this land, and which sculptures have so long quietly reposed in this quiet retreat. I will not attempt to here enter into an explanation of the complicated system of Hindoo mythology, which is not even understood alike by the various sects of the Hindoos themselves, some paying their worship to one particular deity and some to another. The gods of most of the sects are claimed to have had numerous avatars, sons, or transformations, or descents upon the earth to accomplish some particular purpose, either for the good of the gods or of the race of men upon the earth; and each of these has again been transformed an almost infinite number of times—Vishnu and Siva, two of the persons of the trinity, are each said to have a thousand different names. There is scarely a passion, feeling, vice, or virtue of the human race that has has been personified, together with all the innumerable hosts with which the prolific and imaginative mind of man has peopled the supposed domain of heaven, and including fire, wind, earth, water, with all the forces and features of nature. The devout Hindoo can hardly approach his ideal, supreme, and unknown god, incomprehensible to any mind, perhaps, but his own, and really not to that, except through some personified attributes of him whose supposed glory is so great there is no image, and his nature and will cannot be comprehended, save in some such attributes.

According to Sir William Jones, who for many years was an enlightened judge in India, and gave the ancient religions of the country great attention, the most venerable part of the Hindoo scriptures is called the Gayatri—the mother of the Vedas, or holiest verse of the Vedas—which he thus translates: "That divine and incomparably greater light, which illumines all, from which all proceed, to whom all must return, and which alone can irradiate (not our visual organs merely, but our souls) our intellects." Another translation says: "Let us adore the supremacy of the divine sun—he the godhead who illuminates all, who recreates all, from whom all proceed, to whom all must return, whom we invoke to direct our understandings aright in our progress toward the holy seat."

The following paraphrase, or commentary, by the learned Pundit Rhadacant, descriptive of Brahma or the great incomprehensible, may be deemed appropriate before we enter into a detailed description of the sculptures in this ancient temple: "Perfect truth; perfect happiness, without equal; immortal, absolute unity; whom neither speech can describe nor mind comprehend; all-pervading; all-trandscending; delighted with his own boundless intelligence; not limited by space or time; without feet, moving swiftly; without hands, grasping all worlds; without eyes, all-surveying; without ears, all-hearing; without an intelligent guide, understanding all; without cause, the first of all causes; all-ruling, all-powerful; the creator, the preserver, the transformer of all things; such is the great one." This is perhaps equally as grand a description of the great unknown as any Christian has been able to give, each knowing absolutely nothing of the being or power attempted to be described, and drawing only upon a prolific imagination for ideas; but after all, neither can rise above the great cosmos, the universe—nature—which embraces all existence, all material, all forces, all capabilities that have existence, and beyond which, above which, and below which there is and can be nothing. The simple term, nature, then, expresses just as much, and means just as much, as the far-fetched and incomprehensible imagery and dreaming which men, whether pagan or Christian, are capable of originating. "Nature," if we only look at it in the right light, is as great a word, as great a meaning, as great a conception, as "God" can possibly be. And after all the fine talk is indulged in, after all the imagination can paint, the two words are synonymous, and mean almost precisely the same. "Nature" is ALL, and "God" can be no more. About the only difference is that the stickler for "God" has taken what the term "Nature" implies, with all its wonder and mystery, put an imaginary envelope or covering upon him, and given him personality, and named him Brahma, Ahura-Mazda, Osiris, Odin, Jove, or Jehovah; but when all this is done, the various names mean the same, no more, and no less. I still insist that nature means just as much as either of them, and is more true, more real, more absolute, than any of them; for nature really does exist, is the sum of all existence, and is the only thing that does exist. But if there are those who wish to personify nature and name it by any of the above appellations, or any of the thousands of others that have been invented, I will not quarrel with them for the taste they indulge in; but I must insist that no name that can be invented, no personality that can be imagined, can make grand, glorious, eternal old Nature one iota more great or omnipotent or omnipresent than it is. And I must also insist that when personality—a being—the qualities of organization, parts, locality, of being in one place more than another, is given to a universal principle or power, its infinity, which is one of the greatest characteristics, is at once destroyed. No being, thing, substance, person, power, or principle can at the same time have personality, locality, and infinity. The terms are most assuredly incompatible with each other; where personality, individuality, locality, organization, and "being" exist there cannot be infinity; a being cannot possibly be everywhere at the same time. And when the idea of "being" is dismissed, there is no truer nor grander term for the supreme, infinite power than NATURE; and it needs not a creator, and had not a creator a thousandth part as much as either of the personal beings called gods, which men have imagined. Whenever any one says "nature" must have had a beginning, a cause, or a creator, they would speak far more truly to say that any god or being which can be imagined must have had a beginning, a cause, and a creator. Nothing can possibly be gained in logic or good sense by deciding that nature must have been caused, but that the god or gods were not caused. Until it can be shown that any god possesses any quality or capability which nature does not more perfectly possess, I shall object to nature being despised, and a creation of the imagination adored in its place. But to return to Elephanta and the Hindoos.

When the Hindoo deity wished the world to exist and continue, or rather when the Hindoo Theist himself wished this, he created or imagined a trinity, a triad, representing creation, preservation, and destruction (nothing but the course of nature at best), and named them Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. Each of these persons in the Hindoo godhead has a distinct class of worshipers, and these again are divided and subdivided almost without end. True, Brahma himself has but few worshipers as an individual, and there are no temples, no altars, and no shrines erected to his honor, and few images, comparatively, which represent him disconnected from his two partners in godship. As he is supposed to be the creator of the world, the entire universe, his labor is completed, with little more for him to attend to, so to some extent he becomes a sort of supernumerary in the domain of the gods, while Vishnu and Siva, the alternative preserving and destroying elements, have ever a continued round of duties and labors to perform.

The trinity, or trimurti, generally claimed to represent Siva in his threefold character of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the preverver, and Siva the destroyer, is the largest and most imposing sculpture in the temple, and stands at the inner end of the main compartment, immediately in front of the grand entrance. The figures reach a hight of twelve to fifteen feet, and display a very fair amount of artistic skill, being carved and sculptured with care and precision. Each person in the godhead is identified by his accorded symbols and peculiarities. The high head-dresses, on which was bestowed an almost inconceivable amount of work, when gilded and adorned as they originally were, must have presented a very rich and striking appearance, and are supposed to represent the style in vogue with the rajahs of the country at the time the temple was constructed. The ornaments on the tiaras are interspersed with symbols and emblems, and the brooches, necklaces, pendants, and festoons of jewelry are most elaborate and rich in execution. The models themselves would do honor to artists of our own times.

The head on the left and facing the east, according to the ancient custom, is the principal head of Siva in his character of destroyer, as the protuberance on his forehead—his third eye—the skull on his cap, with plants sacred to him, indicate. His hair is formed of twisted serpents. He wears a stern, gloomy expression, and has a Roman countenance, which derives character or fierceness from a moustache above his slightly parted lips. A slight prominence is visible at the corners of his mouth, which may have meant to conceal the tusks often ascribed to him. In his right hand is a large cobra, with the wide, expanded head peculiar to that deadly serpent, and which seems to be looking the destructive god in the face. Siva is sometimes represented with five heads, but in only one of them, and in the middle of the forehead, is placed the "eye of destruction," from which flames are to dart forth to destroy the world.

The center and largest head is Brahma, the creator. It perhaps has not as much expression as that of Siva, but it exhibits the qualities of tranquility and repose in a striking degree. It is probable when fully painted the expression of his countenance may have been greatly increased. The figure has a rich necklace of jewels, with festoons like pearls, which have the appearance of being suspended from elongated ears.

The third figure of course represents Vishnu, the preserver, who has had no less than nine distinct avatars or incarnations, begotten by himself, to carry out his wise designs and purposes. He has a somewhat feminine cast of countenance blended with benignance and geniality. The ornaments of the headress are also of a feminine character, having several beautiful festoons of jewels or pearls with oblong drops. The right hand holds up a lotus in a good state of preservation.

The center figure holds what appears to be a gourd or pomegranate. The whole subject stands in a recess in the rock ten feet in depth, and the center figure from the bottom of the breast to the top of the cap is seventeen feet ten inches in hight. Behind the head to the left is a recess capable of holding a person in a reclining position, without being observed from below, an arrangement supposed to have been made use of by the priests to assist the gods and enable them to speak at the proper moment, and increase correspondingly the faith and adoration of the worshipers. There is nothing like a proper amount of finesse in these godly matters.

In the compartment east of the great trinity Siva is represented in his double character of male and female, a personification of nature in one form. One side of the figure is that of a male, and the other a female, and the distinction between the two sexes is carried out with elaborateness. The right hand of the male side leans with one of the four arms on the head of the nandi, or sacred bull, the animal on which Siva rides; it is not seen with any other figure. It appears that most of the Hindoo gods, like, in fact, most of the gods of other nations, had their favorite mode of conveyance. The other right arm of the compound figure holds up a cobra, or naga, also one of the symbols of Siva. Many of the gods seem to have considerable to do with snakes, and even Yahweh himself had no little trouble with a member of the snake family, which he had created, and which possessed shrewdness and power sufficient to thwart and upset the plans of his maker. One of the left female arms holds a shield or mirror—probably the former—while the other arm is broken off. The side of the head-dress is distinctly marked, both in the jewels and emblems. It is greatly to be regretted that the lower part of this sculpture has been much damaged by vandalism, but above and around the principal figure are numerous floating or flying statues, some in the clouds, and others as attendants with the chamara, or cow-tail fan. On Siva's extreme right is his trident-bearer, and above Brahma, with his heads, seated on his lotus throne, upheld by swans, as his conveyance. He had four arms, the right one of which holds a lotus; the others have been so mutilated as not to be easily made out, but are supposed to have held his usual symbols.

A little nearer to Siva is Indra, the ancient Vedic god of the firmament, riding on his beautiful elephant, Arravati, who was supposed to shower the rain from his trunk. In one hand Indra holds the thunderbolt, while the other is not very plain. His robes are the clouds, spangled with a thousand eyes or stars, as thus poetically described:

> Mounted on the sun's bright beams,
> Darter of the swift blue bolt;
> Sprinkler of genial dews and fruitful rains,
> On hill and thirsty plains.

On the other side of Siva are several grotesque figures; on one of them, called Garuda, sits Vishnu. The Garuda on which Vishnu rides is a half man and half eagle of resplendent plumage, and king of the feathered tribes. Vishnu has four arms; one holds his chakra or disk, which, when he throws it from him, emits flames from the edges; one rests upon his knee, the others are broken off, but are supposed to have held his peculiar emblems.

It is easy to see, in all these representations, that the forces of nature were intended to be personified, and if the poetry of the conception could only have been kept in mind, without the coarser and cruder notions of beings and persons having crept in, it would all have been well enough; but the mischief of all this god business, in all ages of the world, is that men have not been able to keep distinctly in mind the portrayal of nature's operations, rather than the crude ideas of personalties. As regards the male and female element being each represented in divinity, the idea is far more beautiful and more true than the Jewish and Christian conception, in which there are three masculine deities, without the slightest recognition of the female element. In nature, the female exists, as per necessity, as really as the male, and if there is any deity besides nature, it must be as much female as male. The Hindoos, in this respect, had more good sense than those exclusively he-god worshipers, who now affect to despise them and their recognition of the female element.

In the compartment west of the trinity, the sculpture represents Siva and his wife, Parvati, after being divided to form separate and distinct sexes. Siva has his usual high head-dress, on which are sculptured the crescent and other emblems, and above them rises something like a helmet, or a "foam-crested wave," in which is to be distingnished a three-headed female figure. It is supposed to represent the river Ganges, which is fabled to flow from Siva's hair. The three heads are thus supposed to indicate the mythical union of the three sacred rivers, the Ganges, the Jumner, and the Saraswati, severally the consorts or energies of these three great powers. This junction is called Triveni, or the three-plaited locks. The Ganges and the Jumner form a junction near Allahabad; the latter river receives the Saraswati near Delhi, so that the union of the three is held to take place at one point—all another poetical fancy of nature and her great operations.

One of Siva's hands again holds a snake, and on his left stands, in a graceful attitude, his beautiful consort, Parvati. She has several necklaces, armlets, and bracelets. The lower part of this compartment is filled with dwarfs, and a curious figure, kneeling in front and a little to the right of Siva; his head has garlands of flowers around it. On Siva's right are Brahma and Indra, and on Parvati's left is Vishnu on Garuda. Garuda was also the serpent destroyer, and having killed all but one, he kept this for a necklace. He seemed to have better luck with snakes than the Jew God.

Between the three compartments named are two square pilasters, against which stand large guards, as doorkeepers or sentinels, with attendant dwarfs, probably to guard the central trinity, which appears once to have had doors, as the poles for receiving the lintels are plainly to be seen.

THE LINGA SHRINE.

To the west of the great hall a mass of rock was left (about the space inclosed by four pillars), and this has been carefully sculptured out to form a square chamber, as if to shut out from the public gaze something more sacred than anything else in the temple. The four openings face the cardinal points, and these were once provided with doors, so that the sacred apartment could be securely closed. A short flight of steps leads to this chamber, and in the center, on a kind of altar, is a round, dome-shaped pillar, the lower end of which is square and is let into the base, the upper part being round, and about three feet high. This is the most sacred object in the temple, and is particularly the symbol of Siva. It is the lingam, the union of the phallus and the yoni, the male and female organs of generation, recognized as the source of life and regarded as the correct symbol of creative power. As is well known, this was an object of great worship with the ancients and is confessedly one of the oldest forms of worship in the world. It was not necessarily an impure idea which prompted this form of worship and this symbol of life and creative power, but was simply a recognition of the principal law of nature, without which animal and human life could not possibly exist, another conclutive proof that the ancients, in their conceptions of what they supposed to be deity, recognized the laws and forces of nature. The upright portion represents the generative energy of Siva, or nature, while the circle or zone within which it stands correspondingly represents Parvati, the female side of reproduction. In its entirety it represents the reproductive power of nature, by which means only the continued existence of organized life is possible. There are, in secluded places in this temple, several other smaller lingams, but all having the same import.

On each side of the chamber described, on raised pedestals, stand gigantic guards, with the Brahmanical cord on their shoulders. Their head-dresses are rich and varied. They may have had various symbols in their hands, but the most of them have been destroyed by the vandals who worshiped another description of god, though no more true and not as real. It is said the four gates of this shrine were never opened but once a year, on the day of the greatest festival held in the temple, to show in what veneration this special phase of worship was held.

THE MARRIAGE OF SIVA.

On the south side of the great porch is a department of sculptures said to represent the marriage of Siva and Parvati, particularly as this is the only instance where the goddess is represented as standing on the right hand—a position occupied only on the day of marriage. Siva is ten feet and ten inches high; he had four arms, though now more or less broken, and his right leg gone; Parvati is eight feet six inches high. A figure behind her, with his right hand upon her shoulder or arm, supposed to be Himalaya, her father, seems to be leading her forward. Both her hands are broken off, though probably one of them rested in that of Siva. There is a small crouching figure on Siva's left, said to be Brahma, the officiating priest of the ceremony. Behind stands Vishnu, who has four hands—in one a lotus, in another a chakra, while the other two are broken off. On the extreme right of Parvati is a large male figure with a crescent behind his head, holding up a water-pot, probably containing the water necessary for the ceremony. This is said to be the moon-god. Of the numerous surrounding figures no decided opinion can be given as to their meaning, though various theories have been advanced upon the subject.

The various gods whom men have worshiped have had not a little to do at getting married and raising children. When they exercised the good sense and morality to get married before begetting children, it was very commendable and exemplary on their part; but when, like old Jupiter and Yahweh, they engaged in the business of begetting without taking the preliminary step of getting married, the practice can hardly be censured in language too strong or pronounced. It is simply setting a very bad example to the world, for it would seem that what is right and moral for a god to do may also be practiced by men. It is difficult indeed to understand why seduction or adultery, even with a professed proper motive, is any better in a god than in a man. Adultery is adultery, whoever commits it, whether gods or their priests. If gods or men wish to engage in sexual commerce it is as little as they ought to do to look up a partner that they think will suit them and then get married in an honorable manner, like honest persons. Anything short of this is the sheerest adultery, which is always immorality. Why will some of the gods always be setting such bad examples before men, who are only too ready to use any excuse and follow any bad example in this line which may be set them? At the very least that can be said, the gods should not blame men for doing the very acts they do themselves. But the way things have been going on in the past with some of these gods, with respect to their conduct with females, in sly and secret places, and in yielding to sexual desires, this conduct has truly been enough to make their followers and worshipers thoroughly ashamed of them.

SIVA THE DESTROYER.

Facing the marriage scene is a compartment said to be one of the most remarkable in the entire temple, and is thought to represent Virabhadra, one of the avatars of Siva, in the act of destroying a sacrifice. The legend runs in this wise: Dakra, attended by a number of divine beings, determined to make a sacrifice to Vishnu, in which Dadhichi declared it to be necessary that Siva should have a part. In the course of the dispute which arose Mahadeva, the great god of all, and perhaps another name for Siva, created Virabhadra, who at once demolished the sacrifice, exhorting them to submit to Mahadeva, "whose wrath was better than the beneficence of other gods." Extreme age is depicted on the countenance, large tusks protrude from the mouth, and the eyes bespeak vengeance. The figure had eight arms. There is a small human body on the left, which was no doubt pierced by a sword held in one of the left hands. One of the right hands grasps a long sword as if about to slay a victim. A bell is held in one of the left hands to strike the doom, and a bowl in another to catch the blood of the victim. What is supposed to be an elephant's hide is held up behind the figure by two of the arms, as if about to wrap it around the body. The head of an elephant is quite visible. There are a number of male and female figures above and below, probably representing the gods looking on, as Dr. Wilson suggests, "in horror and amazement." The head-dress is most elaborately carved. In the Bhagavad-Gita Siva is described as roaming about in dreadful cemeteries, attended by hosts of ghosts, laughing, weeping like a madman, and smeared with ashes from funeral piles.

"The Destroyer" is again described by a learned writer in this language: "His body is smeared with ashes from a funeral pile, around his neck hangs a string of human skulls, his forehead is streaked with a black line, his hair is woven into a matted braid, his loins are clothed with a tiger's skin, a skull is in his left hand for a cup, and in his right he carries a bell which he constantly rings, exclaiming aloud, 'Ho! Shambhu Bhairava; ho! lord of Kali.'"

This is terrible, to be sure, for a god; but it will of course be remembered that these gods sometimes get in a terrible way and exhibit the fiercest rage and passion, and that they often show the most deadly hatred to each other. The old god of the Jews, who tried his hand for a few hundred years to rule the little country of Palestine, and before he got to be as civil and civilized as he is now, used often to get into those fits of anger. Fire used to dart forth from him and consume two hundred and fifty people at a time (Num. xvi, 35). Sometimes he wanted to consume millions at once (Num. xvi, 45, and Ex. xxxviii, 5). His anger was fearful on a great number of occasions and is often referred to as "waxing hot," and being "stirred up." His hatred was also very strong and often spoken of, but his anger and hatred were never so great as when other gods were noticed by his people, and when sacrifices were offered to them in place of himself, although so far as appears they were quite as mild, complacent, and well-behaved as himself. On these occasions his anger often rose to such a hight as to know no bounds. Siva, even as "destroyer," scarcely holds a comparison with him.

THE WEST WING.

Descending a few steps, and crossing the courtyard, a small porch is reached leading to a chamber in which is another dungeon. On each side of the door is a guard or door-keeper, with two attendant dwarfs, and a flying figure above the shoulders of each. The figure in the center of the north end represents Siva in the attitude of an ascetic, seated on a lotus throne, upheld by two figures. To the right is a figure holding a plantain, behind is a sage, on the left a similar figure. Above is Brahma. In the clouds are a number of winged attendants. On the south side Siva is again represented with six arms and a protuberance on the forehead, probably that terrible third eye. In one hand he holds a cobra, in the other a club. The palm of one hand, minutely carved, is turned outward. On his right is Brahma on a lotus-seat, upborne by swans. On the left is a figure seated on a bull. Above the shoulder of a female figure is Indra, and behind him Vishnu on the shoulders of Garuda. There is a small unfinished chamber at the south end, overhanging the cistern or well, which is believed to have been at one time so deep as to be almost unfathomable. The cistern has been explored; it deepens considerably toward the extreme end, and the bottom is composed of large stones.

BIRTH OF GANESHA.

Reëntering the great cave or principal part of the temple and passing toward the west wing, a compartment on the right hand is reached, now badly mutilated, representing Siva and his consort, Parvati, seated together in their terrestrial paradise, Kailasa, situated among the peaks of the mystical and wonderful mountains of Meru. Above their heads are numerous male and female figures, floating on what appears to be clouds, which rest on countless summits of Kailasa, depicted by the unequal masses below; between and behind Siva and Parvati is a female figure carrying a child on her hip, from which it has been supposed that this panel represents the birth of Ganesha, or Gunputti, afterward known as the elephant-headed god of wisdom. There are several figures on the right and left, but it is not easy to decide the meaning of them. Perhaps they are the immediate attendants of Siva and Parvati. This compartment is much mutilated in the lower portions, but appears to have been filled with dwarfs and animals. Among the latter is the bull, Siva's vehicle, tall as a mountain, and another figure, probably the tiger of Parvati. There is also a strange figure on the canopy. The skeleton form of Bhringi, Siva's favorite, is discernible at the feet. The mutilation that has been perpetrated in this compartment is shameful.

RAVAN OR RAVANA.

Facing the apartment last described Siva and Parvati are seated on an eminence, their paradise among the Himalaya Mountains already alluded to, and which Ravan, the twenty-armed, ten-headed, demon-king of Lanka, is trying to remove or overthrow. Siva is here represented with eight arms, which, however, have been broken off; one held a trident, a portion of which still remains, two rested on the heads of other figures. Parvati sits on his right; on each side is a guard. Bhringi is seated at Siva's feet; on the left of the former is Gunputti, with his elephant-head. The legend connected with this runs thus: Ganesha having quarreled with Vishnu, and being likely to gain the victory, Siva cut off his head, and this so enraged his mother that she threatened to upset the whole celestial business. The gods, therefore, in their great alarm, implored Siva to interpose. Upon his doing so, Ganesha's head could not be found, and in the great emergencies of the case it was determined to replace it by the head of the first animal to be found. This proved to be an elephant with a single tusk; Siva adopted him as his son, and in consideration of this and of the serious disturbance in heaven which had thus been averted, the gods magnanimously agreeed that he should be the first god invoked on all occasions. In this way the wrath of Parvati was most fortunately averted. Beneath the raised throne is Ravan, who had resolved to move the great mountain to his own kingdom, in order to secure Siva's aid against Kama, one of the avatars or incarnations of Vishnu. Parvati, however, had her eyes open, and noticing the alarming symptoms she was caused to tremble and quake with fear, and at length being unable to longer restrain her trepidation, she exclaimed: "Some one moves the hill! We shall be overthrown!" At this gentle hint Siva pressed down the mountain with one of his great toes right upon Ravana's head, which caused the evil god, or demon, as the case may be, to utter such a loud cry as to shake all creation; but to serve him right for his impudence Siva held him fast by the head or neck with that powerful great toe of his, for a thousand years, until Mahadeva, sometimes styled the blue-throated lord of Uma, was fully propitiated with hymns of praise, and by the performance of such austerities as never fail to please the gods, when the benignant being kindly sent and released the bad fellow, and made him the present of a sword besides. Ravana's back is turned outward. This is fully equal to the Jew-book story about the son of Yahweh by the Jewish maiden, getting his heel—just as good as the toe—on the head of old Lucifer, Apollyon, Beelzebub, Satan, the serpent, or whatever his name might be, and giving it a thorough bruising, and holding him in confinement afterward for a thousand years. Really, these god stories are wonderfully similar.

THE EAST WING.

Descending a few steps and crossing a court to which there was an entrance, a flight of nine steps is reached, on each side of which are stone leogriffs in a sitting posture, and from that this apartment is called the "Tiger Cave." The circular platform in the center of the court was probably the position of the nandi, or sacred bull of Siva, which always faces the linga shrine. In the center of the east wing is another linga shrine, though smaller than that in the great temple already mentioned, and having but one entrance, to which was once affixed a door. At the east and west ends are large figures, though much damaged. The small figure on the right of each has a snake around his waist. The large figure near the west end has two attendants. This figure had four arms; in one hand he holds a snake, and with another he holds his robe in place on his shoulder. That protuberance of the third eye is plainly seen. A little to the right is the chapel of Ganesha, formerly protected by a railing in front. The back wall of this chapel is covered with a strong crusty composition, resembling bitumen. There are many indications in this compartment of the temple having once been painted, as portions of the ceiling still have patches of paint adhering thereto. At the extreme end is the largest figure of Ganesha in the cave, and the Hindoo visitors as a work of high respect, have daubed it with red paint. On the top and at the back of the head-dress is a large square hole, thought to have been intended for depositing presents in by the devout worshipers of the linga and the trinity.

A short figure on the right rests his head on the knee of Ganesha, while another figure on the left holds an offering; above are two flying figures, as well as several figures on the sides. On the back wall of the chapel are ten figures, including that of Ganesha. The rest of the figures are females, some of them carrying children, and above all are the small symbols already mentioned. At the opposite end is a standing figure, thought to be meant for Siva, or Shulapani, the wielder of the trident. On his right is Brahma, seated on his lotus throne; above are three figures, one holding an offering; on the left is Vishnu on the shoulders of Garuda. A figure below holds a lotus. Facing this chapel is a chamber corresponding in size, but quite plain. At certain times of the year, it is said, the ground within this chamber is covered with water to the depth of a foot or more, which the believers insist comes by miraculous means from the Ganges. This may account for the absence of sculpture in this compartment. The excavators finding the rock here more of a porous nature, probably thought it might be liable to decay or crumble away, and therefore left it unwrought. During the dry portion of the year the miraculous action of the water ceases, and this portion of the cave, like the rest, becomes dry. It has often been noticed that miracles can take place only when the conditions are favorable. Rain miracles frequently fail in dry weather.

THE TANDARA DANCE.

Returning toward the entrance, a compartment is reached on the left hand, in which Siva is represented "tripping the light fantastic toe." (You will remember that Jesus was also fond of attending a wedding.) This sculpture has also been shamefully mutilated; it had eight arms, only one of which remains—one crossed the body, another held a scepter, around the top of which was a cobra; another hand held a portion of the robe. The head-dress and armlets were carved with great care. The right leg is broken off near the knee, and the left is entirely gone. The dance that was here represented is called the "frantic dance," of which there are two varieties; this one is accompanied by violent gesticulations, which Siva performs at the eventide to the sound of musical instruments, with his hair loose, stamping with frantic energy, attended by his ganas and pishachas, when the dust he raised is put on their heads; the other dance is performed, when in sport he destroys the world, fixing the elephants of the four corners on his trishula and dancing wildly. One author calls it "the dance of the victor of Tripura," that dance to which space is wanting. Lightly treads the powerful, destructive god lest he should overturn the earth; he cramps his action lest his arms reach beyond the limits of the three worlds, and he bends his spark-emitting glances on vacuity lest they should consume the objects on which they gaze. (How kind the gods are not to turn everything into eternal smash, to be sure!) Parvati stands on the left of Siva; over her right shoulder is a flying female figure, and above this again is Vishnu, riding as usual of Garuda (this time without a head.) Over Parvati's left is Indra on his celestial elephant.

SIVA AS AN ASECTIC.

Far in the compartment just described is one about which there is not a little diversity of opinion on the part of antiquarians, as some think the main figure in this case bears resemblance to Buddha; but so much mutilation has been done him that it is not easy to divine accurately what the meaning is. The principal figure has but two arms, and is seated cross-legged on a lotus seat, upborne by two figures. The face has a mild expression, and the head-dress is elaborately and minutely cut. The scene is laid on the Himalaya Mountains, and Siva is represented as mourning the loss of his consort Uma, who, poor thing, died broken-hearted, because she and her husband were not invited to Daksha's sacrifice. Heavenly minstrels are above, and attendants below seated amidst the rocks. To the left of Siva is a plantain or banana tree, and under his left arm a sun-flower. On each side is a female figure. Vishnu is over the plantain, and again on the shoulders of Garuda. Still over Vishnu is a figure on horseback, the only instance where the horse is represented in the entire cave. There are also several other figures, but their meaning is somewhat obscure. The most noticeable feature in this compartment is the representation of Siva as a mourning, sad ascetic. Perhaps even a god with several wives still has cause for sadness. Many of the devotees of Siva have for centuries been ascetics, they seeming to think that fasting and sadness is particularly pleasing to their god. The Christian god was also an ascetic, and is said to have passed some of his early years among the ascetics. He retired also to a mountain and fasted forty days and nights a la Tanner, and mourned and sweat blood under an olive-tree; and many of the big saints in his church have lived ascetic lives for years, some retiring to monasteries for their entire lives, and some even passing a score of years on a pedestal or monument. Siva and his devotees do not beat that very much.

This grand old cave is often made the resort of picnic parties. It is so commodious, light, and clean that it is very appropriate on a burning, bright day to retire to its perpetual shades and partake of a grateful repast. It certainly would be as welcome as a miraculous dinner of bread and fish. It is a lasting shame that the Christians who many centuries ago visited these shores felt it their duty to exhibit their hatred for the gods of the Hindoos by knocking the heads, arms, legs, etc., from the same. The poor gods are always harmless enough if people will only let them alone and not say so much about them. There never was a god heard of who had power enough to harm anybody if left alone. Gods are much like scandal and slander—they do the more harm the more they are taked over and their qualities and features exaggerated.

Even the pious hypocrite, liar, and slanderer, Joe Cook, when he visited this cave a few days ago, not being able to appreciate the poetry of the conception of nature's forces, is said to have been intensely horrified at the presentation here of so many imaginary gods, and is said to have inveighed strongly against them. "Oh, the monstrosity of presenting such beings as gods!" Well, heathen gods may be monstrous enough. All the gods I have met with, and I have seen great numbers of them, are monstrous according to my views, but I have seen no heathen gods so monstrous in my eyes as the orthodox, Jew-Christian God, who made beings on purpose to damn them and torture them forever, and who planned the fearful degradation and cruel death of his own dear son, in whose dying agony he took great pleasure. No, I have met with no pagan god, horrible as they are, with a character so monstrous and so execrable as that.

It makes little difference, after all, how a god is pictured to our vision and conception, whether in images of stone, metal, or wood, whether painted on canvas or panels, printed on paper, or whether described in books, or expounded upon from the pulpit. It is all the same business of god-making—the worst business, by the bye, that poor misled man has ever engaged in. The miserable gods clearly would have had no existence but for the creation which imaginative man has given them. And just think for a moment what a world of harm the poor created phantoms have made. Think of the quarrels, contentions, and wars that have taken place in the world in consequence of these worthless gods, each nation and people insisting that its god was the most powerful, and that to his god all others should bow. Think of the cruel, intolerant, and persecuting religions that in all these ages have been gotten up in the interest of these gods, making the devotees of the different gods hate each other with the most intense animosity. Think of the myriads of priests these gods have required to minister unto them, or rather to the poor dupes who believe in them, telling the dupes what the gods think, wish, and command, the dupes having to support in opulence these lying priests for all these miserable falsehoods. Think of the fiends which these priests and these gods have made of men. Think of the rivers and oceans of blood that have been shed on their account, of the great unhappiness they have caused for these many thousands of years, and then tell me if I am not correct in saying that god-making is the worst business man has ever engaged in.

There are four other rock temples on this same island, two being on the same ridge with the one I have described, and the other two being on an opposite ridge and approached by a tortuous and tiresome path through an intense jungle. The one nearest is but a short distance to the south of the great cave; its entrance faces the east by northeast. The entrance to the third temple is further to the south, but these two are in a dilapidated condition, and much debris has fallen from the roof. The fourth temple on the opposite hill is reached by crossing a ravine and climbing the hill to the distance of a hundred feet or so above the level of the great cave. This was discovered only about twenty-five years ago. About five hundred feet north is what appears to be the beginning of another cave. Near by three walls are cut in the rock, with some brick foundations in the same vicinity, though they possess no special interest.

When it is remembered that these caves were excavated in the neighborhood of twenty-five hundred years ago, while the worship of Indra was still in vogue, and before the world had gained its present knowledge of hardening steel, making drills, and the most perfect carving tools, the industry, perseverance, and skill of the cutters of these rock temples can but be admired.

TO OTHER ROCK TEMPLES.

There are a thousand rock temples in India, in all, and many of them extremely interesting. Of course, it would not be expected that I should visit all of them, but I desired to see such as I could visit conveniently. The Carlee caves are nearly eighty miles southeast of Bombay, and the Kennery caves are twenty-five or thirty miles off in the same direction. These I resolved to visit. Accordingly I took the Great Indian Peninsula Railway to Khandala station, seventy-six miles from Bombay, to visit those first which are farthest away, calling to see the others on my return. The ride to Khandala is much of the way most picturesque. For several miles we are on the island on which Bombay is situated, the road lying in and near shallow bodies of water, with pleasant and rather fine-looking towns scattered along every few miles. The cocoanut and palm-trees are everywhere to be seen, with a profusion of cultivated flowers, especially around the stations and the dwellings of Europeans. Farming is being prosecuted all along, especially where irrigation can be used. Wheat is the great winter crop, but it looks very short in comparison with American wheat. There certainly is not an excessive growth of straw in this country. I have not learned what the average crop of wheat is in India, but in the fields I have thus far seen, I judge it not to be extremely heavy. When the fields have had little or no water, the crop looks light. I notice peas are pretty largely grown, though by no means a large variety. The vines are small and the pods very small; the peas, however, are of fair size, and taste very sweet. Where the fields are not blessed with irrigation they look parched and dead. The water is often supplied from small canals, and, again, is often pumped up or raised by ox-power, or man-power, by processes similar to those employed in Egypt.

Not many miles are traversed before ranges of hills, on either side of the railway, are reached, and they grow taller and more picturesque as the journey is continued southward. The ridges are often sharp and ragged, with frequent tall peaks and domes, some of them of a very striking appearance. On one of their high ridges is a singularly shaped rock, or mass of rock, which, at the distance it is from the railway — four or five miles — looks like a vast church or cathedral, with its spire at one end. The tall rocks along the route are worthy of notice, many of them being decidedly grand. At a distance of fifty miles from Bombay, we have made an ascent of some hundreds of feet, and the railway lies on the summit of a moderate ridge, with valleys on either side. This formation of country becomes more marked as we go south, and when we have reached the summit of the elevation—I think three thousand feet—we have passed by the side of valleys five hundred feet immediately below us, which almost makes one dizzy-headed to look down upon from the carriage windows. Many of these views are worthy of a better description than I can give them, as I must hurry on to the caves.

Khandala, a native village of five hundred inhabitants, was reached half an hour before sunset, in time for me to repair to the small hotel, kept by a native from Madras, who says he is a Roman Catholic, where I got an evening meal of bread and milk. For lodging I returned to the station house (the word depot is not used in India or England, for this purpose, but always station) to lodge. Let me inform you that, before starting out, I provided myself with a guttree, the native name for the kind of bed used by people here when traveling. It consists of a thick cotton quilt and a cotton pillow. The quilt is large enough to allow one to lie on one half and be covered with the other. It makes a very comfortable bed, and may be laid almost anywhere. The whole is rolled up tolerably snug and fastened with straps, and carried as one ordinary piece of baggage. This I used the first time at Khandala, spreading it on the wide seat in the waiting-room, where, but for the noise of frequently-arriving trains, I might have slept well. There were no musketoes. Now, then, wherever in India I travel, I can follow at least one of the injunctions of Jesus—take up my bed and walk.

My Hindoo friend, Tookaram Tatya, of Bombay, being on his way to Poonah, stopped over at Khandala, to visit the caves with me, which suited me far better than making the tour alone. He is an excellent and genial man, whose company is very agreeable, and it is vastly better to have a companion who can talk with the natives. After contracting for a tonga to call for us at four o'clock in the morning, we had only to utilize our guttrees, and take a good night's sleep. The reason for so early a start is to take advantage of the cool of the day, and to get back before the midday; for you must bear in mind that, for several hours during the middle of the day, the sun glares and burns without a moment's intermission, not a cloud being seen from one week to another.

Our tonga man was prompt, and by 4:30 in the morning we were on our way, four miles or more, to the caves. A tonga is a two-wheeled vehicle with two seats for two persons, the front seat facing forward, and the back one just the reverse, the passengers riding back to back. It is on springs, and does not ride badly. We had two horses, and as the roads in India are very good, we got along nicely, and I had a good opportunity to study the morning stars, and observe how closely they resemble the stars which shine in America. We passed over four miles of very smooth road, with rows of mangoe and other trees on each side, making a pleasant avenue all the way, till we came to a by-road over rocky ways, where we soon had to leave the tonga and walk nearly a mile. The sun was up when we reached the mountain range in which the caves are located, and we had to climb up five hundred feet of steep hillside to reach them. Here half a dozen padres, a low, idle order of priests, were in waiting to show us around the excavations, and especially to receive the coins in return which we might feel generous enough to dispense. Near the entrance to the main cave stands a small Siva temple with dim lights burning inside, and an image opposite the entrance. Before the door were three or four bells to call the worshipers to their duty. In close proximity was a nearly naked priest muttering prayers to Siva or some other god. He held out his hand for a few pices in payment for the prayers which he had probably muttered for our benefit. The whole thing reminded me of what I had seen in Catholic churches. Catholics and Siva-worshipers alike are busily uttering senseless prayers to somebody or something they know nothing about, which takes not the slightest notice of them, and which in all probability has no existence, and alike they both want money for their worthless services. Without money their prayers are faintly uttered, and probably reach but a short distance from the earth. Without money priests soon cease their labors and seem quite willing that those who will not fork over should go to hell and be damned. Priests are all about alike. The Christian priests, however, are the worst, for they are more exacting than pagan priests and it requires far larger sums of money to satisfy them.

THE CARLEE CAVES.

These are Buddhistic excavations, and are believed to have been executed in the Asoka period or about three hundred years before the Christian era. The chief cave is a Buddhistic temple, and said to be one of the largest and finest in India. It is hewn out of the solid trap rock. Including the portico, it is 140 feet in depth, forty-five feet in width, and twenty-five feet in hight, being vaulted overhead with wooden arches, something like the reversed ribs of a ship, but more round at the crown. These ribs are three inches thick, and more than a foot in depth. Why they were placed there is a little doubtful; possibly to attach some kind of ornamentation to. The roof rests on forty-one pillars, fifteen of those on each side having a tall base, an octagonal shaft, and a richly-molded capital, on which kneel two elephants, each bearing two figures, generally a man and woman, but sometimes two women, all well executed. At the rear of the temple is an altar fifteen feet in diameter, and more than that in hight. On the top of it is a cupola, or square altar, supporting a linga, with the remains of a large umbrella over it, suspended from above. This altar has a passage behind it several feet wide. Outside the rows of pillars on the sides are aisles, giving the place the appearance of a cathedral. In the portico, fifty-two feet wide, are sculptures of Buddha and his followers, several of the figures being nude and of more than life size, in bas-relief. An elephant of life size is also sculptured on each side. The entrance portion rests on four columns, two of which are joined to the solid rock. In front, on one side stands the "lion pillar," so called from having four lions sculptured upon it, standing back to back on the capital. The doorway under the portico is through a screen, above which rises an imposing arch. The whole structure is well preserved, none of the sculptures being mutilated.

Several other smaller excavations are in the immediate vicinity. We were directed up through a narrow aperture and a difficult ascent to what seems to have been a school-room where the young novitiates and students were once educated, with cloisters and private apartments where the Buddhistic monks resided. The figure of Buddha is several times sculptured on the rock. This school-room is some thirty feet square and about ten feet high, with chambers and side rooms. It is some forty feet higher than the main temple, and has but little ornamentation connected with it.

The other excavations are not particularly large or fine, and some of them are so difficult to reach that we did not make the attempt. I marveled, nevertheless, at the patience, perseverance, and religious devotion that caused all this work to be done. No idol-worship has ever been practiced in the Buddhistic temples, and where Buddha's image is sculptured it is not worshiped as a god, but is made in a manner similar to paintings, which are executed among Christians, in honor and in memory of this great religious teacher and reformer.

THE KENNERY CAVES.

We were back to Khandala in time for the trains running each way, and here my friend Tookaram and myself parted company, he going on to Poonah, and I returning to Tanna, about twenty miles from Bombay, the point where I leave the railway for the Kennery caves, having ample time to look about the town and visit the excellent prison located there. I again took lodging at the station house, spreading my guttree as before, making arrangements through the station master for an ox-cart and a guide to call me at 5 in the morning, to accompany me to the caves, six miles away. I hoped there would be the same promptness in this case as on the preceding morning, but I was disappointed. I was up betimes waiting for my men and my conveyance, but they did not put in an appearance till 7 o'clock, when my patience had become nearly exhausted, knowing that as I had several miles to walk in reaching and returning from the caves it would subject me to traveling with the burning midday rays of the terrible Indian sun pouring mercilessly down upon my defenseless head. I scolded some, but it was wasted upon the benighted heathen, who could comprehend my language and gestures but little more than to understand I was displeased.

I had presumed to hope, also, that the ox-cart in which I was to ride eight miles, going and coming, might be one of those cosy, comfortable spring carts with a pleasant covering, which I had seen in Bombay; but judge of my disappointment when I saw a very common, rough cart, with springs, without a seat, without a top, save three bamboo bows with a blue rag, scantily reaching across the top and indifferently secured. I endeavored to submit philosophically to the situation, and placed myself recumbent upon the pile of straw within the cart and meditated upon my good fortune in having some straw to sit and lie upon, while my very dark driver and guide were urging the unwilling cattle along the smooth roadway without the precincts of Tanna, a very fair Indian town, of near 10,000 inhabitants. We met many companies and groups of scantily-clad natives on their way into the town, some with carts, but more carrying burdens of produce, etc., upon their heads. That is the almost universal mode of carrying burdens here (balanced upon the head), and men and woman march along, with head erect, with what looks to be a weight of half a hundred pounds upon their heads, though the natives are not a muscular people. They are generally well formed, but muscle nor flesh predominates. But they are early risers. I have observed that the peasant class are up before daylight in the morning, hurrying off to their work, whether it be farming, carting, or carrying burdens. They perhaps are unable to accomplish as much in a given time as Americans, but they are willing to commence in good season before the sun is up. They are often to be seen working in the fields while it is yet dark.

There are no fences in India, save a cactus hedge now and then, or a wire fence along by the sides of the railway. The cactus in use here for hedges is entirely different from the prickly pear hedge I saw so frequently in Syria and Egypt; this is a smaller, slimmer variety, its branches being almost round, like the limbs of a shrub, but of a light-green color; it has no other leaves. The division lines between the tillers of different patches and sections of ground are usually marked off by a ridge of earth or sod, thrown up like a small stone wall. Sometimes ditches are used for the same purpose, and sometimes corner and line stones are set up. The land is partly owned by government or rajahs, who have large possessions like the lords in England. In either case it is rented or leased out to the tiller for all the rent that can be obtained for it; and as the applicants for land are almost without number, the demand for ground to till is active. It is often more than the toiling tiller can do to meet the rent exacted of him by his avaricious landlord.

The smooth road continued for nearly three miles, when we turned off into a by-road, leading toward the caves. This road has never been worked, nor have the boulders and other stones, which abound in great numbers, been removed out of the way. Our way then led toward the range of hills in which the caves are located. Among these hills a young growth of forest trees is coming on, much of it being what in this country is styled "jungle"—a wild and thick growth of trees, shrubs, and weeds, tangled more or less together. India was once a heavily timbered country, but the wood was long ago cut off for fuel, and but a small part of it has been allowed to grow up again. Among the mountains and hills, however, there seems to be little objection to the new growth; but the good price which fuel commands incites the slaughter of the forests while the trees are still young. I noticed on my way to the caves many buffaloes and oxen working like pack-mules at carrying wood out to the roadway. A kind of saddle is put upon the back of the buffalo, and a large bundle of wood, five or six feet long, is fastened on each side, attached together by ropes, and secured upon the animal. The buffaloes and cattle march along in single file, and seem to attend well to their business, requiring little guidance or attention. We passed a number of small native villages where a dozen or more families reside near together; this being the custom in India, rather than living scattered over the country on farms as in Europe and America. This is perhaps rendered necessary on account of the abundance of wild animals, particularly tigers, throughout India. The houses of the laborers in the farming districts are of the most primitive character, consisting of corner stakes of bamboo, or some other wood, driven into the ground, with a cheap siding of plaited grass or flags, making a rude matting, and a roof of the same material or of straw, in the form of thatch. As they never have frost in this part of India, little protection is needed from the cold, a shade from the sun and dew, and a place to keep the small store of simple eatables, such as rice and other grains, which the mass of people subsist upon, being about all that is required in the way of a habitation. The floors are the native earth as a rule. Little or no furniture is used. Chairs are almost unknown among this people; their sitting is squatting, with the feet placed firmly on the earth and the posteriors brought in close proximity to the heels and nearly to the ground. This is the favorite mode of sitting at ease with both males and females, and they will often occupy this position for hours together, as we would sit upon chairs or sofas. I have often wondered how they can rest, sitting as they do. It is well, perhaps, that I am not an Indian, for I could not sit in that position for any length of time without positive pain; my knees are too close and stiff for that.

In approaching the vicinity of the caves we passed near Vehur Lake, which is the reservoir from whence Bombay's supply of water is obtained. It is a pretty sheet of water several miles in length and breadth. I saw several native women going there, with large bottles on their heads, after water for family use. I think it is often carried several miles. The women use earthen bottles containing from three to five gallons, while male water-carriers more frequently use bottles of the skins of goats or hogs, simply dressed or undressed, sewed up in their original shape, and carried upon the hip or back, with a strap passing over the shoulder. Some of these skin-bottles contain ten to fifteen gallons, and make the bhestee—the native name for water-carriers—toil heavily to transport them about during the entire day. Streets are often sprinkled by the means of these skin-bottles, manipulated by the natives.

When we had progressed over the rocks within something more than two miles of the caves, the cart arrived at the end of its journey, and the rest of the way had to be done on foot. The driver and cattle remaining behind, the young guide and myself made our way through the burning sun over rougher roads, and up and down steeper hills, through uninhabited woods and jungles. I think the guide was not very well acquainted with the course to be pursued, for three times he had to retrace his steps, necessitating my doing the same, though the perspiration was streaming down my face and back, and I was sighing for the cold breezes which you in America at this season of the year are enjoying to the full. I felt that it was enough to walk the weary road once over without being compelled to travel it twice, with the unpleasant uncertainty that we were not going right. I told my young guide that he did not know his duty, but all my eloquence was wasted upon him, for he could scarcely comprehend a word I said.

It was not very reassuring to notice that he was afraid of meeting snakes, for several times before going through patches of dead leaves he stopped to see if any cobras showed themselves, or to allow them to make their exit. Cobras and other serpents are extremely numerous, and as the bite of a cobra is more fatal than a bullet from a pistol, I was not particularly anxious to meet any of them. I heard the rattle of snakes two or three times, and once I saw, but five or six feet away, a snake four feet in length, but whether it was a cobra I cannot say; I am sure, however, he did not bite me.

Once I heard an outcry of some wild animal, and looking in the direction from whence the sound came, I had a glance at an animal on the outer part of the limb of a tall tree, leaping to a lower one. I did not see it well enough to decide what kind of an animal it was. I had heard that tigers are very numerous, and that in the Bombay presidency alone 30,000 persons are annually killed by them. I felt a repugnance for a close acquaintance with a tiger, and decidedly wished not to be one of the 30,000 and thus make up the yearly quota. I said to the guide: "What is that?" I think the tone of my voice conveyed more to his dark mind than the words themselves, for he was on the lookout, and his countenance seemed to relax somewhat when he uttered the word "wander." I happened not to know what a wander is, but learned when I returned to Bombay that it means monkey. I have ever since been glad that is was a monkey, though a very large one, rather than a tiger, which animals are not noted for their amiable behavior, or for respecting the rights of others.

But, oh, how hot the sun became, and how I wished the cave temples would draw near! My head began to throb and beat, and I was decidedly of the opinion that I would prefer to be reclining in one of the rock temples in the eternal shades, rather than to be toiling in the burning sun of this land of perpetual summer. We came to a little stream of water which was trickling down into the lake, and I bathed my head, face, and neck, and wet my pocket-handkerchief and wore it in the crown of my hat to prevent sunstroke, which calamity is very usual here to new comers. As much as I think of the sun, as much as I revere him as the biggest single body of matter I know of, I did not wish him to strike me in his wrath, especially when off among the rocks and hills so far away from home. Those two miles seemed the longest of any I ever traveled, and I will not disguise from you the fact that I was glad to reach the range of rocky hills in which the hundred Kennery caves are located—for there are a hundred of them, big and little.

The excavations are at different altitudes, in the face of high, precipitous, and dark-colored trap rock, steps cut in the rock leading from one story to another, and from one temple to another. These are Buddhistic cave temples, and are supposed to have been excavated some time after the reign of the great Buddhistic ruler in India, Asoka, about three hundred years before the Christian era, and long before the Buddhists were expelled from India by the more orthodox Brahmans. The largest of the hundred is about the same size as the one seen at Carlee, and has a colossal figure of Buddha on each side of the portico, carved in bas-relief in the solid rock, the figures being not less than fifteen feet high. The temple proper is ninety feet long by forty broad, with a vaulted nave of forty feet in hight, resting on thirty-four pillars, and flanked by sides of a lower elevation. The pillars, cut in a bold style, are octagonal, and fully fifteen feet in hight. This largest excavation is called a vihara, or church for performing worship in. In the rear part is a dagoba, or solid dome, nineteen feet high, and forty-nine feet in circumference. Many inscriptions are to be seen in different places, said to be in the ancient Pali language. The total length of the temple, including portico, is one hundred and forty-two feet. On the capitals of the pillars are sculptures, similar to those of Carlee. There are numerous sculptures of the disciples and followers of Buddha in the portico, much like those in the one before described.

Though I had traveled far to see this temple, and found it interesting, I was constrained to recline in its shades and get some rest and breath before exploring it at much length; I felt nearly overpowered by the heat. There are communications in the rocks between many of the larger caves, and in some of them are figures of Buddha, dagobas, etc. Several of the excavations are viharas, or places of worship, while others were monasteries, school-rooms, or places of abode. Some of the smaller excavations are not more than ten feet in length, some twenty, some forty, and some sixty. A great amount of cutting was done to make all these excavations, and for many hundred years they have been entirely unused. I did not climb to up to every one, but saw enough to impress me with the extent of the great work done here. Before the entrance of the larger viharas are reservoirs, cut in the rock, to contain water for use in the worshiping ceremonies. Some of them must hold hundreds of barrels, and the water is sweet and good. I was very thirsty, and gladly availed myself of some Buddhistic water. I took it in the primitive way, conveying it from the cistern to my mouth by my hand, converted into a cup, and I did not mind it, though the operation had to be repeated many times over. These caves are in a very lonely retreat, no one living within several miles, and no one in sight or anywhere around, save my guide and myself. How changed, I contemplated, since this locality was the resort of hundreds of pious and devoted Buddhists, who regarded these excavations with as much awe as a sincere Catholic regards his most holy and grand cathedrals. These are older than any Christian church in the world, and are bound to continue in permanent good order when every Christian church now standing will be leveled to the earth.

There was not a little satisfaction in climbing over these rocks and penetrating into these numerous excavations; but the day was passing, and the station must be regained in time for the evening train for Bombay, and I would have to hurry back for that purpose; besides, my guide exhibited not a little impatience for me to finish my explorations and return to the bullock cart. In fact, he urged me several times. The sun was now at the meridian, and was pouring the heat down in its intensest rays. I longed for the old bullock cart, and would have given several rupees could I at once be transferred to it. I remembered the pile of straw, and yearned to be lying prostrate upon it. But there was no help for me but to make the return journey of two or three miles—they seemed to me fully equal to ten—back to it. We started out, but I had never felt the heat of the sun so before. The weather gets very hot in New York, in Cincinnati, and in Louisville, in all of which cities I have resided; I have traversed their streets in the sun when the mercury stood at one hundred; in Kentucky I once walked thirty miles in the dust with the thermometer at ninety-six; but it seemed to me I had never felt the sun burn right into one's head like this. The heat, perhaps, was not above ninety degrees, but the sun glared like the mouth of a furnace. I soaked my handkerchief sopping wet, and placed it on my throbbing head, and guide and I started for the cart. How I did wish myself there! The perspiration was most profuse, and my old head burnt and thumped as though there was a small trip-hammer in it. I thought I should fall to the earth, and really was fearful of sunstroke. My guide hurried on, but I could not follow him; and when the good shade of a large tree was reached, I lay under it and tried to get breath and repose. The guide would return and urge me on. When I thought it would be prudent, I again tried the weary path, and thought I would gladly give half my kingdom to see that dilapidated old cart. When I could go no longer, I availed myself of another friendly tree, and lay upon stones, on the turf, or even almost in the dirt itself, so I could recline in the shade. The wicked guide would call me, again urging me on, perhaps to my death. "Ah," thought I, "what contrasts there are in this world! While the people at home, in Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, etc., are almost frezing to death at this very moment, with the mercury nearly congealed to a solid state, here, on this 23d day of January, I am nearly burning up with the intense glaring and heat of the sun's rays!" Again and again my dark, copper-colored guide returned and urged me to renewed exertions, himself not caring for old Sol's fiery glances, and being only anxious to get back to Tanna, and be handling the rupees I was to give him and the cartman for their miserable services. Again and again would he continue to impel me on, alive or dead. But there is a limit to all things; there is a point at which patience ceases to be a virtue. At last I turned upon my tormentor and cried: "Ho! you heartless, horrid, heathen Hindoo, how can you hold that I can stand these heated, vertical rays of old Sol like yourself? You are as bad as the crafty, cruel, crushing Christians of my country, who crowded me nearly to death, and would gladly have taken my life. You nearly do the same, when you urge me through these fiery darts and glances of the god of day. Know you not that prudence requires that I should favor myself a little, and not hasten on through this deadly, burning sun, even if the station is not reached in time for the train? Though you can stand the heat equal to a salamander, and are as unsusceptible to its powers as the cinders of a furnace or the scoria of a volcano, can you not understand that I am not calculated to endure the fires of hell, and that Yahweh himself would be more cruel than usual to drive me out in this burning, killing sun? Cease your tormenting, and let me rest yet a few minutes longer."

But again my rare oratory was wasted on that son of the blistering plains of India. He even understood me not, and he cared not for my burning head and my fusing brains. He still urged me on to reach the bullock cart. He would make an excellent hand to take turns with Lucifer himself in stirring up those fires in the infernal regions, and to punch back poor helpless souls when in their struggles they manage to get a part of the way out of the boiling, seething lake! and all to please and glorify the good, patient, merciful, long-suffering Yahweh, who planned it all up while sitting in listless idleness, in vacuity, darkness, and eternal frost and gloom for thousands of billions of ages before he made the earth and the sun from nothing; long before he made that accursed snake and that worse than deadly fruit to damn his own offspring forever and forever! How could it be otherwise that those fervid thoughts should course through my burning brain, when by the ideal thermometer it stood at 600° above the melting point? But being the soul of patience, of endurance, and the disposition to continue to try and endeavor so long as life remains, I again and again listened to my dusky tormentor, and made renewed efforts with him to reach that miserable bullock cart; and, as surely as I am alive to-day, after continuing those efforts long enough, with my face looking like a beef's liver, my shirt like a dish-rag, my poor feet worn to a blister and almost to the bleeding point, that old cart was reached, and never was I so glad before.

But judge of my grief when, after reaching the cart, I found the bullocks had eaten up the straw, and that I had nothing but the hard boards to lie upon, for I was too far gone to sit up. I had thought it was very good of the cart-driver to put in the straw for me, but I was forced to withdraw the credit I had thus awarded him, for I now learned that the straw was designed for the hump-shouldered bullocks to feed upon while I was exploring the caves, and not for my comfort at all. But I was by this time almost indifferent to everything. I was just able to climb into the old cart, and at once assumed the recumbent position; and the cattle, with their faces turned toward home, and their paunches, filled with the straw which had been my bed, rushed mercilessly on over boulders, rocks, and miniature precipices, until I was black and blue from head to heels, and nothing but a sack of jelly save the few bones which stubbornly refused to become jelly under any consideration. If I only had been rich cream there would have been the finest lot of fresh butter at Tanna that had arrived there for many a year, but it so happened that I was composed of baser material; as it was, however, there was an arrival of several gallons of melted soap-grease, etc., but it was received in very bad order.

Possibly some of you may regard my language as bordering on the extravagant. Of course I am the last man to indulge in extravagant and unwarranted language, and know not how to make apology for it. All I can say in extenuation of this business, and to pacify those of you who do not like my description is, Just try it yourselves. If you will only endure all I endured, and submit to all I submitted to, to be melted as I was melted, I am fain to think you will decide that my language is a long way within bounds. But that original remark that there is a limit to all things will bear repeating once more. We reached the station, I gathered myself up, and took a good wash. The heathen Hindoos received their five rupees. I was able to board the train when it came along, and while the sun was still above Malabar hill I had reached Bombay, several degrees better than a dead man, though I wished not immediately another such day's experience.

THE CAVES OF ELLORA.

I had intended to visit these renowned caves, as several wrote me before leaving home not to fail seeing the caves of Ellora; I did not intend to, but they are about in the center of India, and learning that a visit to them would necessitate a ride of about eighty miles in a bullock cart, and my experience at the Kennery caves being indelibly stamped upon my memory, my usually good courage failed me, and I concluded to forego this exquisite pleasure and take in lieu thereof Chaunder Dutt's description of the Ellora cave temples, which I will now very kindly transcribe for your benefit:

"Ellora is a town of the Deccan, near Dawlutabad, which is near the center of India. About a mile west of the city is a chain of mountains of reddish granite, out of which the cave temples are excavated. The mountains have an amphitheater form, and are scooped out from top to bottom, and are filled with innumerable chambers. The circuit of the excavations is about two leagues, and includes numerous galleries and rows of pillars which support apartments lying one above another, with steps and porticoes leading to them, and bridges of rock over canals hewn out of the stone. The chief temple is called Kaitasa, or the habitation of Mahadeva. It is the most wonderful of all the cave temples of the world, and is unlike others generally in this, that the rock has been cut away both externally and internally, so that it looks as complete as if it had been erected on a plain. Its ante-chamber is 138 feet wide by 88 feet long, and has many rows of pillars and adjoining chambers. The great portico comes next, and leads over a bridge into a huge chamber 247 feet long and 150 feet broad, in the middle of which the chief temple stands. The temple is 103 feet long by 56 wide, and has a hight of 100 feet in pyramidal form. It is hollowed out to the hight of seventeen feet, is supported by four rows of pillars with colossal elephants, and is covered with sculptures. Among the other divisions of the excavation is an upper-storied temple for the avatars of Vishnu, the roof of which is supported by sixty-four square-based pillars, eight in each row; in another direction are to be seen the figures of Indra and his wife; and all over the temple are figures and symbols of Hindoo worship, though there are others also which resemble objects of Buddha veneration. The number of excavated figures is altogether very large, and the figures are executed rudely indeed, but all in the boldest style. Tradition credits the excavation to Viswakarma, the divine architect, and one of the chief temples bears his name. They are all quite in Egyptian style and dimensions, and are justly regarded among the most marvelous works executed by man. Light is admitted into each excavation at its entrance, and carried to the inner compartments by means of great arches or windows, and the deepening gloom adds greatly to the sublimity of their character."

Ferguson, in describing these rock temples of Ellora, says there are thirty of them—ten dedicated to Buddha, fourteen Brahmanical, and six not classed. He says the externals are elegant and simple. Two of the pillars in the church already described are very rich and handsome. Twenty-eight of the others are octagon near the base, and above change to sixteen sides. There is a large figure of Buddha surrounded by flying figures and genii. Without these is a court, with colonnades, and a vihara attached. Of the duo avatara, or ten avatars, he says the upper story is splendid, the hall one hundred feet square, with forty-four pillars, equally divided over the floor. A temple is dedicated to Siva and Parvati, with a lingam on the right hand side. A statue of Vishnu is also there, though afterward they, or rather their worshipers, became very antagonistic, as they remain to this day, hating each other with intense hatred. He speaks very highly of the sculpture, and pronounces it the finest in India. He mentions the figure of the Prince of Evil, Ravana, and its florid appearance. He also mentions a figure of Siva and Parvati, represented as playing the game of choupets—something like draughts. It is not improbable, perhaps, that the gods and goddesses find time to indulge in many kinds of games. The pillars have what are called cushion capitals.

Of the vimana kylas, he says it is large and finely sculptured, with an octagonal dome, the interstices being filled with statues and sculptures. Of the cloister kylas he says the pile is 150 feet by 270; the pillars, octagonal, support one hundred feet of roof. He mentions the sculptured groups as exhibiting strange, wild, and inharmonious fancies. Of the bas-relief kylas he says there is a great amount of sculpture, indicating great labor and patience. One piece is Ravana's conquest of Ceylon; the campaigns of Rama are also given, the same taken from the Ramayana. Vishnu is also sculptured on Garuda, and also Vishnu and his consort Saravasti. Again, Giant Dwarpel, or porter, guarding Christna, and behind him Arjuna with his bow, as well as figures of Indra and the other ancient gods. He describes all the sculptures as fine and large. I am sorry I could not have seen them all, but they are hard to reach.

THE CAVES OF ARJUNTA

Are still more inaccessible. They are thirty in number, and Buddhistic in character, and were doubtless excavated when Buddhism was the state religion of India. Four of them are said to be churches or places of worship, while the most of the remainder were monasteries, the abodes of Buddhistic monks, centuries before there were Christian monks or any Christianity by that name. These caves are in a circular, perpendicular ravine on the southern side of the valley of the Tapty. They vary from thirty to sixty-eight feet in depth. Some are nearly square; some have twenty columns or more; some of which are square with bands; some round and richly carved. They are represented by Ferguson as being finely wrought, rich with sculptures and details.

Besides the rock temples and religious caves already described, there are many others scattered over India, some of which are represented as being very fine. At Chillumbaram there is said to be a very large temple, the highest of any in India now extant. The great pagoda at Tanjore is said to be the finest pyramidal temple in India. This is also very high, reaching an elevation of two hundred feet. There is at or near Mahabalipooram, on the Coromandel coast (the southwestern portion of India), a Hindoo temple quite in the Egyptian style, which seems to have had six associate temples, which, however, have sunk down and been swallowed up by the sea.

Egypt excels in pyramids and massive constructed temples and tombs, but India is by no means behind. Dutt says the monuments which mark Indian civilization are mainly of two kinds; (1) constructed temples and other buildings similar to those existing in other countries, and (2) rock chambers, of which some are subterraneous, while others are hewn on the surface of rocks, or are partly under ground and partly on the surface. Of the former it may generally be said that they are of a style similar to the Egyptian, particularly with respect to courts with pillars and cloisters, and, so far as southern India is concerned, in size also. The temples in northern and central India are said to be smaller than they otherwise would be but for the existence of Mohammedan intolerance, which, after it gained power in the country, acted to prevent the building of large temples by the believers in religions antagonistic to its own. They wished their own mosques to excel in size, and they would not allow Hindoo temples to surpass them. Thus have religions and their gods ever been quarreling and fighting each other, and thus they will probably continue to do until men learn wisdom enough to dispense with such mischievous and useless luxuries.

The climate of India is far less favorable than that of Egypt for the preservation of sculptures and carvings on rocks. In this country, with four months of constant rain every year, followed by a burning sun and fierce winds, it cannot be expected that fine work cut in stone will endure perfectly as in Egypt where it never rains, and where there is even scarcely any dampness in the air. But for this fact it is not at all improbable that there would now be seen in India many monuments reaching back to a date much earlier than the temples that do exist, but which for obvious reasons have crumbled and moldered away.

AN INDIA PRISON.

I remarked that I visited the prison at Tanna. In consequence of the limited penitentiary experience I have had forced upon me by the very pious and god-loving Christians of America, I presume I take more interest in prisons and prisoners than I would otherwise feel. So, while waiting at Tanna for the night to pass away so I could take an early start for the caves as narrated, after looking through the oriental town, watching the bazars, the mechanics, and the busy people who seem to be hurrying through the world about as fast as their brethren in Europe and America, I directed my gharree driver to take me to the prison. A gharree is a native carriage, with four wheels, drawn by one horse or by two, with two seats inside, on the plan of a hackney ceach, though of a plainer character. I sent in my card to the prison-keeper, Mr. Smith (I had heard the name before), and he very politely sent word that I should be admitted. When I was conducted to his presence I found him very genial and pleasant, and a fine specimen of the well-preserved, venerable, "fine old English gentleman." It was Sunday, and the men, as the prison is under Christian superintendence, were not at work; but Mr. Smith had the prisoners out in ranks in the several yards or courts of the prison, inspecting them, to see which he should decide to send away to fill a requisition for three hundred men to go a few hundred miles north to do some excavating on some public works. I accompanied the prison-keeper and had a fine opportunity to see the men as they stood up in rows for examination. Mr. Smith took pains to point out to me the most notorious characters, giving an account of the crimes they had committed. One had made a kind of spirit which produces intoxication, manufactured by soaking a certain kind of flowers in water and allowing it to ferment. Government does not allow any sort of whisky-making to be carried on without its sanction, so these men, as a matter of course, were arrested, tried, and sent to prison for a term of one or two years. Some were in for petty larceny, like stealing chickens, lambs, and small articles. Others were in for fighting and assault and battery, and these were a low class of prisoners, like the cultivators of the rill farms, who are considered the lowest part of the Hindoo race, having less intelligence, less enterprise, and less civilization than any other part of the inhabitants of the country. A number were in for being at the head of bands of prowlers, brigands, and robbers, whose homes were in the mountains in the northern part of India, and who would swoop down at night and rob a village, and secure what plunder they might, not wishing to murder if they could help it, but not hesitating to do so were they driven to the necessity. Two or three grizzly old men were pointed out to me who had been captains of such bands of brigands, and a terror to peaceful people in the vicinities where they dwelt. These were in for ten years, unless they had also been guilty of murder, in which case they were sentenced for life. I was sorry to find that several were there for murder, and these were nearly all serving out a life sentence.

I saw two men occupying adjoining cells who had been tried for the murder of an aunt of one of the culprits, the other acting as an accomplice. The poor woman had a small sum of money, some twenty rupees, and this the worthless nephew coveted and induced the other man to assist him in obtaining it. It probably was not their original intention to commit murder. Throwing a quilt or something of the kind over their victim, one held her while the other searched for the small sum of money; but in their anxiety they smothered the old lady to death. They had been found guilty of murder in a lower court, and an appeal had been taken to the high court of the realm, where the verdict of the lower court had been confirmed, and an application had been made to the governor of the presidency for pardon; but as he had refused to interfere with the decision of the courts nothing was left for the wretched culprits but to hang; and Mr. Smith said it was his duty to break the news to the miserable criminals that they might prepare for the death which must take place on the Friday of the same week. He caused the men to be let outside their cells, when the younger one, the nephew of the murdered woman, began to make complaint of the pains he had in his limbs, and the aches in other parts of the body. "Well," said Mr. Smith, "your case is probably a bad one, but take courage, for in a few days you will no longer be troubled with those pains;" and then he told them that a pardon had been refused, and they must die. The older man seemed perfectly unmoved and indifferent at the intelligence, while the young man at once forgot his pains, seeming to think he would be willing to endure them several years longer, and he cried and bewailed his sad fate in a most piteous manner, seeming utterly broken down, and protesting his innocence, and that he had no intention to commit murder. We left the poor fellow again locked up in his cell, crying and lamenting in a touching manner.

I was glad to learn that, as bad as the crimes were for which these sable wretches had been committed, there was not one in the whole lot who had been sent to prison for mailing a copy of "Cupid's Yokes." Yes, India is saved that deep disgrace, and America, the land of the free and the home of the brave, is the only country on which the sun shines that has a man vile enough to commit that crime, and she is the only country hard-hearted enough to send him to prison for it. You, perhaps, are able to judge how the blush of shame suffused my face to remember, as I stood there before those culprits, that I was a citizen (I am not sure, however, whether I am still a citizen) of a country which had among its inhabitants one man capable of such a deed as mailing "Cupid's Yokes." There is one consoling fact in connection with this sad affair, and that is that the great country of the United States of America, by virtue of her salaried judges and her highest courts, and in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association and the perjured villain Comstock, severely punishes such crimes by sending to prison at hard labor with counterfeiters, robbers, and murders, old men who have the temerity to deposit in the

"Were the Fathers Competent?"

ROSEVILLE, COL., May 2, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER some of the writings of the Christian fathers Jerome, Eusebius, Victorinus, Origen, Tertullian, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and "Papias, bishop of Hieropolis in Asia, whom Irenæus speaks of as hearer of John and a disciple of Polycarp."

The present reason for asking the above favor is this: A pious friend gave me a little book called "The Bible from Heaven," by one D. M. Canright (Adventist), in which those "holy" writers are quoted as if their words are superior to a demonstrated fact. I hav somehow imbibed the notion that those pious historians were colossal liars, and that their works prove it. Shakspere makes Othello say,

> "The anthropophagi, and men whose heads
> Do grow beneath their shoulders."

Didn't Shakspere get his idea of men with dogs' heads and men with no heads, and men with but one leg that "were exceedingly swift and lived by the chase," from those holy fathers?

F. R. STEPHENSON.

Perhaps the best reply we can make to our friend is to cite a chapter from Keeler's "Short History of the Bible." To show what the early church authorities believed will show what kind of men they were, and whether their intelligence was such as to justify the world to-day in believing anything they might testify as to the genuinness and authenticity of scripture. In so important a matter as a universal and unimpeachable religion, by which the world is to be saved or lost, God should hav chosen men of intelligence, of knowledge of the laws of the universe, men great of head and heart. Did he do so? Let us see:

"Since the early Christian fathers originated the theory that the books of the New Testament are inspired, the question arises, Were they competent to do so? The popular idea is that they were learned, profound, venerable men, worthy of the highest respect; and so vigorously has this been enforced that one of the charges on which Servetus was burned to death by John Calvin was that he had spoken disrespectfully of the fathers. The facts are quite the reverse. The early Christian fathers were extremely ignorant and superstitious; and they were singularly incompetent to deal with the supernatural. The men who laid the foundation of the canon were Irenæus (A.D. 200), Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 210), and Tertullian (A.D. 220), and of them Prof. Davidson says:

"The three fathers of whom we are speaking had neither the ability nor inclination to examin the genesis of documents surrounded with an apostolic halo. No analysis of their authenticity and genuinness was seriously attempted. . . . The ends which they had in view, their polemic motivs, their uncritical, inconsistent assertions, their want of sure data, detract from their testimony. Their decisions were much more the result of pious feeling, biased by the theological speculations of the times, than the conclusions of a sound judgment. The very arguments they use to establish certain conclusions show weakness of perception.

"The infancy of the canon was cradled in an uncritical age, and rocked with traditional ease. Conscientious care was not directed from the first to the well-authenticated testimony of eye-witnesses. Of the three fathers who contributed most to its early growth. Irenæus was credulous and blundering, Tertullian passionate and one-sided, and Clement of Alexandria, imbued with the treasures of Greek wisdom, was mainly occupied with ecclesiastical ethics. . . [Their] assertions show both ignorance and exaggeration."

"Some citations will illustrate their mental characteristics. The reader is familiar with the fable of the phenix, which was said to renew its life every five hundred years. Clement of Rome (A.D. 100) thought it had an actual existence, and he asserted that it was typical of the resurrection. Tertullian believed the same thing. Celsus, the noted antichristian writer, used this fact to illustrate the credulity of the early Christians, and Origen defended the fable rather than accept the just criticism. The writer of the epistle of Barnabas believed an ancient superstition that the hyena changed its sex every year, being alternately male and female; that a hare has as many young as it was years old; that a weasel conceived with its mouth; that the reason why men should eat only animals with a cloven hoof was because the righteous people lived in this world, but had expectations in the next. Justin Martyr (A.D. 150) believed in demons. He said that they were the offspring of angels who loved the daughters of men; that insane people (demoniacs) were possessed and tortured by the souls of the wicked who had died in their sins; and that this was a proof of the immortality of the soul. He said that the food of angels was manna. Athenagoras (A.D. 168) declared that the strong belief of Christians was that angels had been distributed by the logos throughout the universe, and that they were kept busy regulating the whole. Some of the angels loved the daughters of men, and fell, and thus were begotten giants or demons. These last roamed about the world, performing the evil deeds peculiar to their natures. Theophilus (A.D. 180) said that the pains of women in child-birth and the fact that serpents crawl on their bellies were proofs that the account of the fall, as given in Genesis, was true. Tertullian believed that the hyena changed its sex; and that the stag renewed its youth by eating poisonous snakes; that eclipses and comets were signs of God's anger and forerunners of national disasters; that volcanoes were openings into hell, and that the volcanic condition was a punishment inflicted on the mountains to serve as a warning to the wicked; that demons sent diseases upon the bodies of men, blighted apples and grain, and produced accidents and untimely death. He said that a corpse in a cemetery once kindly moved to make room for another corpse to place beside it. He invited the heathen magistrates to 'summon before their tribunal any person possessed with a devil; and if the evil spirit, when exorcised by any Christian whatsoever, did not own himself to be a devil, as truly as in other places he would falsely call himself a god, not daring to tell a lie to a Christian, then they should take the life of that Christian.' Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 220) said that hailstorms, tempests, and plagues were caused by demons; that credulity was necessary to render faith easy; and that events in the life of Abraham were typical and prophetical of arithmetic and astronomy. He kindly allowed that the Jews and Gentiles would hav the gospel preached to them in hell. Clement's imagination was naturally lascivious. His chapter on the immodesty of pagan women in the bath betrays the hatred of the canaille for the upper classes, and shows that, if a bishop in the church could use such language, the early Christians of Alexandria must hav been from the very lowest grades of society. While thus indignant at the supposed wickedness of the heathen, he wrote a book so unseemly that his English editors did not venture to translate it, and in it he quotes probably more from the Bible than in any other of his books.

"Origen (A.D. 254) said the sun, moon, and stars were living creatures, endowed with reason and free will, and occasionally inclined to sin; he was not certain whether their souls were created at the same time with their bodies or existed before, nor whether they would be released from their bodies at the end of the world, or not. Their light was from knowledge and wisdom reflected from the eternal light. That they had free will he proved by quoting from Job. xxv, 5; and that they were rational creatures he inferred from the fact that they move. 'As the stars move with so much order and method,' he says, 'that under no circumstances whatever does their course seem to be disturbed, is it not the extreme of absurdity to suppose that so much order, so much observance of disciplin and method, could be demanded from or fulfilled by irrational beings?' The sun, moon, and stars, according to him, were 'subject to vanity,' and they prayed to God through his only begotten son. Famin, the blighting of vines and fruit trees, and the destruction of beasts and men, were all the work of demons. Lactantius (A.D. 325) believed that demons entered men and injured them through the viscera, producing diseases and mental distempers, but that the sign of the cross would drive them away. As to the notion that the earth was round he said:

"About the antipodes also one can neither hear nor speak without laughter. It is asserted as something serious that we should believe that there are men who hav their feet opposit to ours. The ravings of Anaxgoras are more tolerable, who said that the snow was black.

"How is it with those who imagin that there are antipodes opposit to our footsteps? Do they say anything to the purpose? Or is there any one so senseless as to believe that there are men whose footsteps are higher than their heads? or that the things which with us are in a recumbent position, with them hang in an inverted direction? that crops and trees grow downward? that the rains, and snow, and hail fall upward to the earth? And does any one wonder that [the] hanging gardens [of Semiramis at Babylon] are mentioned among the seven wonders of the world, when philosophers make hanging fields, and seas, and cities, and mountains? . . .

"What steps of argument led them to the idea of the antipodes? They saw the courses of the stars traveling toward the west; they saw that the sun and the moon always set toward the same quarters, and rise from the same. But since they did not perceive what contrivance regulated their courses, nor how they returned from the west to the east, . . . they thought that the world is round like a ball, and they fancied . . . that the stars and sun, when they hav set, by the very rapidity of the motion of the world are borne back to the east. . . . It followed, therefore, from this rotundity of the heavens, that the earth was inclosed in the midst of its curved surface. But if this were so, the earth also itself must be a globe. . . But if the earth also were round, it must necessarily happen that it should present the same appearance to all parts of the heaven. . . And if this were so, then the last consequence also followed, that there would be no part of the earth uninhabited by men and the other animals. Thus the rotundity of the earth led . . . to the invention of those suspended antipodes."

"The work in which this philosophy was taught was curiously enough termed 'The Divine Institutes.'

"Cyril of Jerusalem (A.D. 386) quoted from Clement the story of the phenix, and declared that God had created the bird expressly to enable men to believe in the resurrection. He said it was a wonderful bird; and yet it was irrational—it did not sing psalms to God, and it knew nothing of his only begotten son. St. Chrysostom (A.D. 407) believed the air was peopled with angels. Jerome (A.D. 420) believed it was filled with demons. St. Augustine (A.D. 430) believed in demons. They tried to deceive men by persuading them that they were gods. They were called demons from the Greek daimones on account of their knowledge. (To the early fathers exact learning was devilish). There was also a class of satyrs and fauns called Incubi, to whose lascivious attacks women were constantly subject; and demons, termed by the Gauls Dusii, which perpetrated daily the same uncleanness. Of this there was so much trustworthy evidence that to deny it was an impertinence. (So real and so universal was the belief in these lewd spirits that, in 1484, Innocent VIII. issued a papal bull against them. And Burton, in his 'Anatomy of Melancholy,' expresses his firm belief in them.) St. Augustine affirms that miracles were still performed in his day. A blind man at Milan had been cured by the relics of two martyrs; a personal friend of his, named Innocent, had been miraculously cured of an ailment, and he had seen it done with his own eyes; a lady had been cured of an incurable cancer; a man in the town of Curubis was miraculously cured of paralysis and hernia by being baptized; on a certain occasion evil spirits, which had afflicted some cattle, were dispelled by prayer; a paralytic was cured by prayer, and by contact with a piece of sacred earth which had been brought from the spot where Jesus was buried and whence he arose; a young man possessed of demons was relieved by the prayers and hymns of some women, but in departing the demons struggled fiercely, so that one, in passing out through the young man's eye, knocked that organ from the socket. It fell on his cheek, and hung there by a vein till one of the women returned it to its place, and, by seven days' praying and singing, it was entirely healed. A young girl, possessed of a demon, was cured by the application of oil mixed with the tears of a bishop who was praying for her. The relics of the martyr Stephen had performed the most astonishing miracles, healing the blind, curing the sick, converting the impenitent, and raising the dead. The eighth chapter of the twenty-second book of his great work, 'The City of God,' is filled with the narration of these prodigies. Concerning the theory that the world was round, he said:

"But as to the fable that there are antipodes, that is to say, men on the opposit side of the earth, where the sun rises when it sets on us, men who walk with their feet opposit ours, that is on no ground credible. And, indeed, it is not affirmed that this has been learned by historical knowledge, but by scientific conjecture, on the ground that the earth is suspended within the concavity of the sky, and that it has as much room on the one side of it as on the other. Hence they say that the part which is beneath must also be inhabited. But they do not remark that although it be supposed or scientifically demonstrated that the world is of a round and spherical form, yet it does not follow that the other side of the earth is bare of water; nor even, though it be bare, does it immediately follow that it is peopled. For scripture, which proves the truth of its historical statements by the accomplishment of its prophecies, gives no false information; and it is too absurd to say that some men might hav taken ship and traversed the whole wide ocean, and crossed from this side of the world to the other, and that thus even the inhabitants of that distant region are descended from that one first man" (Adam).

Cosmas Indicopleustes (A.D. 535) was first a merchant and then a monk. The pagan notion was gaining place rapidly in his day as to the rotundity of the earth. The belief had been that it was flat, and rested on the back of a turtle, the turtle on the back of a snake, and the snake on the back of an elephant. The Greeks had long held the theory of rotundity, and even those Greeks who came over to Christianity brought it with them. The church opposed it, simply because it was Greek. Cosmas had, in his business, traveled over nearly the whole known world. He felt himself peculiarly fitted, therefore, to write on the subject, and the Christians in his time used his name, no doubt, as Christians in modern times hav used famous reputations, to intimidate honest belief. They would say, You believe the world to be round! Has not Cosmas gone over it? Has he not been there? Does he not know? Do you set yourself up against that great Christian scholar?' Let me urge upon the reader never to yield to the pernicious habit of fearing simply a great name. It and sholarship do not, by any means, always go together; and the only way by which enlightenment and civilization can possibly make progress is through the determination of each individual member of society, no matter how humble he may be, to do his own thinking on all subjects where one man's thought is as good as another's—and such is the case in theology—and, when he knows that he is right, to stand by it, though all the world be against him. One reason for the intolerable slowness with which men hav escaped from the superstitions of theology is, they hav allowed themselvs to be overawed with the names of Augustine, Jerome, Calvin, and other supposedly great thinkers, who were, in fact, utterly incompetent to deal with the questions which they handled.

"Cosmas, seeing the 'wave of Infidelity sweeping over the land,' concerning the flatness of the earth, wrote a work to counteract it. He called it 'Christian Topography,' and said it was 'intended to denounce the false and heathen doctrin of the rotundity of the earth,' and was to be a 'Christian description of the universe, established by demonstrations from divine scripture, concerning which it is not lawful for a Christian to doubt.' According to him the world is a rectangular plane, twice as long as broad. The heavens come down to the earth on the four sides, like the walls of a room. The earth lies in the center, with the ocean all about it. Beyond the ocean lies the untraversed land, the terrestrial paradise. On the north side of the earth is a mountain behind which the sun sets. (Cosmas lived in Egypt, where the sun seems to set in the north.) The plane of the earth was not exactly horizontal, but inclined slightly from the north, for which reason the Euphrates, the Tigris, and other rivers running southward, are rapid, while the Nile, and others running northward, are slow. People who believed the earth to be round were blasphemers, given up for their sins to belief in that impudent nonsense.

"Similar science was taught by Patricius, Diodorus of Tarsus, and other Nestorian theologians. The Christian religion staked its all on the flatness of the earth's surface, and when science proved the rotundity theology was dealt a blow from which it can never recover. Truly is it said, 'Theology ever has been, as it ever must be, the barbarian's interpretation of the universe.'

"Gregory the Great (A.D. 600) believed that volcanoes were the entrances to hell, and he tells a story of Theodoric and Pope John being cast, in chains, through the mouth of one of them into the lower regions. Two nuns, who had been excommunicated for talking too much, were buried in the earthen floor of the church. When the deacon, in saying mass, commanded all suspended persons to leave the edifice, the two nuns would arise from their graves and depart, to return after the mass was over. Many persons had seen these resurrections, and the nuns continued them till they learned to hold their tongues, when the ban was removed, and they rested peacefully in their tombs. A dead child was once raised to life simply by having a stocking, the relic of a holy man, placed upon its bosom. Having no oil, lamps were fed with water, and wicked with paper, and they burned perfectly. A city was on fire, and nothing could stay the ravages until Bishop Marcellinus threw himself against the flames, and they were immediately extinguished. A huge stone, which five hundred yoke of oxen could not stir, was removed a long distance by prayer. A lamp, shattered to fragments, was mended perfectly, and exhausted oil vessels were filled; a certain monk died, and predestination was fulfilled, all in answer to prayer. Gregory's 'Dialogues' are filled with such narrations, and Henry James Coleridge, his biographer, says he was a 'great man,' a 'great saint,' and that he 'towered above his contemporaries, and their immediate predecessors and followers.'

"St. Thomas Aquinas (A. D. 1270) affirmed that diseases and tempests were the direct work of the devil, and Justin Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, Athenagoras, Tatian, Cyprian of Carthage, Tertullian, Origen, Jerome, Lactantius, Eusebius—in fact, all the early Christians, believed in demons. The New Testament writers believed in them. The air was peopled with them and with angels. Every fountain, every tree, every stream, every grove had its sprite. Everything that was done must be done under a miracle. The Almighty had to be invoked to perform the simplest things. Nothing was too great for the credulity of the fathers, provided only it was improbable; and nothing small enough for belief, if it was at all probable."

So much for their intelligence. Now as to their knowledge of scripture and scholarship. The same book (supported in every instance by complete proof) says:

"Jerome and Origen were the only ones who could read Hebrew, unless we except Dorotheus. Justin Martyr quotes from Jeremiah and calls it Isaiah. Clement of Alexandria quotes as scripture passages which are not in the Bible. He quotes as Paul's, words which are not in Paul. In quoting from an opponent he would insert—not with intent to misrepresent, perhaps, but with the same result—words not in the original, and he even does the same in quoting from the Bible. Tertullian quotes as in Leviticus a passage not in that book; he misquotes history; he cites as in Isaiah a passage not in that book, but in Revelation, and he is frequently inaccurate in quotations. The gospel writers committed the same blunders. The man who wrote the gospel of Matthew attributes to Jeremiah a passage which is in Zechariah; and the writer of the gospel of Mark attributes to Isaiah a passage which is in Malachi. One curious illustration of this, and of how sacred books are formed, is seen in the excess of the Catholic over the Protestant Bible. The former has quite a number of books which are not in the latter—such as the two of Maccabees and the Song of the Three Children—which Protestants call the apocryphal Old Testament, but which Catholics consider as much the word of God as any other books. The reader has already seen that the ancient Jews did not consider these authoritativ, and the Palestinian Jews did not include them in the sacred collection. The Greek Jews, however, thought more of them, and the Alexandrian Jews placed them in an appendix to the Greek canons at the end of their Bibles, the same as they used to be printed in our old Bibles. The early Christians of Africa could not read Hebrew; they had to use the Greek manuscripts; and as they saw the apocryphal books in the collection they supposed they were a part of it. The result was that the early Bible-makers in the African church included the apocryphal books because they were not intelligent enough to leave them out. St. Augustine included them because he found them there, and the Catholic church retained them because St. Augustine did.

Of Eusibius, who is the most important of all the early fathers, without whom, says Tillemont, "we should scarce hav had any knowledge of the history of the first ages of Christianity, or of the authors who wrote in that time," Taylor says: "He never let a regard for the truth stand in his way to preferment," and that "he was a consummate sycophant." Christian writers hav not hesitated, says the "Revelations of Antichrist," to brand him as a great falsifier and time-serving sycophant. John W. Draper bears testimony to the same effect.

The fact alone that he inserted the passage in Josephus about Christ is sufficient to establish his reputation as a forger and liar. How can we believe any of the writings of a man like that unless corroborated by others? And it is upon him alone that much of the Christian fabric is built, without any evidence besides, without any corroboration!

Jerome was a gossiping sort of man, who changed his opinions often and his friends with them unless they too followed him in his vagaries. The kind of man he was may be inferred from his prayer, "O Lord, thou knowest that whenever I hav and study secular manuscript I deny thee." Hence he resolved to study nothing but the scriptures. It is probable from this prayer that all the secular manuscripts gave no proof of the Christian religion. Jerome set himself at work to learn Hebrew, and soon discovered many manuscripts. He was a great disputant, and as he makes contradictory statements about the same book (a gospel of Matthew he pretended to hav found), it is probable he was like Eusebius and Paul —given to lying for the glory of God. His works are very voluminous. The best edition of them is by Vallarsi, which makes eleven volumes.

Irenæus, says Taylor—and he is acknowledged by scholars to be correct—asserted not only what he himself knew to be false, but in the plenitude of that security of not being contradicted, and of being able to cloak himself up in the sanctity of affected contempt for all who were more honest and better informed (on which all other churchmen as well as he place their ultimate reliance); he put forth as truth what he knew was impossible to be so, and what every sensible man in the world must hav known so, too; he audaciously misread inscriptions on public monuments, and pretended authorities for the proof of the Christian religion, even in the teeth of thousands who both knew and saw that there was nothing of the sort in existence. Thus he pretended that there was a monument or image between two bridges on the river Tiber at Rome, bearing an inscription to Simon the Holy God, which the devil had caused to be erected there to the honor of Simon Magus, whom they were to be persuaded by that sort of proof that their ancestors had worshiped; thence to infer a coincidence with the apostolic history.

As a specimen of Tertullian's reasoning, we may quote a little and leave it for the reader to judge whether the words of such a writer should hav weight:

"I find no other means to prove myself to be impudent with success, and happily a fool, than by my contempt of shame; as, for instance, I maintain that the son of God was born: why am I not ashamed of maintaining such a thing? Why! but because it is itself a shameful thing. I maintain that the son of God died: well, that is wholly credible because it is monstrously absurd. I maintain that after having been buried, he rose again: and that I take to be absolutely true, because it was manifestly impossible."

Origen was a great prop of the church, but afterward acknowledged it all to be false and relapsed into paganism. This fact has been sedulously kept from the world by all Christian writers.

Justin Martyr's veracity may be judged by the following:

"This is the popular quotation from it: 'There exists not a people, whether Greeks or barbarians, or any other race of men, by whatever appellation or manners they may be distinguished, however ignorant of arts or agriculture—whether they dwell under tents, or wander about in covered wagons—among whom prayers are not offered up, in the name of a crucified Jesus, to the father and creator of all things.'"

Any man who could deliberately write like that in the year 140 or thereabouts, can hardly be trusted. His knowledge of the world must hav been extremely limited, or else he imitated Paul, that the glory of God might more abound.

Of Papias but little is known, and for what we hav of him we are dependent upon Eusebius. Dr. Lardner says he was a man of small capacity, and when Lardner says "small" we may conclude it was small, very small. Papias tells of a man in his time being raised from the dead, and of a man who drank deadly poison and did not die.

Dr. Lardner is probably right in his estimate of him.

The works of the early fathers, what are not destroyed, are nearly inaccessible. But few exist separate. They hav to be extracted from other writers. They are all mixed up. But from what has been gleaned from them by recent investigation of scholars, there is no kind of doubt that they were "colossal liars." We hav quoted enough to show this. Their statements are always taken with a liberal margin for discount by historians and investigators. They had so much superstition that everything they said was colored by it. The Bible, as we hav it now, is merely the guess-work of ignorance.

We do not know where Shakspere got his idea of dog-headed and one-legged men. If any of our readers do they will perhaps oblige by enlightening our correspondent, and no doubt a good many others.

The Same Old Falsehood.

LOMPOC, May 6, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In an argument to-day with one of my neighbors I mentioned Paine. He said that Paine, like all other men of his kind, when he came to die took back what he preached. I do not think he did. If you know anything about his last days or dying words, please let me know through your paper. J. F. DINWIDDIE.

It is a good deal like the killing of the cattle in Egypt to refute this bald-headed and fangless old story; it has been done several times—we had nearly said several hundred—but, like the cattle, it seems to need several violent deaths before it will stay dead.

Col. Ingersoll offered one thousand dollars in gold to the New York Observer if it would prove that Paine admitted the Bible to be an inspired book, or that he recanted his Infidel opinions, or that he died regretting that he had disbelieved the Bible, or that he died calling upon Jesus Christ in any religious sense whatever.

The Observer could not do it, and in its issue of Nov. 1, 1877, said: "We hav never stated in any form, nor hav we ever supposed, that Paine actually renounced his Infidelity. The accounts agree in stating that he died a blaspheming Infidel."

This confession was wrung from that dishonest paper by Mr. Ingersoll, who produced a mass of testimony perfectly overwhelming, after it had said Paine died in fear and trembling. The "blasphemy" is a gratuitous fling at Infidelity just worthy of the source from which it came. The testimony of Willet Hicks, who was with Paine every day during the latter part of his last sickness, was that "he died as easy as any one I ever saw die, and I hav seen many die in my time." The facts in the case amply prove that Paine died as he lived, believing in one God and no more and hoping for happiness beyond this life. If any Christian can prove that he "recanted" he will be entitled to the thanks of the Observer and the thousand dollars of Col. Ingersoll.

The Way Public Money is Squandered in New York City.

Is it any wonder, when public money is squandered in such reckless profusion by our officials, that taxes are high, and consequently rents and living, so that the poor people of this city are forced to liv in unhealthy tenements not fit for hogs? This abuse of a public trust is worse than malfeasance in office—it is criminal waste. But so long as our laws allow, it will continue. The laws should be changed. Is not this proper work for the National League?

H. L. GREEN is engaged to speak at the Liberal-Spiritual camp-meeting as Orion, Mich., June 13th to 18th.

COL. INGERSOLL has accepted an invitation to deliver the oration at the Academy of Music on Decoration Day. The Telegram, in a canting little editorial, remarks that this will disturb "many of our best citizens." The editor of the Herald's waste-basket need not worry. His rest will not be broken.

LIBRARIAN W. T. PEOPLES, of the Mercantile Library of this city, said that "at a recent convention of librarians he found several who agreed that more books were abstracted by ministers than any other class of people," which is not a very good word for the shepherds. Just think of a minister preaching a sermon on honesty with a stolen library book in his bookcase.

THE Spiritualists of central New York will hold their Fifth Annual Reunion at Deansville, N. Y., on Saturday and Sunday, June 3d and 4th, beginning on Saturday at 2 P. M., and closing Sunday evening. J. Frank Baxter, of Boston, the test medium, singer, and speaker, is engaged, and other good speakers will be secured. The friends of Deansville will care for all they can, and good hotel accommodations are assured at reduced prices.

IN this issue is the last of the letter which closes the second volume of "Around the World." It will make some 950 pp. The volume will be printed up as soon as may be consistent with the slow-moving ideas of stereotypers and binders, and mailed to the subscribers of the fund. It will be illustrated as fully as the preceding volume. In the mean time we should very much enjoy enrolling many more names to appear in the dedication.

California.—Mr. Bennett's Movements.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was honored to-day by the receipt of a letter from the "American Voltaire," as we Californians proudly call D. M. Bennett. It is dated "Approaching Hong Kong, April 13, 1882," and forwarded via Yokohama. Mr. Bennett states that in visiting the interesting island of Java, one of the famous Spice Islands, the party missed the regular steamer. As he is very evidently being received in hospitable and princely style by the "heathens" of Java and other oriental lands, my own opinion is that he may turn oriental heathen himself and settle down beneath the stately palm groves or beautiful mangoe forests. This opinion is to be corrected, as the distinguished traveler states that he expects to reach Japan (Yokohama) by the 15th inst., and from his knowledge of winds and currents, would reach San Francisco in the early part of June. It is very probable that he will remain in Japan longer than he expects, as the country is at once unique and fascinating. A friend of mine who traveled throughout that progressiv and intellectual empire says that the Japanese are a most attractiv and interesting people, that the whole country is a vast garden of beauty, and among the better classes there are many open and avowed Freethinkers. The cultured of all sects abominate Christianity as much as we, the cultured and elect Freethinkers of America, do. Hence we may not be surprised if the gallant old hero should domicil himself in a poetic tea-house and rest for a few days. We are prepared to receive him at any moment, and hav been anxiously awaiting his arrival.

Should he desire, upon reaching here, to rest under the vine and fig-tree of an hospitable Freethinker, we hav everything prepared for him. I delegated to my good friend, Philip Cowen, of Petaluma, the pleasant duty of finding some healthy and romantic spot where Mr. Bennett could be perfectly at home in case he wished peace and quiet for a few days after his long and fatiguing voyages. Mr. Cowen has just called upon me with a letter from H. W. Pepper, residing near Petaluma, and addressed to "My Dear Mr. Bennett." In the letter, which is unsealed, the most hospitable welcome is extended to the invincible editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to come to Mr. Pepper's ranch, and in substance "the latch-key is out and no questions asked." Cowen, who is a big-hearted, enthusiastic Freethinker, has the spanking team already actually engaged, so the old hero will go flying over the route to the ranch. This will be a novel and exciting experience, even after the wild, John Gilpin-like ride he had on the sacred animals—jackasses—around Cairo. We ought to hav a good deal of reverence for a jackass, as our savior rode on one into Jerusalem. Were he nowadays to ride into San Francisco, I do not think the Christians here would giv him a "government mule," even, although there are a good many asses amongst them.

Well, you see the friends of Freethought in California are making merry to receive the illustrious man who has suffered martyrdom for Freethought. But the enemy is also activ, and, I regret to say, infamous. The city is already flooded with tracts defaming Mr. Bennett, and they bear the ear-marks of the Comstock-Bundy gangs. The Index is savagely quoted as a "Liberal" paper which denounces Bennett.

One of the dailies has had a vile attack upon all Freethinkers in general, and Mr. Bennett in particular. In it Freethinkers are stamped as men who are in favor of turning decent homes into brothels. Knowing the sources from whence the attacks come, we hav treated them and their authors with contempt. Some parties at the East (you can imagin who they are) hav sent out whole packages of vile tracts in defamation of Mr. Bennett and our cause, and all the leading dailies are well supplied with them. I hope the day will never come when any number of Freethinkers will do as the Christians and those leagued with them are now doing, that is, wantonly and vilely assail a fellow-creature and try to rob him of his good name and his hard-earned property. No, Freethinkers are incapable of such infamous conduct, and even "a Christian dog," as the Turks hav it, is safe under their kind and humane action.

Before these attacks upon Mr. Bennett and the glorious cause of Freethought, we Freethinkers were united and enthusiastic in preparing to receive him, and do honor to the cause for which he so heroically suffered. Since the attacks we are a living flame of fire, and we are determined to light up the whole country in honor of Freethought and the man who has borne its flag, in prison and out of prison, with unflinching fortitude. We are pushing the priestly enemy to the wall. He must go. Reason must triumph over superstition; the future is in our hands. Let us, as freeman—the very salt of the earth—lead humanity upward and onward to light, reason, and even-handed justice. Let us even protect the Christians in their superstitions, if they will not accept reason; but let us, above all things, see that the wild beast of religious fanaticism is forever chained on the American continent.

April 8, 282. BYRON ADONIS.

ONE of the best books that hav ever been issued from this office is Col. Kelso's "Deity Analyzed and the Devil's Defense. It is a work we can conscientiously recommend. "The Real Blasphemers," now in press, by the same author, is also a superior work.

public mail a copy of that pamphlet of twenty-one pages. Have I not still reason to be proud of my grand old country?

Mr. Smith also took me into the women's department, for, hard though it be to say it, there are some eighty female prisoners here, and some of them even for the crime of murder. The women were sitting in their favorite squatting posture, two or three with infants in their arms but a few weeks old. (When six months old they are separated from their mothers.) I noticed some with mild, pleasant faces, while some looked hard and vicious. "Here is one," said I, "who looks as though she would commit no great crime." "That one," replied Mr. Smith, "is here for murdering her husband." "Well," said I, "I believe that husband gave her some reason for doing the deed, for she assuredly has a mild, gentle countenance." We moved on, and stopping before another bland, gentle face, I ventured another opinion, by saying, "Here surely is one that could not have been guilty a serious crime, for she looks incapable of it." "That one," replied the keeper, "is also in for murder." I mention these cases that you may understand the correctness of my observation and judgment of human nature, as I somewhat pride myself on my acuteness in that direction.

Mr. Smith pointed out another kindly-looking woman, somewhat over thirty years of age, who appeared as though her fate had been a hard one. He remarked that she was in prison for adultery. She was a widow, and being the neglected, despised thing which a Hindoo widow is, and being a fallible human being, with human propensities and weaknesses, she had, like Mary Magdalene, stepped aside. Mr. Smith remarked that the woman was "more sinned against than sinning." I said, "Yes, I have no doubt of it." Ah, thought I, if all the world were served as this poor Hindoo widow has been, how many would be free to-day? How would it be in happy, enlightened and Christian America? Would any women and any men be sent to prison there? Would there be any Christians shut up? Would there be such a thing as a priest being placed behind the bars for the act of adultery? Ah! I fear there are a few who would scarcely escape; and I fear, too, that if all Christian adulterers were in prison, many dwelling houses would have to be converted into jails. But this poor, uneducated, humble, despised, and crushed Hindoo woman has been shut up behind iron grates because she has done as all beings, human as well as brute, have done in all ages, and will continue to do. I wonder if the man was also imprisoned. Of course there was a man connected in the business. Women are not very apt to commit adultery when there are no men around, and it is the men who generally are the instigators of the crime, and certainly they deserve punishment at least as much as the woman; but the male who induced this woman to sin is not here. He is away, enjoying the liberty to induce some other woman to commit the same deed, while she is here doing penance for his sin as well her own. Oh, the injustice of this world, on the eastern side as well as on the western! Men send their helpless fellow-beings to prison for the same deeds which they commit themselves and go scot-free. What an incompetent and unfair governor this litttle world has!

The women in the prison spin, weave, and make their own clothes, and cook the food for the other prisoners—seven hundred in all. I saw the kitchen where the cooking is performed; the place where the rice is boiled, where the curry is made, the trough in which the flour for bread-making is mixed, the scales on which the dough for the little, round, flat loaves is weighed—two of which are allotted to each prisoner per meal. The place looked pretty tidy, but very unlike an American kitchen. I saw the wheels on which the women spin, but they are small and primitive, and the day being Sunday they were still; but the poor women know not the importance of the Jewish Sabbath. They were not educated to regard one day in seven more holy than the other six, though they know about as much of the matter as Jesus and his disciples did, and about as much as the early fathers of the Christian church did. Jesus is not reported as having said that Sunday, or either of the seven days constituting the week, is any holier than the rest; nor did he, who is supposed to have given all the moral lessons which Christians ought to observe, ever command that Sunday should be kept holy, or that his people should go to church on that day. Nor did his disciples ever teach any such thing. The fact is, the Sabbath and Sabbath-keeping are not Christian institutions, only as some of the early manipulators of the new religion borrowed that part from the old, antiquated Jewish religion, substituting, arbitrarily, Sunday for Saturday, making a day holy which no authority ever said is holy; and they had not a particle more authority for it than they had to enjoin circumcision, the Passover, the eating of shew-bread, and animal sacrifice. I repeat that Jesus and his disciples never said keep Sunday holy, and no Christian has any valid authority for doing so. The Hindoos regard all days alike—one as holy as another—and business goes on all over the country on Sunday, precisely as on the other six days, and the poor, simple people are none the worse for it. They are equally as happy and virtuous as though they did as Christians do—put on a very long face on one day in seven, dress up in their best clothes, listen to a salaried man utter a lot of falsehoods, and then cheat and swindle their neighbors all the rest of the week. That is Christian morality!

The men in this prison do a great variety of kinds of work; there are shops for carpenters, blacksmiths, wire-workers, weavers, mat-makers, metal-workers, and makers of a great variety of articles for household use. I looked into their shops and found them neat and tidy. The carpenters' shop was pointed out, and it was simply a long room, like a hall, with lumber lying against the walls, but not a bench, or anything of the kind. Hindoo carpenters do not use a bench to work upon. Planing and all other work is done on the ground, and they work squatting, as before described. This is the way in which all mechanical work is done. Blacksmiths have their forge and anvil sitting on the ground, and they squat and hammer their iron, do their filing, etc. Very little mechanical work is done standing or sitting; everything is done squatting, save, perhaps, laying brick, when squatting is out of the question, and they are compelled to stand. There is no question but what the Hindoos are a very ingenious and mechanical people. Like the Chinese and Japanese they imitate extraordinarily well, and can learn to do almost everything that any mechanic can do. I have seen much of the work of their hands, the accomplishment of which seems marvelous.

The keeper showed me a compartment in which Brahmans alone are confined—these are the elect of India, the favorites of the gods, they whose blood is a little bluer and a little purer than that of the common horde. This is the priestly class, who understand what the gods say and what they want, and who so well know how to instruct their less favored fellow-mortals what they must believe and what they must do. This class of heavenly-minded men sometimes step astray, as they do in our country, and get into prison much the same as with us; those who know little about the gods, and whom the gods care very little for—the same also as with us. The natures of these men, after all, is but a little better than others, and they sometimes err and get into trouble. I saw them partaking of their food, squatting to it as they do to everything else. The Brahmans being a very exclusive class, whose food, if the shadow of one of the lower caste or a Christian should fall upon it, would be ruined and have to be thrown away, eat by themselves, and cook for themselves, and by themselves, though they have committed crimes and are in prison. Good Queen Victoria has said that she did not wish that the religious opinions and prejudices of her subjects, even in India, should be interfered with, and since that the Brahmans have had a private table. What a great, grand old heart Queen Vic. must have, to be sure! I wonder if she and her ministers are willing that Charles Bradlaugh should occupy the seat in Parliament to which he has twice been legally elected!

The prison garb in India is not the same as at the Albany Penitentiary. It consists sometimes of simply a shirt of very coarse material, and sometimes of something like a pair of draws in addition, coming down to the knees, with a skullcap for the head, and the color and style of the stripes of the caps indicates the number of years the prisoners are in for. In addition each man has a tag of wood attached to the front of his shirt with his name, crime, and term of sentence written upon it, so that Mr. Smith in deciding which to retain and which to send, had only to look at this tag to make up his mind. He did not wish to send those who have but a short time to stay, nor those who are serving out life sentences. Nor did he wish to send those who had physical disabilities; and as he passed along before them they entered such complaints and told of such ailments as the circumstances justified. Many were excused from going for lameness of different kinds, as well as for debilities of other kinds. I inquired whether they preferred to go or stay. He said the greater part preferred to stay, knowing that the work is easier in the prison than carrying dirt would be. I noticed, too, that he did not wish to send those to do excavating who had learned to become good mechanics, and could be employed at such kinds of work as require green hands a long time to learn. He often remarked that a man was a splendid carpenter, blacksmith, weaver, or tradesman of other kinds, and he couldnot let him go. He must keep him; almost any man can carry dirt, but only a few can do what this one does here. And so he went on making his selections with obvious judgment, and, so far as I could see, as well as anybody could do it. It seemed a little singular that one European, single-handed and alone, could safely control seven hundred Asiatic prisoners, but such is the case.

Mr. Smith's assistants are all Asiatics, and many of them are prisoners. He places confidence in those who prove themselves worthy of it. Many of them he can send about the town with all safety, and they will return to him like honest men. He told me that he has men under his charge whom he was sure he could send to Bombay and they would return to him just as he would charge them. Is it not strange, then, that people who have so much goodness in them should commit crimes and get into prison? Not at all. A certain proportion of men of all nations will steal and do various things to interfere with the rights of others, requiring punishment for it. Asiatics are no worse in this respect than Europeans or Americans. I am inclined to think they are not as bad. It is true there are prisons in India, and a considerable number of prisoners. But when you take into consideration that there are 250,000,000 of people in India alone, and that crime is punished as rigidly here as in any part of the world, it will be found that there are much fewer criminals in proportion among these heathens than among the enlightened Christians of London and New York, or in all Great Britain and America. There is not one-hundredth part as much intoxicating liquors drank by the Hindoos in proportion as by the Christians of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the United States; there is not a tenth part as much fighting, assault and battery, manslaughter, and murder. I do not believe that there is nearly as much in proportion of lying, cheating, swindling, and stealing among the followers of Vishnu, Siva, Christna & Co. as among the pretended followers of Jesus.

There is, of course, not a little dishonesty in Asia, but, I insist, not so much in proportion to numbers as in Europe and America. They have their vices as all people have, but they are not as great in proportion as among those who profess to be disciples of a far superior religion.

I must give Mr. Smith credit for keeping a very cleanly and orderly prison. The quarters for the convicts are roomy, airy, and light, and the entire sanitary arrangements are almost without fault. I next accompanied him to the salesroom of the establishment, where he showed me a great and interesting number of articles manufactured by the prisoners, among them excellent chairs, carpets, mats, rugs, baskets, stands, and a great variety of miscellaneous wares. An article of showy mat or rug, manufactured of jute, and dyed brilliantly, with the colors artistically blended, the material being cheap and the goods pretty, and for which Mr. Smith has applied for a patent, struck me as being a very good thing and which ought to afford a large profit. Had I room I should have liked to purchase some of the goods gotten up there, but I have but a single satchel, which was packed full when I started, and to the contents of which I have been adding somewhat ever since. Its capacity is filled, and I can add no more.

Mr. Smith next showed me through his beautiful flower garden. There are many splendid gardens to be seen in this country, but few more beautiful and in better order than this. He has one hundred varieties of the rose in blossom, with all the other annuals, biennials, and perennials in the catalogue, including one hundred and thirty varieties of the craton, with spotted and variegated leaves, belonging to the laurel family. He shows himself a master of floriculture as well as a capital superintendent of a prison. He next showed me quite a collection of antiquities, principally gods, which he unearthed in making an excavation for a building or a bridge. Among the gods was one of Christna with his twelve disciples around him, who was also begotten by a god, and born of a virgin, who performed miracles, and who was finally put to death by his enemies for the salvation of mankind. If it had been gotten up a thousand years later it would have answered very well for Jesus and his twelve, but it was manufactured far too early for this comparatively modern teacher. How mean it was in Christna to copy from Christ, his younger brother, who did not come into existence till a millennium further on in the world's era! It is always villainous for big boys to impose on little ones.

As the shades of evening came on I walked back through the town to the station, much pleased with my visit to Mr. Smith and his very creditable establishment.

JOSEPH COOK.

This letter has already reached a great length, but before closing I will say a word or two about that falsifier and defamer, Joe Cook. His contemptible and malicious course has failed to have the effect he wished, and his slanders have injured himself more than anybody else. A reaction seems to have set in against him, even among those who are nominal believers in the same system of religion with himself. As an indication of the growing feeling toward him, I will copy the following from the Bombay Gazette:

It is impossible to conceive how the cause of Christianity in India can be advanced, or what moral or religious benefit can result to any one from certain recent actions of well-meaning, but perhaps over-zealous, and certainly injudicious, persons engaged in missionary work. It is not long since very just complaints were made in Calcutta of placards being posted about the streets, abusing the Hindoo religion. More recently we have had a good deal of declamation, and a considerable amount of abuse of certain persons and their professions, from Mr. Joseph Cook and his supporters, resulting in an unseemly controversy, and in such unedifying language as occurred in the Poonah meeting the other day, when the reverend gentlemen (Joe Cook), somewhat needlessly, quoted the saying about casting pearls before swine, to the annoyance of more than the native portion of the audience. And now it is reported from Allahabad that, during the recent great religious gathering of natives there, some missionaries, in their misguided enthusiasm, set up a stall in the fair for the sale of books attacking native religions, and even "palmed off the books on unwary purchasers, who believed them orthodox Indian books." A local paper hears, "on unimpeachable testimony," that "in one case, where an indignant purchaser, thus imposed upon, tore up the book before the crowd, indignantly protesting that publications of that sort were not wanted at the Mela, the offended missionary hauled him off to the police station, and wanted to have him punished. The magistrate, of course, refused to listen to the complaint."

I forget whether I wrote you, in a former letter, that the blatherskite Cook, in his lecture at Poonah, attempted to induce his audience to repeat after him what is called "the Lord's Prayer," which they, sensibly enough, refused to do. This made the would-be Boston Christian-scientist much out of humor, and he blurted out the insulting fling about "casting pearls before swine." This gave offense to several Europeans present, who deemed the insult wholly uncalled for. One or more took the occasion to remark that, after a residence of fifteen or twenty years in India, they had never had occasion to liken the natives to swine, having universally found them to be a well-behaved people. They were annoyed by Cook's insolent conduct, and he was so effectually snubbed that he did not attempt another lecture in that town, and was off on the early Monday morning train, to air his eloquence in some other quarter. The Poonah paper, however, in giving a statement of the affair, has it somewhat different. It says this:

At the close of the meeting a ludicrous scene ensued, which was anything but creditable to the persons concerned. Dr. Cook wanted to offer a prayer, . . . whereupon a brother missionary of his said it was not desirable to say a prayer before non-Christians. Mr. Cook, however, persisted, and said that, as he had followed his own way in Bombay, he would do so here, too; whereupon the previous speaker (Rev. G. Rivington) said that to offer the (Lord's) prayer in the presence of so many non-Christians was like "throwing pearls before swine." This reckless remark naturally gave rise to great indignation among the native audience, and would certainly have given rise to angry discussion and unpleasant retorts but for the fact that a third well-known missionary volunteered to defend natives against the cowardly aspersions of his brother missionary. The chairman advising Mr. Cook to abstain from offering a prayer, Mr. Cook, instead of obeying, proceeded to denounce the chairman, and to set his authority at naught (the chairman is an English gentleman, of Poonah). The whole spectacle was disgraceful to a degree, and the meeting dispersed at once, without Mr. Cook being allowed to pray (Poonah Dnyan Prakash).

While Cook was at Poonah, Capt. A. Banon, who was chairman at the meeting in Bombay for the refutation of Cook's slanders, at which I made some remarks, wrote a note to Cook, as follows:

NAPIER HOTEL, POONAH, Jan. 21, 1882.

Sir: At Bombay you publicly asserted that my friends, Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky, founders of the Theosophical Society, were persons of no repute in the United States, and that they had come here to learn certain tricks and arts of magic, that they might teach them to mediums in America already exposed.

You were challenged by Col. Olcott to face him before the public of Bombay last evening, but instead you sent a note to the effect that you could not help to advertise Infidelity, nor stand upon the same platform with Mr. Bennett.

Madam Blavatsky and Col. Olcott, therefore, followed you here, and on their behalf, I, who am not an Infidel, but a Christian officer of the army, demand that you shall meet Colonel Olcott before the Poonah public, and make good your charges.

If you decline, I shall post you as a coward and a slanderer. Mr. Bennett is not here, so you cannot make that excuse.

As I must rejoin my regiment forthwith, I cannot stay over to-morrow, and must request an answer early to-morrow morning. On behalf of Colonel Olcott, I stipulate that not a word be said about religion. Your obedient servant,

A. BANON, Capt. Thirty-ninth N. I.

To this the base slanderer, who defends perjury and the worst villainy, sent the following reply, dodging behind the contemptible excuse that because Madam Blavatsky and Col. Olcott had been in my company, the insolent defamer could not meet them:

Capt. A. Banon, Thirty-ninth Bengal N. I., Sir: Colonel Olcott and Madam Blavatsky have kept such public company at Bombay that I can have no connection with them.

I am very much surprised at the ludicrously dictatorial tone of your note, demanding that I shall accede to their desire to use me as a means of advertising Infidelity.

I hope I shall not be obliged to give your name to the public as an apologist for those who have publicly fraternized with a man but just out of jail for violating righteous American laws intended to secure the purity of the mails. My remarks on the enterprises of the Theosophical Society were all justified by its official documents which I cited.

Yours, etc., JOSEPH COOK.

Thus the miserable caluminator shows his venom by repeating the frivolous charges against my humble self. But I do not feel that it is the slightest discredit to be abused by such a liar. On the other hand, perhaps his vindictiveness, and his persisting in attempting to blacken my name among strangers, should be regarded as a compliment, acknowledging that he considers myself of some trifling consequence, and that my blows at his pet institution have hurt a little. I really care very little what such a man says about me. Such attacks are seldom made upon those who are regarded as ciphers, or as unworthy of notice. The same malice which sent me to prison would now be glad to destroy my usefulness and neutralize my efforts, but it does not affect me.

The above correspondence has been published in the principal papers in India.

Upon the whole, Joe Cook's visit to India is not likely to prove a very paying enterprise, and the missionary cause is not receiving immense benefit from his efforts here. Good-bye, D. M. B.

Congress Trying to Suppress the Bible.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Now that Congress says the "Mormons must go," is not that virtually declaring that the Bible must go? How can Congress abolish the Mormons without abolishing the Bible, as well as the Constitution of the United States? But let the good work go on; let Congress wipe out the Mormons, the Bible, the Constitution (as its principles are seldom maintained), and then wipe out itself, and we will then hav less crime, corruption, and misery, and more virtue, happiness, liberty, and justice. How can these Christian statesmen, these emulated Congressmen at Washington, suppress the Mormons without suppressing both the Constitution and the Bible? "To a man up a tree" it looks as if these polygamist sons and daughters of Utah hav most decidedly a pretty good grip upon these virtuous law-makers at Washington. Does not the Constitution say emphatically that no laws shall be enacted to interfere with one's religion or mode of worship? And are not the Mormons the faithful followers of the modern Solomon, Brigham Young? The Bible sanctions polygamy. Was it not in practice by the godly and saintly followers of Christ? Did not that ancient Mormon, old Solomon, hav his seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines? Are not these modern Mormons as godly, righteous, virtuous, and as good "citizens" as Solomon, David, Noah, Lot, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the other he-harlots, libertins, and polygamists of ye ancient times—citizens who stood high among God's chosen people?

The writer can look upon all this late agitation of the Mormon question in but one way—that Congress has at last commenced the meritorious work of suppressing the Bible, which they will do by suppressing polygamy. And as the Constitution is only a farce and mockery, the sooner it is also wiped out the better. Men hav been and are in our prisons in direct violation of the Constitution, and these Christian statesmen are as silent as the grave upon the outrage. They are very loud in their protests and indignation against England for the unjust imprisonment of American citizens in British bastiles, but are entirely indifferent to the sufferings of those unjustly and unconstitutionally imprisoned in American bastiles and Christian torture pens. An American citizen has more rights, liberty, and freedom in any foreign country to-day than he has in his own. British laws do not imprison American citizens in their own or in foreign lands for selling their own undisputed property, but the railway monopolist laws of America do, at least in the "City of Brotherly Love," the boasted birthplace of liberty, and the city settled by William Penn two centuries ago.

The Way to Read the "Around the World" Book and Letters.

Take a map, or atlas if you hav no large maps, and as you read of the route traveled and the various places visited by the "Truthseeker," follow right on along and around with him, making a line with your pencil, a dot at every place he passes through, and a star wherever he stops. This is the way I hav done with the letters as I hav read them weekly, and you hav no idea, if you hav not tried it, how much interest it adds to the events, incidents, and scenes described. Whether reading the travels in the book for the first time, or the letters in the paper, this method will be found equally entertaining and instructiv, and the reader will be surprised at his increased powers of retention by this process.

The historical portion of Vol. I. its antiquities, the Druidical sun-worshipers and their temples, the howling dervishes of the oriental empire, and the mosques of the Mohammedans, beautifully illustrated, are well worth the price of the book. All the various religions are compared or contrasted with Christianity as the journey proceeds, making some unfavorable disclosures in regard to the latter, upon which I will not comment, as the book can only be represented by itself.

More than half of Vol. II. has already appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER (May 1, 1882), beginning January 28th—a journey to the Holy Land. Here the pilgrim seems to hav a heavenly visitor for a teacher—old Melchisedec, who, according to the sacred writ, flourished 3,795 years ago in Palestine in company with Abraham the faithful. This ancient relic so inspired the pilgrim that he was unconsciously carried back to the days of Hebrew tradition, and rushed into the language and style of the Judean patriarchs, prophets, and scribes of old; and as a result, givs his readers ten chapters of Chronicles. So much for the positivness of D. M. B. when an old ghost gets the handling of him. Who would hav thought it? But this is not the worst of it, or the best of it; for the pilgrim or scribe became so hallucinated after his arrival in the Holy Land, that he must needs baptize himself in the same stream in which eighteen centuries previous John the bath-man washed the sins of Jesus all away. But alas! alas!! though the pilgrim had never found "Jordan a hard road to travel" he discovered, when too late, that Jordan was a mighty hard and extremely dangerous river to swim. He boldly plunged in without the assistance of Johnny the Baptist or Bridges his companion, and where he had bargained for full and free salvation, he nearly met sudden and total destruction. No heavenly door appeared; no celestial cloud opened; no father's divine voice is heard saying, "This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased," to encourage or resuscitate the panting pilgrim as he struggled in the holy baptismal font, so he had to scramble for himself, shake his dripping locks and gather breath without angelic aid, the same as would hav had any other poor human mortal.

Nothing in the Holy Land, except its holiness (?), or association with the old Jew book and its entire lack of fulfilling the scriptures, interested me equally with the pyramids in Egypt, the catacombs, recent excavating, and the amazing works of art everywhere visible.

But I must close by repeating that the books for reference, for antiquarian uses, for historical purposes and general information upon the subjects of which they treat, are well worth the price. See TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and other Liberal papers for terms. ELLA E. GIBSON.

A Lame Conclusion.

A friend who read the "Agnostic Orphan," in a late TRUTH SEEKER, says:

"Tell Elmina if she believed in Spiritualism she would not hav such 'jingles' in THE TRUTH SEEKER; would know that the mother in the 'spirit world' can so clearly see that the trials of her son are but for a day, as it were, compared to the future, and that all the sufferings will be compensated for with a perfect exactness, and that her child may be a teacher even to some pampered darling, whose every want being supplied, may hav made him very selfish."

If a belief in Spiritualism leads to such conclusions as the foregoing, I prefer not to believe; for, while well aware that some good nearly always comes out of evil, I do not think that it is well to let little innocent, helpless children starve and freeze, simply that compensations may grow out of the lessons thus taught, or that "pampered darlings" may become wise or unselfish through such means.

The day of vicarious suffering and vicarious atonement has gone by. And the day when one will be punished as an example, or a warning, or a threat to intimidate others is fast going also. The future law-maker and judge will simply protect society by confining and restraining the offender—restraining not only the one who commits the crime, but those who are sure to do evil through a bad and unfortunate organization and training—and when that time comes there will be no professional thieves, because a man who appropriates another's property the second time will be supposed incorrigible, and therefore placed where he can do no further harm.

The world has no need of starving orphans or hanging criminals for "example," though while we hav them of course we shall use them for this purpose; but we prefer to hav every man, woman, and child well fed, comfortably housed, highly educated, and perfectly trained in all that is good, true, and beautiful, if it could be brought about, just as though some lovely lives are found among those who are life-long invalids, and we all appreciate health the more for having endured pain and sickness. Yet we do all we can to banish disease from the world and not keep it as a moral teacher or an example or warning to the well. If the view this friend takes were a correct one, why should there be homes for the friendless, orphan asylums, reform schools, life-saving stations, or any charitable institutions whatever?

Why not let little orphan children roam our streets shivering and starving, ignorant and untaught, as "lessons?" As one lesson is rarely effectiv, and continual dripping is, why, the more of these miserable little teachers we hav the better it will be. Let them suffer; their trials are "but for a day," and then they will pass on to a perfect future, and be compensated for all, though how this agrees with the idea that we are here to become wise, good, intelligent, and learned, so that shall be fitted for this "summer land over there" I cannot see, for the ragged, ignorant orphan who only livs for an example is surely very unprepared to take up life in the future, and will be as much behind the pampered darling who is taught not only all the moralities and virtues, but is well fitted in all ways to go onward and upward. Our jails and prisons are not, as a rule, filled with pampered darlings, who hav few temptations to sin, and who find life too full of something to do and something to learn, but it is the orphans and the uneducated (or those educated in sin) who generally become our criminals.

Our friend says these are "only trials for a day!" But she must remember that while she, as a Spiritualist, may believe in passing on to "perfected spheres," we think it is the race as a whole that passes on and improves and grows toward, but never reaches, perfection; never can reach it, because there is always more to learn, and more to achieve, and more to be in the beyond. Our children and children's children pass on just as we hav passed on beyond our parents and grandparents, and we, like all who hav gone before, are only as the leaves of the trees that liv, grow, and mature, then fade and die, and furnish nutriment for future leaves in future years. But we leave behind something more than the leaves, etc. We leave our example and our thoughts, which are unending in their influence, and therefore should we strive to do and teach only the right.

The friend I would criticise also says that "if people do just what their organization and surroundings make them, why waste time in so much writing, in the effort to make them better?" But she forgets that this very writing is one of the surroundings, one of the circumstances that helps to create new aims, impulses, and beliefs, and consequently new modes of action. If a man who smokes twenty pipes of tobacco in a day can be induced by one letter to lay away his pipe forever, is not this writing to some purpose? Is it not a work of reform and an influence that does good? If I can interest a whole Sunday-school in birds, leaves, stones, flies, and bees by penning them "Little Lessons," is not this writing a work worth doing? Every line that we pen that upholds the good, the true, or the beautiful does the whole world a benefit and helps to create better circumstances and better surroundings.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for Round-the-World books. Please publish my name in second volume. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER some time, and it has given good satisfaction.

Yours truly, JAMES BRIDGES.

MANCHESTER, IOWA, May 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav watched that $5 business almost too long, and think now that Mr. Bennett cannot get too much for his noble work, therefore inclosed I send you a "V" to help get the traveler home, and wish to get the books. J. U. SCHELLING.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, May, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You will see by this order of the 11th of March that I tried to get into the trip around the world at the last hour, but that I failed in it, as the check went astray, and I can find nothing of it, but I hav got a duplicate of it. I hope this will go all right, so you can add my name to the trip around the world, as I want it to lend to some of my friends to try and get them thinking for themselvs.

If D. M. Bennett should come any way near Cedar Rapids, on his way across the country, I know a few who would like to see and hear him, if they only knew where they could reach him.

Hoping I will soon hear from you, I rem ain,
Yours, a thinker for himself, PETER S. ROBERTSON.

ATLANTA, GA., May 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for the magnificent and splendidly written letters of D. M. Bennett. I must hav them in book form, so that I can follow again and again the old hero in his travels around the world. This is one of the most superstitious towns that it has ever been my fortune to visit. I went to church last Sunday, and the minister told me that he did not know whether heaven was a stationary abode or not; it might be continually floating around through the air.

I hav not been able to bring my mind to believe that it has ever passed close to the little, licentious city of Atlanta, and yet such howling among the God-called, black-coated, hell-scared liars!

Kindly, etc., A. M. SHOMO.

BARABOO, WIS, May 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting a long time in hopes that some of the many Liberals of this city who are well-to-do would send for your Round-the-World books, but seeing no names in your list from this place I concluded to make a break, come to the front, and show my colors, and I hope that many others will do likewise. So here goes a "V" for your book of travels in the Holy Land. Though I hav read the letters in your paper, I want the books all the same, for I know they will be entertaining, interesting, and instructiv. I want to learn all I can about that wonderful country where they say the first man was made, and I guess the first god, too. But for the life of me I don't see how in that rocky, steril, and God-forsaken country they could get mud enough to make a good-sized man. I don't wonder the Lord God had to make the woman out of the man's rib; you see the mud was played out; but the woman must be made, mud or no mud, for without her he couldn't run his institution; without her there would hav been no one to eat that awful apple; without her there would be no one to enlighten and instruct Adam; without her there would be no one for the Holy Ghost to overshadow; without her there would hav been no son of God to be put to death for the evil and sin his father brought into the world.

Some seek wealth, power, and fame,
Some a great and glorious name;
I seek a nobler thing by far,
Nothing less than a shining *.

CHRONICLES.

CLEAR LAKE, WIS.

And it came to pass in those days that the chief priests, scribes, and pharisees gathered themselvs together, each man and his household, and spake unto another saying, Let us rise, gather up our loins, buckle firmly our breech clouts, and journey to a place where we can worship the God of Israel after the manner of our forefathers; and all cried, Yea, let it be even so, and it was so.

Then they arose and anointed themselvs with hog-grease and sweet cream, and fell upon their faces and busted things generally, and started for Knapp's Station, each man and his kindred, his ass, and maid servants, and all that he had.

And they pitched their tents over against Baldwin, even at Knapp's Station, where they erected an altar unto the God of Israel, and fell flat upon their faces and wallowed in their tents even with their maid-servants, so great was their love for the savior of man. Now, their Moses was of the tribe of A——r, a man after God's own heart and the sisters of the church; and he blew upon a ram's horn and the ewes bleated fervently, and a great commotion was raised in this sacred land by reason of this tooter.

And the scripture was being fulfilled, for the lion and the lambs lay down together beautifully, and there was none of the kicking here which Paul describes as difficult.

And while the chief priests tooted upon his tooter his meek and lowly eye caught sight of a comly ewe whom report said had strayed from the fold; and she was fine to look upon, and was of the South-down breeds, and he longed for her fleece of which this yarn is spun. And he girded on his cane and duster and beckoned her to follow, and she followed. And together they went up into a mountain, leaving the multitude below, for this Abraham intended to sacrifice this ewe unto the Lord even as Isaac was intended. And they came to a place which looked like an altar, and he placed his arm around his victim and drew forth a knife. But in casting his eyes upward he saw two wicked sons of Belial peering through the brush, and his hand was stayed; and the ewe lamb arose to its feet and sat upon a log while this Abraham buttoned his robes around him and punched a stump even with his cane, for he was very wroth, seeing he had got cheated out of his sacrifice.

MORAL.—Keep your lambs from camp-meetings, or they will get scooped. J. L. WARREN.

ELKLAND, PA., May 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is at hand. D. M. Bennett's "Experiences at Bombay," his noble self-defense against the malignings of the slanderous orthodox J. Cook, were timely, trenchant, well aimed. Glad he was there at the opportune moment, though we opposed his going.

The editorial, "Christian Duplicity," is just the argument and showing needed. How can sensible, thinking people yield adherence and support to the nonsense inhumanly propagated by church creeds, dogmas, and the Bible? Just read Deut. xxviii, and feel any book containing such horrid doctrins should be discarded until all like sentiments be expurgated. Eve was a consistent Bible woman in her curse upon Cain—Shakspere, Byron, Shelley, Bennett, and like envolumed souls, are our books of reverence—they are upon our center-table, and the busts of Paine, Voltaire, Ingersoll shall inspire from their pedestals, and the benign faces of like men shall speak from the walls, as soon as money can prudently be thus invested. As I lay reading "Christian Duplicity" a long-cherished thought was reintensified, viz., the aid needed by all Liberalists to uphold the hands and hearts of such writers, speakers, teachers, editors. Liberalists, are you aiding, or hav you bequeathed, to sustain and advance the cause of freedom—humanity—which shall triumphantly march down the ages when no longer you breathe the vital air? If not already done, make the indenture append the codicil.

A word as to the Freethought Convention at Watkins, N. Y. August will soon be on the spokes of time's chariot wheels. Whoever has attended one of these conventions needs no urging, the thought of which quickens the pulse, and electric thrills take up and repeat the anthem. For these truth is voiced in clarion tones; great hearts throb for fraternal enfranchisment. Humanity is crowned "king of kings and lord of lords." A new baptism of fellowship is experienced which lasts the whole year if need be. It is a glorious pilgrimage to the "Mecca" of light and love, life and hope, emancipation from priestly, churchal, creedal tyranny. Let us now determin to go and identify ourselvs workers, sympathizers, abettors of the cause dearest every noble, thinking soul. In union is strength; numbers hav their influence, and whoever loves humanity sufficiently to do homage by contributing time and money are sure to be of the right caliber to add dignity to the convention. H. L. Green, that royal veteran worker, calls for volunteers. He arrays the galaxy of starry orbs—Col. Ingersoll, Hon. Charles Bradlaugh, Prof. Felix Adler, George C. Miln, D. M. Bennett—as captains, colonels, and lieutenants. Hail to these noble, royal chieftains! Royal leaders of the van, hurrah! loud cheers and greetings for each and all!

Not only is a soul-baptism of trenchant progressiv thought—the jewelled glory of the age—to be showered upon all who go up thither, but the natural beauties of Watkins—the sheen of the lake giving back bending skies, floating crafts and steamers all freighted with joyous mortals, the grandly magnificent glens, offering a thousand attractions and enchantments to the lovers of beauty and the students of nature—are to be enjoyed on this propitious occasion. Leave your shops and counters, offices and sanctum, your farm and accustomed routine, all come up to know and be known unto each other, to gaze into the noble eyes of those who think great thoughts; to clasp the hand whose pen has aided to unloose and forever remove the manacles that fettered hands and still enslaves and holds in mental darkness and bondage all who support priests and confess to creeds—hands that hav knitted up the fraternal fellowship that make us akin, even though strangers in the individual form.

For the broadest freedom, GRACE L. PARKHURST.

SHORT SERMON—TEXT: JEREMIAH HACKER.

POSTVILLE, IOWA, May 11, 1882.

It is the dusk of a May evening. I hav been reading the appeal of C. L. Roberts for Jeremiah Hacker in the last TRUTH SEEKER. And, for the thousandth time, I ask myself, Why is it that not only the criminal, the sick, the insane, the idle die of want, surrounded by princely mansions and magnificent churches, but the industrious, the capable, those devoted to the world's good, lie down in sickness and old age, without food, fire, friends, or shelter? Millions of dollars for court splendor in a republican government; thousands upon thousands to bedeck a president's grave and place to the bank account of his widow and children; hundreds for hospitals, colleges, receptions to learning, to wealth, and to heroism; and a brave brother sitting amid the gloom and melancholy of poverty and neglect!

Cultured Infidelity and ignorant belief are alike accused, if, from the storehouse of their material goods, no generous gift finds its way to the household where want and anxiety hav made their home.

Though Infidel, wrestling with Christian competitors in the world's arena, seldom secure a fortune, yet, here and there, over the land, I find unbelievers in elegant homes and beautiful surroundings, with princely incomes; and still our League treasury languishes, and pioneers like Jeremiah Hacker sit forlorn and forgotten, no doubt wondering if the race is worth saving, after all. Who will convince this old man that humanity, unlike God, does hear the cry of suffering, and sends relief?

MRS. H. S. LAKE.

A WORD FROM CINCINNATI.

Prof. E. D. Babbit, author of "Principles of Light and Color." "Religion," etc., writes us as follows:

The cause of Liberalism is making fine progress in Cincinnati. While numerous persons hav been psychologized and drawn into the churches by the revivalist Harrison, the men of Freethought are waking up also. When Ingersoll lectures here his speeches are reported wholly or in part by all our papers, a thing which is not so fully done in fashionable New York. It is well to hav some regard for fashion, especially when it is not hurtful; but an extreme regard for fashion makes cowards of men and women. The Spiritualists hav organized a society here which is running in full blast, its lectures being held in Odd Fellows' Hall at 11 A.M. and 7.30 P.M. on Sundays. Under the manifestations occurring in the presence of such accomplished mediums as R. W. Sour, M.D., Jesse Shepard, whose music is certainly astonishing, and others, many of our leading judges, doctors, and lawyers hav been convinced of the fact of spirit communion and of human immortality. Let me quote one fact concerning Dr. Sour, the truth of which I can absolutely vouch for.

A person from any part of the world may come to him. The doctor may never hav seen him or heard of him before, but will ask him to sit down a few feet away. He will then take a large sheet of paper which the stranger may hav brought, after having marked it so that he can be sure to identify it, and, having made the room absolutely dark, will sit down with some crayons, go into a trance, and in thirty minutes a wonderful life-size picture will be produced which the best crayon artist of New York would require a week to equal, working at the average rate. What is still more marvelous, however, is the fact that this picture will probably be a startling likeness of some dear departed friend. But this is not all. If the name and relationship of that friend is not given at the time, Dr. Sour may invite the stranger to come again next day with his own double-slate, cloth-lined at the edges, and marked for identification. I say the next day, because the doctor will probably be too much exhausted to do anything more on the same day, and may hav to keep his bed. This time the seance is in full light. A bit of pencil is put inside the slate, a string tied around the whole. The doctor goes into a trance, and holds the slate directly before the stranger's face. Writing inside is plainly heard. The slate is untied, and both sides are found written on, perhaps in the exact handwriting of the one whose picture was drawn before, while at the bottom of the whole is the very name itself! What's to be done with such phenomena? Is it magic? But I know of five of the leading magicians of the world who hav had to admit that there is something beyond all thaumaturgy in it.

Another sign of the progress in medical education may be seen in the fact that the American Eclectic Medical College, a first-class chartered institution of this city, has completely emancipated itself from all crude and poisonous drugs, and adopted the new, reained, and powerful methods of cure, founded directly upon nature and chemical law which hav lately been discovered. Although a progressiv and accomplished corps of professors are already engaged, I hav been invited to the chair of chromopathy and magnetology, and I hav already commenced my labor therein. This is a new thing in medical education, chromopathy, as many of my readers know, being the science of healing by light and color, the results of which are already becoming marvelous, while the term magnetology embraces electricity, magnetism, magnetic manipulation, and the fine forces generally. Those wishing more information can address me at 200 Main st., Cincinnati. EDWIN D. BABBITT.

TWO COWS IN COLLEGE.

NORTHFIELD, May 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Carlton College has had the experience and the realization of knowing what it is to hav cows go through college (in through the window and out through the door), which proved to be not a profitable business. This act of some of the Carlton students has created a great sensation throughout this community, an act which the faculty shall long remember.

Northfield, noted for its colleges and churches, is a beautiful town of twenty-five hundred inhabitants, situated on the St. Paul and Milwaukee railroad, forty-five miles southeast of St. Paul. The beautiful Cannon river divides the town, and flows majestically on its course toward the Mississippi. The founders of Carlton College (Congregational) are of the creed of John Calvin—total depravity and infant damnation. This college is built on the east side of the river, on a high elevation, towering toward the sky, overlooking the river below, which affords a beautiful sight to the eye of the students who are lovers of nature's most charming scenery.

St. Alph's College (Norwegian) is on the west side, built on a pinnacle many feet higher than Carlton College, and affords a view of the whole town, and for thirty miles east of the Mississippi. So high toward the stars is not a desirable winter resort when the mercury is sixty degrees below zero. But the cool summer winds fan the student's brow, and he forgets for the time the polar region of but few months back, and thinks up there is paradise.

The students of Carlton College are under very rigid and Christian disciplin, and yet the boys are very naughty and full of tricks, such as filling the chimney of the library room with wet hay, thereby damaging the books with smoke, putting powder in the chapel to explode while the inmates are at prayers, ringing the bell at midnight, etc. But the last act or trick was not very nice for college students to be guilty fof. If it had been perpetrated by some illiterate boys it would not be quite so amazing. It was this wise: Thursday morning two cows were found in the college, taken there through a window on a plank properly arranged, making it easy for the cows to walk, one being put in Prof. Goodhue's room, and the other in Miss Evans's, after which an excessiv dose of croton oil was given them, and they left to inn in these fine rooms, the seats and other furniture of which were besmeared. Imagin the amazement of the professor and Miss Evans on entering their rooms in the morning, to find these horned beasts presiding in their absence. MRS. S. J. LENONT.

DO THEY EAT IN HEAVEN?—MORE INFORMATION ABOUT THE UP-STAIRS RESTAURANT.

MODESTO, CAL., May 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of April 29th this very fair and pertinent question was asked by H. R. Keel. You answered the question very well, but not as definitly as you might hav done by quoting other passages of scripture. In Matt. xxvi, 27--29, we read: "And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; . . . But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my father's kingdom." Luke and Mark giv this account substantially the same. This is conclusiv as far as the liquid portion of the diet of heaven's inhabitants is concerned. They do drink—drink wine, too, and no new-fangled wine, either. They drink "this fruit of the vine," and that is the same kind of wine that Jesus and his disciples were then drinking. Our good temperance lecturers should warn the people against going to heaven where they will be exposed to the influence of Jesus, who habitually drank wine to such an extent that he was called a "wine-bibber," who gave wine to his followers here, who regarded it as a great blessing, for which we should giv thanks, and who promised to hav a good supply of it on hand in heaven.

In Luke xxii, 29, 30, we read: "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." From this it is clear that they do eat and drink in heaven, and that they do all other things that eating and drinking render necessary. They must hav out-buildings there as well as palaces, thrones, etc. Indeed, heaven is quite like home.

In Rev. xix, 9, we read, "Blessed are they who are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb." This marriage supper took place in heaven. From the fact that this feast was called "supper" we learn, by implication, that they eat other meals there just as we do here. From the fact that they marry there we learn that they (the lambs, at least,) possess sex there just as they do here, and that they make the same use of their sex.

But why need Mr. Keel care whether they do or do not eat in heaven? Does he expect to go there, and to stop at the Great Golden Hotel, w ich is 1,500 miles long, 1,500 miles wide, and 1,500 miles high, and no cars or elevator inside? If not, would he not better be asking what they do at the great rival hotel just across the way. All intelligent persons, and I take Mr. Keel to be one of this class, are now heading toward this latter hotel, in wnich they do not keep sheep and other domestic animals as they do in the former. JOHN R. KELSO.

HARSHAW, ARIZONA, May 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.10, which please use as directed. We are having a pretty time out with the pets of that pious old fraud, Rev. Mr. Tiffany—one hundred and fifty people estimated to be killed, and the work not yet finished.

I want to be an Ingin,
An Arapahoe or Ute;
I don't to be a white man,
A poor unprotected brute.

F. A. LAMONT.

STEVENSVILLE, PA., May 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: My heart leaps with joyful emotions as I realize that Mr. Bennett will soon be on American soil again, if not already. It should inspire in every Liberal heart these words, "Behold! the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." Count on me for $8 for the gilt-bound volumes, and pardon a few brief thoughts. Reason and liberty are the bridal pair, that appear at the dawn of day, which is fast breaking upon the night of ignorance and faith. Reason, the bridegroom, clothed in the mantle of justice, protected by the shield of science, armed with the sword of common sense. Liberty, the beautiful bride, clothed with love and gentle affection, crowned with virtue, and bringing equal rights for all. Watch them advance, see their stately and majestic tread, and in their wake follows the bridal train—peace and patience, harmony and beauty, forbearance and forgivness.

Liberals, why stand ye here idle? Prepare them a feast. You question of what it shall be. Go to Shakspere. Pluck the most substantial fruits which hav grown from the fertility of his brain. Proceed to Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll; and lastly, bring a rich dessert from the gardens of Chainey. Next. where shall their quarters be? Instal them at the capital, which is every heart that is true to nature, and in so doing we shall work in co-partnership with them and each other to effect the great reform the world so much needs, for

Through ages past we see the stream
Humanity supplied.
Convulsions swarm within our hearts,
For crimes we cannot hide.

Through time it rolled, a crimson flood
Of human sacrifice;
Affections that belonged on earth
Transporting to the skies.

But time alone can right the wrong,
With Liberals' earnest zeal;
The wounds inflicted long ago,
Humanity must heal.

Then let us work with ready minds,
Through reason's quickening powers;
We soon shall see the stream dried up,
And victory shall be ours.

The priest who now in costly robes,
Eternal life imparts;
Will be, like old Corinthian brass,
Among the long lost arts.

Yours truly, FLORA A. PATTON.

GRATTAN, May 15, 1881.

MR. MACDONALD: Permit me, as a friend of Liberalism, to make a few suggestions to you and through you, should you deem them worth consideration to the Liberal public generally. It is not enough that we prove to the world the falsity of religious dogmas and creeds. As a general rule they are held in high esteem, and are very dear to their votaries, and it is not to be denied that they teach many good things. Liberals, in order to deserve success while pointing out the faults of religious creeds, should not lose sight of the importance of adopting all of their acts and teachings that will benefit the world. And until we learn to outdo them in such things we shall fail, and deserve to.

Our prominent men and periodical publications should be very careful not to allow personal or pecuniary considerations to stand in the way of harmony and unity of action. The only strife allowable should be in endeavors to see which shall say and do in an honorable way the most and best to advance the cause, and I would suggest for your and their consideration that Messrs. Bennett, Ingersoll, and Miln during the months of July and August make a tour through the prominent places of summer resort in New England, New York, and the upper lakes, and talk to the people of the faults and follies of creeds, and teach them the benefits to be derived from a right knowledge and practice of the duties of men and women to themselvs and the world at large in all that pertains to the good of humanity in this life. Yours truly, CONVERSE CLOSE.

PITTSBURGH, PA., May 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Paul said a great many foolish things, and gave some good advice. An instance of the latter was, "Let your light shine," and although we may not be inclined to heed some of his teachings, we are perfectly willing, after having gone to the trouble of lighting our tallow-dip, to use THE TRUTH SEEKER as a candlestick, that its glimmer may penetrate the gloom of orthodoxy and cheer some kindred soul struggling on its way toward liberty and light. If it was good for those that "loved the Lord" to "speak often one to another," it is just as good for Infidels. Social intercourse between organized bodies of Freethinkers is just as essential to life and growth as it is to individuals, and while we are too modest to toot our own horn, we would ask the question of kindred organizations, "Brother, is your light burning?"

Auxiliary Liberal League No. 76, notwithstanding the combined efforts of the Puritanical clergy of Pittsburg, is doing a good work for the emancipation of the masses and the building up of a higher and better form of ethical culture. A part of our plan is the systematic free distribution of Freethought and scientific literature, with regular lectures every Sunday at 3 P. M., followed by free criticism and discussion.

We hav secured the services of ex-Rev: J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw, Mich., who will will remain with us through the present month, and perhaps through June. He lectures twice a week, and makes himself generally useful and agreeable in the meantime. Bro. Burnham came to us highly recommended, and so far he has more than fulfilled our highest expectations. Last Sunday his subject was, "The Design Argument; or, Does Nature Prove a God?" He began by saying that the constitution of society is such that he who claims the credit of sincerity for himself must accord it to others; stated the orthodox idea of an infinit, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, and perfectly good and unchangable God, and said that such a God was absolute, unconditioned, and out of all relation to finite things. If God existed from eternity, but began to be, or was created, then God must hav become conditioned, assumed relation to that universe, and changed, which would destroy his character. Again, to design implies thought, a relation and succession of ideas, something impossible to an infinit and absolute being.

The prismatic view of nature was here presented with a vividness and power seldom equaled, and the question asked, If God was omniscient and foresaw this from all eternity; omnipotent, and could hav prevented it, yet did not, how could he be all-just or all-merciful? Instead of being an infinit God, his character, as exhibited in his works, would disgrace the meanest fiend in hell.

The lecture throughout was a masterpiece of Baconian logic and Websterian eloquence, and the conclusion irresistibly reached was that throughout the boundless expanse of the universe there was no nook or cranny wherein might hide the Christian's God.

With greetings for all friends of universal mental liberty, I am Yours truly, HARRY HOOVER.

MR. EDITOR: It is a sad sight, and one that annoys me this morning, as I watch from my window the bright faces of the little boys and girls who are wending their way toward the spire-capped temple of superstition, seen not far distant, where they go to hav their little heads stuffed with the silly tales of the gloomy past. And as I hav often seen them before, I think, too, that I can distinguish a change upon the faces of a few, as time trips nimbly by, where shades of sadness seem to steal, as the seeds of superstition takes root upon the young hearts, which, in time, will smother the noblest structure of the human mind. Though the boys are less easily caught with the chaff that is issued out, week by week, in this house of strange, curious ways, yet in time they, too, are caught, all the same. Then it will be sadder still to contemplate the struggle to unlearn that which has cost so much valuable time to learn.

But the world will do it, for some day he must go out and mingle with the mixed crowds who pass hither and thither, and listen to words of wisdom, which will flow from the independent mind.

But a brighter day is coming, sir, thanks to the able efforts of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other Liberal papers, for we can already see the dark curtain, which was woven by the priestly past, rise higher and higher, day by day, showing intellectual beauties, which are greater, and of far more importance to the human race, then was ever presented to the Jews by their Jehovah.

And freedom with us is not far distant, we hope, for already the professional office-holder sniffeth from a far his meat and bread, and is even now becoming lenient while enforcing those laws which hav been imported westward by the Connecticut Blues, which is a good sign.

What a shaking up of the "dry-bones" there would be if Col. Ingersoll should announce his intention, some fine morning, of giving a series of lectures here! No shepherd would be more solicitous for his flock, after hearing the hungry cry of a wolf, than would be each faithful parson, while we would smile and giv our little mite to help him on his way. And why not? D. C. MITCHELL.

A Talk with the Working Men.

I want to say a few words right here on what I think of the working classes of this country, and I shall make them so plain that the people will understand them without the aid of a dictionary. The American people went to war to liberate four millions of black slaves and made about forty millions of white ones and a debt of millions and millions of money for themselvs and their children to pay with a heavy interest, besides the loss of millions of lives; and, not satisfied with this, they must eat, yes, must eat each other up in business, be up to all kinds of rascality, lie, and cheat, and let their bosses drive them to the polls to vote into office thieves and swindlers to enact rotten laws in favor of Shylocks, drones, parasites, railroads, express and telegraph monopolies, etc., guilty of every enormity that villainy can concoct. Some boy now living will see such times in this country yet as were seen in France at the time of the Revolution, when the white slaves had to eat grass.

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Look at the people of Ireland at the present time. They are perfect ignorant serfs; and the end is not yet. Talk about our free government and free institutions, why, it is a mockery! Our government is nothing but a perfect oligarchy. Away with it! Working people, what do you want with the pest-hole in Washington that is supported by the taxes wrung from the weary muscles and aching backs of yourselvs, the starving, toiling millions?

There are too many fools seeking worlds of bliss
And making a hell of unhappiness in this.

I want to say to you working men that you do not need that infernal nuisance in Washington at all. It ought to be abolished, and I want you to see that governors of states and territories to enact good laws for those states and territories are all that you require. And when intelligence becomes catching you must hav as little law and legislation as possible. But you will add, no doubt, "We cannot do without a government." Now I think that just shows your ignorance! Are you such babes, dolts, and simpletons that you cannot govern yourselvs? Do you not know that the veto of the president stands against the will and wishes of a majority of the states? And yet you call this democracy! The president can veto anything and dismiss or select any officer he pleases. Can a king or any monarch do more? Our Senate is nothing but a relic of monarchy. Some will ask why. I will answer, Because the representativs cannot enact any measure the Senate happens to disapprove; both houses cannot enact a law by a majority if the president happens to disapprove of it. That is the reason, working men, that that infernal machine in Washington ought to be destroyed. And another reason is that it costs you $28,988,874 per annum. Do you not see that all the representation you get is to pay the taxes? Yes, working men,

That upas-tree in Washington
Spreads poison far and near;
One of of the poisonest trees on earth,
A deadlier one is here.
O justice, may you surely strike
And cleave it to its root,
While man shall rear fair freedom's tree,
And all partake its fruit.

But think of it, working men; you will never erect a "freedom's tree" anywhere as long as you spend eight million dollars every year over the gambling table, as has been done by some of you in Chicago. And at the same time the profits at one gambling house hav averaged one thousand dollars a day this last year. Just think of it. We are indebted to the Bible, Christianity, and ignorance for over seventy thousand fallen women in New York, and two hundred and eighty thousand prostitute men who ruined them through Christian and ignorant influences.

Working men, I want to show you another phase of your situation. We hav a volume of money of about twelve dollars per capita, and only one-third of that in circulation; and we hav a tax of seventeen dollars per head; how can we expect to pay it or prosper? That is, how are we going to pay seventeen dollars with only twelve dollars to pay it with? Do you not see we are running headlong into bankruptcy? But you will add, no doubt (as I hav been told), "It is all right; it's all in the country." I am sorry to say you are dreadfully mistaken, for some of it is in England. You or your children will see how "right" it will be within another hundred years. I tell you you are white slaves, because you produce three billion dollars' worth of luxuries and necessities, and non-producers consume two billion dollars' worth, which leaves you, the producers, one billion dollars, and you do all the work, and are four or five to one. And you are slaves. The bright sun rises to its course, and lights a race of serfs. He sets, and his last beam falls on slaves. Not such as, swept along by the full tide of power, the conqueror leads to crimson glory and undying fame; but base, ignoble slaves—slaves to a horde of banking tyrants and railway despots, and in each hour occurs some dark fraud, open rapine, or protected murder. Oh, out against them.

Working men, if you do not take back the three hundred and fifty million acres of land that hav been stolen from you and given away by the government to the railway rascals and dead beats, besides thirty millions held by them illegally, I shall say that when nature formed you it formed the biggest simpletons, fools, and slaves that ever crawled upon the face of the earth. And, besides this, do you know what the government is doing for you? I will tell you: It is paying the national banks $18,000,000 for issuing $300,000,000 of currency, which it could make and issue for nothing. Forty millions of the people's money is held by the banks in Chicago, with only a million of capital. "Oh," you will add, "it is all in the country." Yes, and so is the following in the country. Within the last six years funds to the amount of six-sevenths of the valuation of the property of the United States and territories hav been wrung from you and passed through the United States treasury. Is that what you went to war for? Yes, and to shoot each other down for thirteen dollars a month, to make a debt of about $2,756,000,000, and to kill each other off to the number of 2,000,000. What were left of you came home (you who had homes) to work worse than black slaves ever did for coupon-clippers, Shylocks, drones, parasites, to reduce the currency from $2,000,000,000 to $700,000,000 in ten years, and also to put a Tweed into a situation to steal $20,000,000 more. Here, again, working slaves, is what the New York Commercial Advertiser says about the millionaires of this country:

"The additions to the fortunes of those identified with Wall street from speculation of 1879 are enormous. Here are the amounts. Added to the Vanderbilt estate, $30,000,000; to the wealth of Jay Gould, $15,000,000; to the wealth of Russell Sage, $10,000,000; Sidney Dillon, $10,000,000; James R. Keene, $8,000,000; to the First National Bank, $2,000,000; to Drexel, Morgan & Co., $2,000,000; and to three or four other great operators, $3,000,000, giving a total of profits of $80,000,000 to about ten or twelve estates in one single year."

What do you think of that, working slaves? Do you think it is all right? It must be; it is in the country.

Now, let me show you this thing in another light. It is stated that W. H. Vanderbilt has purchased, within the last year, and now possesses $31,500,000 of United States four per cent bonds. This is not one-quarter of what he owns to-day. Did he earn it? By the sweat of his brow did he acquire the means with which to buy these bonds? I know you must say no, if you know anything. Let me show you the magnitude of this amount of money. Suppose that twenty-three men had commenced working eighteen hundred years ago, at seventy-five cents per day, working three hundred days in the year; it would hav taken them until now to hav earned that $31,500,000. Think of the ages that hav passed since then!

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Again, let me show you what slaves and fools you are. From 1861 to 1865, when the country was in the throes of civil war, the Shylocks, drones, and thieves conspired together to rob the government of $1,500,000,000. You will probably ask, "How?"

I will tell you. By conspiring together to put up the price of gold, so that, with one dollar in gold, they could buy from two to three dollars of paper money, and then exchange it for bonds, at par. By so doing, they compelled the government to submit to a shave of about $700,000,000 in six per cent (gold) interest, which has been drawing semi-annual interest on an average of fifteen years. Or, in other words, by usurious interest (over the established rate of six per cent), they hav taken from the people, in interest on these bonds, $1,500,000,000; a perfect piece of bare-faced robbery.

Now, let me show you it is so. Suppose that a fleet of war vessels should come to our ports and demand a tribute or bounty of $1,500,000,000 to be paid in annual instalments. What do you think? Would not the press swell the headlines with editorial indignation? How orators would lift up their voices with burning words! How Congress would grow stern and resolute, and vote men and money, without stint, to repel the insolent invaders! Ah! but how is it, ye fools? For fools ye are! You cannot see you are robbed of that amount, because it is done right here at home by drones, thieves, and Shylocks. Now, I suppose, after showing you all this, when election day comes around again, you will be ready to rush out and throw up your hats and hurrah for some old political thief, who cares no more for you than he does for the pavement he walks upon. Are you going to be, as you hav been for years, such blockheads and dolts, to cast your votes for lawyers, bankers, Shylocks, political prostitutes, professional office-seekers, pap-sucking leeches, as you hav done; or are you going to show them that you are determined to be no longer their servants and slaves, to cast your votes as they dictate, for whisky and lager beer? You will probably ask, "Who can we vote for?"

I will tell you. Select some of your own number; men whose lives hav been in sympathy with you and your wants, and vote for them, and go in and elect them; but giv them to understand that they are your servants, and while in office they must attend to your wants, and if they are found guilty of betraying the trust reposed in them, you will make a law to hang them to to the first lamp-post; and be sure and keep your word. Then you will show yourselvs men, but not till then.

Working men, I am going to state here some more of your folly and ignorance. The amount of money annually spent in this country for liquor is one billion dollars, and the criminal fruits of drinking, amounting to ninety millions more, would make the astonishing sum of $1,090,000,000. Massachusetts spends directly $27,000,000. New York spends $246,617,500 for intoxicating drinks alone. The amount of liquors consumed would be sufficient to fill a canal four feet deep, fourteen feet wide, and eight miles long; and the number who drank the stream dry, if formed in procession, five abreast, would make an army one hundred and thirty miles long. Oh, what a lot of fools and simpletons! Where are your intelligence and wisdom? Is it any wonder you are in poverty and rags, and your children starving and in ignorance?

I hav not done with you yet. I am going to show you some more of your loathsome habits. Official statistics show that $350,000,000 was spent for tobacco in 1871, which was more than was spent for bread in the same year. Why, in this little city, LaCrosse, there is one cigar manufacturer who boasts that he sold 1,338,800 cigars in 1881. Why, you slaves, you are a perfect lot of puffing smoke-stacks. You are a fine example for the rising generation, are you not? But this is not all; there was manufactured by one firm forty thousand barrels of lager beer in the same year in this city. I suppose that was drank to quench the smoke in the smoke-stacks of the smokers.

Now, my dear simpletons, or god-be-duped slaves, I am going to tickle you up a little on your religion and superstition. Do you not know that what you hav got in your jobbernols is nothing but a myth, a lie, a humbug, and a farce? Yes,

Your brains are clogged with pulpit mud,
Then find your thirst for human blood!

I will now show you what it costs to save your souls at the expense of starving yourselvs and families. There are over seventy thousand lying, sensual blatherskites called priests in this country, at the enormous expense of over two hundred millions of dollars per annum, and you pay this to those sleek, lascivious despots to preach out of a dirty, lascivious, obscene, and disgusting book called the Bible, about a god which has the most degrading character that ever could be conceived. I will giv you here a few passages, as proof of what I say:

"Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor" (Ex. xxii, 27 and 35).

"The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people: and much people of Israel died" (Num. xxi, 6).

"Now, therefore, kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him," etc. (Num. xxxi, 17).

"And the Lord sent a pestilence upon Israel, and there fell of Israel seventy thousand men," etc. (1 Chron. xxi, 14).

"The Lord will smite with a scab the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion, and the Lord will discover their secret parts," etc. (Isa. iii, 17).

"Thus saith the Lord of hosts concerning the prophets, Behold, I will feed them with wormwood, and make them drink the water of gall" (Jer. xxxiii, 15).

"Thou shalt eat it as barley-cakes, and bake it with dung that cometh out of man" (Ezek. iv, 12).

"If the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord hav deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon them and will destroy them from the midst of my people Israel" (Ezek. xv, 9).

"Samaria shall become desolate; she hath rebelled against her God; they shall fall by the sword; their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up" (Hosea xiii, 16).

"Behold, I will corrupt your seed, and spread dung upon your faces, even the dung of your solemn feasts" (Mal. ii, 3).

I will now turn to the book called the New Testament, and giv you a little of what your Christ and savior says:

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16).

Is that your Christian love? But again:

"Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers! how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" (Matt. xxiii, 33).

And again:

"If a man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26).

Oh, what fine stuff to be called the word of a god! Again:

"But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27).

Why, he must be Guiteau's God, for he said his God instructed him to murder President Garfield to get him out of the way to save the nation in spite of all the prayers of the priests to the contrary. Oh,

What dire calamities do mortals feel
From holy rage and superstitious zeal!

I also want, right here, to examin your Christ a little in another light, and see what was his origin. In the book of Matthew it is stated that an old Jew named Joseph dreamed that a Holy Ghost came upon his betrothed wife (if any one knows what a ghost means), and got her with child. It appears Joe was not very well satisfied with having his betrothed wife made a strumpet and himself a cuckold with horns sticking out of his head. He thought he had better put her away privately, but this angel or ghost (something or nothing, for nobody ever proved what it was) told him not to put her away, but keep her and be satisfied to be called a cuckold; for the child she was big with should be a god, and would play smash in all Israel. Well, after a while, those Jews got so disgusted or dissatisfied with their god that they haled him up and stretched him upon two cross-poles, and nailed him thereon, and stuck long spears or hooks into his side, so that he died. They then took him down and buried him in a sepulcher, but in a few days this dead god rose up a-kicking, and stood upon his feet. As soon as those Jews found that this god who created the universe (for he said, "I and my father are one") was alive again, they were after him, to kill him again, like bloodhounds, but he was too sharp for them the last time, so he escaped and flew off to heaven (if any one knows where that is), and sat on the right hand of himself to judge the quick and the dead when there shall be neither quick nor dead. Now, was there ever anything in the world half as ridiculous as this? Why, you Christians are a lot of the biggest nincompoops and ignoramuses in the world to believe such trash. Ignorance ——"is a monster of so frightful mien

That to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft—familiar with her face—
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Dr. John Mill, an English divine, says he has searched thirty-five years upon the New Testament, which has enabled him to detect the enormous number of eighty thousand different readings of that book. Even the best sentence of Jesus, "Love thy neighbor as thyself," he says, "has been pronounced an interpolation." Mr. Cooper remarked, "Well might the New Testament be compared to Lord Chancellor Eldon's silk stocking that was darned all over with worsted until there was no silk remaining." It is further stated that there are thirty-two thousand different versions or translations of the New Testament in existence. Which is the true one? There are six thousand different religions. Tell me which is the true one, then I will believe. There are eight hundred million pagans and only two hundred million Christians. Only one out of every two hundred of them saved. O ye Christians! your saving grace is very small!

What I hav shown you above is splendid stuff to spout about in the churches, which I call bawdy shops, and which cost you $5,000,000,000 in the United States. Do you not know that you who own a house or shanty hav to pay the tax on this amount of property? And do you not know also that one way or another your taxes and repairs cost you almost as much as if you paid a rent for those houses and shanties? And after all this you are ignorant enough to pay to seventy thousand priests about $200,000,000 out of your hard earnings to those spouting, lascivious force-pumps to stuff you and your children with myths, lies, and hell (and lots of them know it to be so). And they will continue to do it as long as you are fools enough to pay them for the imposition, the fraud, and the humbug.

The priest whose acts the blackest vices taint,
For his own glory makes a perfect saint.

I am going to appeal to you once more, and probably for the last time. I want you, for your own good and the good of your children after you, to take my advice. Be sure and think for yourselvs, and be sure and make good hard sense catching. Raise up your children to think for themselvs, and not stick priestly lies, myths, and superstition into their heads to make them crazy zealots and bigots. Patronize no church, no religion, whether called true or false; no missionary humbug, no Christs, no gods of any kind, no office, pap-sucking, carpetbag politicians, do away with that sink-hole in Washington, support no grog or whisky shops, play no cards or gambling of any kink, use no tobacco or cigars, avoid all advertising quack medicins or quack drug shops, support no rotten law nor lawyers, but be a law unto yourselvs. Go and fight for no bloated Shylock, banker, railroad, telegraph, express, or any other corporation, monopoly, or speculations, but fight for your own independence. If they want any fighting done, let them do it themselvs, and above all, never more be driven to the polls like sheep to the slaughter by any leech or tyrant, and you will show yourselvs men.

Now I hav told you not what to do. I will now tell you what to do. Be sure and vote for some of the most sensible and intelligent men amongst your ranks, for there are such (as I hav said before), and be sure you elect them. Pay no attention to wire-pullers and rings. You are a large majority. You can do it if you will. If you do not, whatever be your fate it will be just what you deserve; yes, mark you, just what you deserve! And as sure as you neglect those things I hav told you, so sure will the consequences be. Yes, this boasted free country of yours will be a second Ireland as sure as night follows day. Now here it is: I am only one, and can but giv you good advice; if you take it, it will be well; if not, your doom is sealed, and so is your children's. I bid you good-bye, probably forever. I am the friend and well-wisher of the whole human race,

J. PETTEY.

IT doesn't look well for a churchwarden to take an umbrella to church, and carry it into his pew and hang to it. He should leave it out in the vestibule, with that supreme confidence that a man has when he bets on four aces.

A Rejoinder to Mr. B. F. Underwood.

THE TRUE INWARDNESS OF MR. WAKEMAN'S OPEN LETTER TO HIM.

NEW YORK, May 10, 1882.

Dear Sir: A severe illness has prevented earlier attention to your replies to my open letter to you in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 8th.

Were it not necessary to complete the purpose for which that letter was written, nothing more would be said. That purpose was stated at its opening to be to awaken "moral consciousness, and the possibility of understanding the enormity of the false position taken by you and the Index."

That letter was designed as a stinging counter-irritant to a "comatose patient," and it has answered its purpose very well. When you compelled me to write it I meant it should answer some useful purpose beyond a personal justification of myself. That purpose was to make the Index and you recognize your true position, or at least to enable others to do it, and to appreciate its traitorous character, to which you and the Index appeared to hav become wholly insensible.

Thus I sought to turn to good advantage your importunity. For you would hav a letter; you fairly "jumped upon me" with cries of "false statement," so that you compelled me to tell you the truth. The result seems to show that you received a little more fire than you expected; if so, remember that desperate cases of spiritual pride require desperate remedies.

My justification was easy enough, and stands complete. As the good old Investigator says, I hav "made out my case." As the Mayflower says, that open letter is a "volley of unanswerable facts." You do not dispute but one of a dozen quotations; you really make no defense. You cannot. Every one sees how clearly the quoted words convict you and your Index of bearing false witness, and you cannot parry them.

When all of the main charges are thus practically admitted and close you in hopelessly, you make a futil effort to escape from the grip of only one, and that a minor quotation. You can find no way out but one little knot-hole, and in that one you are stuck. You present in that a new illustration of your art of innuendo, thus: You say that it is "strictly true" "that the League demands the repeal of all postal laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails."

These words, published in the Index after its statement "that the League was in favor of the transmission of [such] matter and of a vile traffic unhindered by any law," could only be taken as a repetition of that libel, and any person of ordinary sense (as you are) would know they would be so taken. Yet you sought to keep open the subterfuge for escape by saying the words are "strictly true." But they are not strictly true. The League has not opposed all postal laws. It has opposed only that "United States Comstock law," which placed a censorship and espionage over the mails, and made them traps for Comstockism and its societies." The League did not oppose "all postal laws," but one specific Comstock law.

Again, the states hav time and again prohibited the transmission of matter by mail under the most stringent "postal laws." That by such laws the slave states were formerly hermetically sealed against "incendiary" literature is well known. To such postal laws, if necessary, the League has constantly appealed. Thus your one attempt at defense only illustrates again how false and wrong it is to seek to hide a slanderous innuendo under "strict truth," which is not the whole truth. Such a defense explodes at the breech. Better hav said nothing.

Nor as to the other and the great charge which my letter presented in order to effect its counter-irritant purpose can you make any defense. Since 1878, when the Index found that it could not rule the League, it has done its level best to ruin it, to make it a "wreck," and to be able to declare it "dead." To accomplish this purpose its only weapons hav been public slander and private detraction. That the League and the Liberal cause hav been greatly injured is beyond dispute, and the Index is responsible for that injury. After it has run the whole pack of Christian curs, Mr. Comstock, Rev. Joseph Cook, the New York Independent, Scribner's Monthly, the "religious" press generally, and the secular press to a large extent, responsivly echoed the Index. It was the sponsor for this whole "gang," to use your friend Bundy's cultured language when he speaks of the League. These charges and facts are plainly proved, and are indeed notorious. Now you, as the co-secessionist, adviser, companion, and finally successor and alter ego of the lost Mr. Abbot, come forward to condemn me for making "a false statement," and to defend the Index in its course of defamation.

The stinging words of the open letter were to make you see "the enormity of this position." The fluttering bird shows that it has been hit. That you and your Index were hit in a tender spot the wild work of your replies makes clear to every eye. This false and traitorous position thus made plain is evidently not pleasing to you. That is natural, and greatly to your credit. Your fluttering is a sign of life, and, it is to be hoped, of health.

But should not a gentleman and a philosopher either disprove the facts or acknowledge their truth and mend his ways by taking heed thereunto? But what do you do? Without denying the facts, which are proved overwhelmingly, as if clean daft with rage, you quote a long editorial from your Index to show that you, and it, knew perfectly well that all of these slanders it had been uttering and insinuating to kill the League for years past were—what? true! no, but wholly false, and that the Index knew that they were false all the time!

What position is that for a sensible man to put himself in?

You quote these words from the Index of July 14, 1881: "Common fairness, therefore, demands the admission that those generally who ask for the repeal of these laws hav no sympathy whatever with obscenity, and rely on other agencies for its suppression." From the same editorial other passages of similar meaning might be taken.

Then why slander and get all of the Christian world to slandering these repealers? Why call down upon them "blows from the aroused conscience of the country" because when they meet as a League they put their views in the form of a resolution?

It is this hopelessly inconsistent position of the Index that is generally felt to be false, wicked, perfidious, traitorous, and absurd.

Yes, I expected you would bring out the rest of that editorial (from which I quoted fairly only Mr. Abbot's utterances), by way of avoidance, but it is a plain confession of the falsehood of the slanders of the Index and of its whole course in relation to the League, and its members, since 1878.

The Index seems to hav the notion that it may go on uttering, inculcating, and insinuating slanders for years, but that if it makes a sly confession of their falsehood in some unnoticeable way occasionally, then it is all right and it is morally absolved.

Mr. Abbot introduced this novel method of absolution in the Index. For instance, he was compelled to admit that not a word was uttered by the "majority" at the Syracuse League Congress which he or any one could call improper, and yet he made the public believe that the obscenity was so thick that the poor "minority" could hardly cut their way through it and get out alive. This was done, too, when the only improper words used at that Congress came from the leader of the Index people on the floor—the very man who exploded the "modification" fraud by saying that the Comstock laws were well enough as they are.

Now, what I wanted to make you and the Index see was that the falsity of a slander, and even the confession of its falsity, does not justify its circulation, but, on the contrary, is the best reason in the world for stopping it. The evidence, which you cannot and do not try to deny, shows that your Index has outrageously slandered the League since 1878.

Its editorial quoted by you shows that it knew better. My letter was written to make it felt that such a course was an "enormity." Every word of my letter seems to hav been within the truth, every epithet, however severe, in it, is sustained by the facts stated. Its effect has been such as I wish to produce—a lively exposure and appreciation of the position of the Index and its editors toward the Liberals of the country. It was evident that nothing but an incisiv statement of the truth could enable the Index "to see itself as others see it."

Little as you may now believe it, that letter was rather from a friend than an enemy. Well would it be if you could believe that now. Liberal blood should be thicker than water. The Index should not spend its strength to destroy those of the same household of faith if it is to be a Liberal paper at all. Its editors should not get cards calling them "Judases." It should not be spoken of by one of its principal Liberal neighbors, Mr. Chainey, in this way: "I should be much obliged if the Index would point us to any affirmation they ever made that has not been made in these lectures. I dislike to speak against those who claim to be engaged in the service of liberty. But he who wears your colors, and professes to fight on your side, and then turns his sword against you in the thick of the fight, is the most cowardly and meanest of all traitors."

The Index has had, I think, little notion of the extent of the feeling thus voiced by Mr. Chainey. It would seem to hav lapsed into a comatose condition of spiritual pride which has hid from it its own wrong-doing. While it has for years been guilty of doing what it could to injure the League by slander and personal detraction, while it practically confesses that it knew better, it has been edited in the spirit of the Pharisee and of "Holy Willie," backed by the unforgiving spirit of their bigotry. Between its slanderous lines their self-righteous prayers were always visible:

"O God! I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican" [or that vile Liberal Leaguer].

"I bless and praise thy matchless might,
When thousands thou hast left in night,
That I am here afore thy sight
For gifts an' grace—
A burnin' an' a shinin' light
To a' this place."

Nothing is more blinding than the pride of which the above are immortal expressions. If my open letter has done something to make that spirit, and its consequences, more visible and hateful to you and to others, it has accomplished its object.

The rest of your reply calls for but a few words. As you had no case upon the merits, you followed the traditional advice, "to abuse the plaintiff's attorney." Liberals should never allow their passions, not even their indignation, to rise above the mouth. The head should be kept cool and clear. Your personal attack was evidently made in a rage, and to me it shall be as though not a word of it had ever been uttered. I hav no personal grievance or ill-feeling toward you. The awakening purpose of my letter I knew would necessarily involve the exciting of feelings, of the natural expression of which I will not complain. You cry out indignantly at my reference to your arbitration, and I think you would be justly indignant if your conduct toward other persons and their records had not made this allusion to your own a necessary argumentum ad hominem. "Judge not, lest ye be judged," applies to you. I had no other way, except by trying it on, to make you feel how sweet a thing personal detraction is. I had just read how tenderly you spoke of one of the lady vice-presidents of the League, in your Index of October 13, 1881, and I was fresh from your last invidious mention of men and women who are missionaries of the League in the Liberal field, bravely struggling under obloquy, want, privation, anxiety, and even your sly abuse, to do what they can to emancipate the human heart and mind. I had a right to speak for them, for they cannot speak for themselvs. I wanted you to feel how they felt when they read your cunning innuendoes and insinuations. The right purpose called for the right instrument. A slight reference to your innocent record effected that object. You and the Index are fond of hauling over the records of others. You, whose delight seems to be this kind of torture—can you not stand one turn of the screw without a cry?

"If you can feel for yourself, you may learn to respect the feelings and to state fairly the motivs and purposes of others." Such I stated as my object in writing to you. Every epithet or reference I used was for that object only, and is justified by it and the facts. But the question of motivs is always relevant. And you hav not even yet learned to state fairly the motivs of others. You freely insinuate that my "motivs" are bad; that I wish to "bend you to my purpose;" that there are "motivs you very well understand;" that I hav personal ends," and that my object was not "the defense of the League."

The man who makes such wild insinuations discredits himself. I hav no business, or personal interests, or even wishes, whatever, involved in this matter. Unlike you, I hav never made a cent by Liberalism. And as to honor, though I appreciate it, I shall only be too glad to hail a less busy man as my successor as president of the League at its next Congress.

How any one could be freer from "motivs" than I it would be hard to tell. I hav no interest in Liberalism except its success. Your attacks upon my motivs, and me, personally, are much like the Rev. Braden's attacks upon Col. Ingersoll. Anything you can lay your hands upon, however irrelevant, will do to blacken the water, so that you can escape the griping force of the facts against your Index.

Let me impress upon you and the Index the words and the example of Col. Ingersoll, to whom you refer. Who ever heard him say a word against any Liberal? He says: "Meanness cannot descend beyond the level of him who will endeavor to blacken the reputation of another, simply because he cannot answer his argument. I despise, I execrate, with every drop of my blood any man or woman who wilfully attempts to destroy the reputation of another." Never forget those words!

When he withdrew from the League, he did it upon principle. He was a Republican in politics, leaning, I fear, toward the centralization of the general government. You, a Jeffersonian Democrat, had no principle to leave upon. He has never spoken a word against the League or its members, but otherwise, as far as he could. He has acted as one who could differ from other Liberals without bragging of himself, or condemning them, or misrepresenting their motivs, or ceasing to co-operate with them in any other Liberal work. He has tried to help up instead of to strike down. With him, after all, Liberal blood is thicker than water.

If the Index had imitated him, it would never hav been thought of as an enemy or a traitor, but as a friend, differing only as to some minor questions of civil administration. In that event I should hav been spared the necessity of writing you that open letter. But in doing that, my only wish was that of Burns for his "Auld Nickie Ben:"

"Oh, wad ye tak' a thought an' men'!
Ye aiblins might, I dinna ken—"

Therefore, I am still hopefully yours,

T. B. WAKEMAN.

"Liberty and Purity" in Wisconsin.

The following letter from the Milwaukee Republican and News of April 21st last, goes to show that the victory over "Comstockism" in Wisconsin was won because the battle was chiefly fought upon the principle of secular republican popular government, as against the government of amateur theological societies. Whenever and wherever that issue is made and understood, "Comstockism" will find its final resting-place. When the people understand it, they will never giv up the enforcement of their laws to any such new-fangled attempts at theocracy, which first originated with Mr. Comstock. This letter is a valuable addition to "Liberty and Purity," Mr. Wakeman's indispensable book on this issue, and it will hereafter be printed with it:

In your issue of March 21st, last, you giv to the world a reply or justification signed by M. Masson, secretary of a society for the suppression of vice, in which are some things which need correction, in justice to me and to others. For instance, in regard to my little book, "Liberty and Purity," Mr. Anthony Comstock is made to say of me that he never saw me defend but one case in court, and that was of a vender of obscenity, and his client was convicted. This is simply untrue. I never defended or tried any such case in any court. And my League position in regard to the legal questions involved is such that it would be indelicate and improper for me to act professionally in any such case. This matter is fully discussed at page 38 of the book "Liberty and Purity," which M. Masson appears to hav had in his possession. Again, Mr. Comstock is made to say that the speech "Liberty and Purity" is not the speech I delivered before the committee of the Assembly of New York as it purports; and that many of the "gross" statements therein contained I never would hav dared to make in his presence. This is also untrue; the speech was delivered orally before the committee from full notes, in which all the charges "gross" or otherwise were distinctly numbered. I went over each number carefully, much to Mr. Comstock's evident disquietude and with frequent interruptions from him. At the conclusion, as some of the matters had been called in question, and as some of the proofs were called for, I asked leave of the committee to submit a printed copy of my address with the proofs and corrections inserted. This permission was cheerfully granted. The speech was printed from my notes, a few corrections inserted, the proofs supplied, and as thus printed was delivered to the committee weeks before they reported. Thus the speech, as it stands to-day, was delivered before, and to the committee, and no one has ever called any of its statements in question before, except it be in this instance: The Rev. Dr. Potter has stated in Scribner's Monthly that the report from his sermon, on page 28, varied to some extent, though I think not materially, from the written texts of his discourse. It seems that the quotation was made from a phonographic report of the sermon as delivered; and my belief is that the zeal of the learned doctor had, for a time, lifted him above the cool text of his manuscript. The trouble with Mr. Comstock is quite well understood in our state. As some people become color blind he has become truth blind. And his statements always hav to be confirmed by other evidence or else taken with more than one grain of salt. This infirmity often befalls professional spies, detectivs, and informers. This is the reason that our legislature passed an act last year preventing his evidence from being taken in any court as to persons accused by him. That act was vetoed, but it is pending before our present legislature, and the necessity is such that it may be passed and not vetoed this year.

Wherever his great libel, "Frauds Exposed," goes, it needs to accompany it little "Liberty and Purity" as a witness to the truth.

The said M. Masson, secretary, also undertakes to make a statement of his own, in which he seems to be a worthy disciple of Mr. Comstock in his failure to state facts as they are. He says near the close of his reply, that I am the "T. B. Wakeman who is the president of the National Liberal League, which advocated the repeal of the United States laws against obscenity and became sympathizers and defenders of dealers in obscene publications." It is true that I am president of that League; it is not true that the League advocated the repeal of all the United States laws against obscenity, of which there are a great number applicable under the revenue laws, and districts and territories of the United States. The League protested against "Comstockism" in the states and national government, or in the proceedings within the courts. That is, they protested, first, against the farming out of the enforcement of criminal laws to amateur, irresponsible, and semi-theological societies in the states. Second, in the United States government they protested against the "Comstock postal law," by which the inviolability of the mail was destroyed in principle, and a censorship and espionage was established, under the Jackson decision, within the post-office, contrary to the express injunction of such statesmen as Webster, Clay, and Calhoun.

Also they protested against the use of the post office as a detection bureau of these Comstock societies for the purpose, among others, of throwing into United States courts for trial common law offenses, which do not constitutionally belong there.

Third. They protested against the introduction of a lot of English precedents into our courts, under these Comstock laws, by which the right of trial by jury became practically a farce.

It was not until the position of the League upon these questions was found to be invincible that its character became so bad. But this charge that it became the sympathizer and defender of the dealers in obscene matter, etc., has not the slightest foundation. If M. Masson had turned to page 46 of "Liberty and Purity," he would hav seen that the League has always favored, in the strongest manner possible, the enforcement of proper and effectiv laws for suppressing the offenses referred to; but it insists that those laws shall be enforced by the regular authorities, and not by any amateur, irresponsible, and bigoted "Comstockism." Because the League would not thus consent to hav common law, common sense, and the Constitution violated, the cry was raised by those who had no other argument that it was in favor of obscenity. Such a charge is not only false, but is disgraceful to anyone who uses or countenances it for a moment. Those who use it are simply slanderers.

But then Mr. M. Masson must hav known the position of the League on reading "Liberty and Purity," and his repetition of this charge leads strongly to the suspicion that the Society for the Suppression of Vice in Wisconsin had better begin with its secretary, and prevent him from bearing false witness against his neighbor.

Yours respectfully, T. B. WAKEMAN.

AN Ohio man has been struck by lightning nine times, and isn't dead yet. You hav to take office away from an Ohio man to kill him.

A PROMINENT lumberman has had his coat-of-arms painted on the panels of his carriage, with the Latin motto "Vidi," which by interpretation is "I saw."

A SAN FRANCISCO man has been arrested for deceiving a widow. While his crime is to be abhorred, it must be admitted that his genius commands admiration.

A MAN who wants his wife to love and respect him will never make the mistake of putting his feet into her slippers. Years of devotion will not wipe out the insult.

"TAKE that right away," said the young man to the waiter, as he pointed to a saucer of whipped cream which had been brought for his strawberries; "I did not come here to get shaved."

A GENTLEMAN went into a dry-goods store and asked for ten yards of naked cambric. The young lady blushed and said: "I guess you mean undressed cambric?" "Oh, yes! that's it!"

THEY had been married exactly ten months, and one day when she found it necessary to sign a paper, she wrote her maiden name in full. "What?" he ejaculated. "Oh! how foolish," she said, "I forgot that I was married." And then he jammed his hands down into his pockets and wondered if that was any reflection on his character or what.

AN EXAMPLE OF A CHRISTIAN AT WORK.

THE editor of a well-known religious journal called one evening on a friend who was a deacon in the church. His wife received the visitor, explaining that her husband would be down in a few minutes. During the conversation there were noises upstairs which proceeded unmistakably from the flogging of a boy. Pretending not to comprehend the cause of the sounds the editor said:

"Perhaps I hav interfered with some important engagement of your husband's?"

"Not at all," she replied, "he'll be at leisure soon; he's only furnishing an example of a Christian at work!"

THE NEWER ARITHMETIC.

If it costs a colored family eighty cents per week to keep four dogs and a goat, how much less will it cost if a policeman breaks the goat's neck and two of the dogs get in the way of a street car?

Six times seven girls are how many girls, and what on earth are they good for?

A lady bought a hat for $12, a set of frizzes for $4, a pair of shoes for $6, and a comb for $3. How much would all hav cost her if the man hadn't told her that he had quit the trust system?

A woman pays seventy-five cents for a shirt for her husband and $9 for a pair of silk hose for herself. What was the cost of both?

A man gave $3 to the Foreign Missionary fund and chipped in a nickel to buy a two-shilling Testament for a home murderer. How much did he giv in all? Also, if the soul of one heathen is worth fifty times the soul of an intelligent white man, how much more valuable is the soul of an Indian than a Congressman's?

A tramp has 200 feet to go to reach a gate, while the farmer's dog has 300 feet to go to bite the tramp. The tramp travels at the rate of twelve miles an hour, and the dog at the rate of twenty. How near the gate will the poor, discouraged sufferer be when the canine catches on?

A man who gulps down a five-cent glass of beer and tells the saloon-keeper to charge it, is obliged to pay a doctor $2.50 for cementing a crack in his skull, while the saloonist is fined $3 for doing such a cracking good businesss. How much money was involved altogether, and how much would hav been saved if the beat had waited until a candidate came along and asked him to take something?

A housewife sold a goat to a pedler for a vase worth nine cents, a pair of boots for a china dog worth six cents, and a vest for a glass bottle worth four cents. How much did she receive for all, and how much over $6 clear profit did the pedler make?

A grocer takes twenty-eight pounds of butter worth thirty-two cents per pound, and mixes it with fifty-six pounds of butter worth fourteen cents per pounds. He then hangs out a sign of "gilt-edged butter," and sells the whole for twenty-nine cents per pound. How much does he make?

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Enrope, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of he work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

A Short History of the Bible,

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory. The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in mature years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits, or were upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system, GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Bubo, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR,

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, aided by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, and system based upon scientific fact.'

[From the (Me.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Notes and Clippings.

It is now considered safe to announce that summer is upon us.

Beecher has gone to the country. We cannot state where Mrs. Tilton is.

The Rev. Peter Lewis, pastor of the Enon Baptist church, Washington, has been fined $2 for drunkenness.

Col. Abe Buford, the Kentuckian who is engaged in the laudable endeavor to effect a union between the turf and the church, accuses Talmage of having plagiarized his sermon on the "hoss."

Mr. Darwin left an autobiography behind him. There has also been found among his papers a sketch of his father about equal in length to that of his grandfather, which was published some time ago.

The Massachusetts Medical Society voted, 104 to 60, to admit properly qualified women to membership; but changes in the constitution cannot be made without the consent of the council, a kind of executiv committee, and this has been refused.

The Supreme Secular Benevolent Association of Port Jervis, N. Y., filed its certificate of incorporation on the 24th ult. It has for its objects, among other things, the doing away with the observance of Sunday and national days of thanksgiving as religious days, and the abolishment of the use of the Bible in public schools.

The Women's Temperance Union of Brooklyn held a prayer meeting on the 27th ult., for the success of the prohibition ballot cast that day in Iowa. As this is a country in which the power comes from the people, invoking the aid of a foreign potentate is wholly undemocratic, and the Women's Temperance Union ought to know it.

The Rev. Dr. George Washburn, president of Robert College, Constantinople, writes to the Independent that "there is less interest in foreign missions in America than there has been at any time during the last thirty years. There has been no increase of contributions commensurate with the increase of wealth and popula-in the country. The societies depend more and more upon legacies, which represent the feeling of a past rather than the present generation." He calls for more zeal, more men, and more money.

Four clergymen assembled in the church of a departed vicar, in Somersetshire, England, to act as pall bearers at his funeral When the ceremony was about to commence it was discovered that the grave was too small, and, as considerable delay was inevitable, the mourners adjourned to the neighboring vicarage house, while the reverend pall bearers remained with the coffin, which had been set down in the chancel. When the sexton presently arrived to announce that all was ready, he found them absorbed in a rubber of whist, the coffin being used as a card table.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, who, about a year ago, was sent by his friends and admirers throughout the country on a trip around the world, reached California early in June, and on the evening of June 5th a large meeting of the Liberals of the Pacific coast extended to the veteran editor a cordial welcome. We understand that all along the route from California to New York Mr. Bennett will receive the warm congratulations of his friends, who will hold meetings and invite him to speak. Mr. Comstock and the Vice Society tried to brand Mr. Bennett as a felon, but his friends, both in this country and in Europe, are weaving for his brow the garlands of the hero. He was banqueted in London, received great attention in India, and now the heartiness with which he is welcomed home exhibits the contempt which honorable men and women feel for those who attempted to persecute and crush him.—Foote's Health Monthly.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean has a department wherein questions propounded by correspondents are attempted to be answered, and hitherto we hav regarded the department as being of value in giving information on not commonly understood subjects, but in that paper, for June 15th, is one so outrageously at variance with truth and decency as to throw discredit on the whole department. It is in relation to D. M. Bennett (proprietor of the New York Truth Seeker), and the article of 1,000 ems (about three inches in length) contains seventeen squarely stated lies. Such a department in the Inter-Ocean must be valuable.—The Blade.

Admirers of the late Jesse James, Baptist, hav called attention to the fact that though so much wealth passed through his hands he died comparativly a poor man. This tribute to his character becomes additionally impressiv through the gradual distribution of his humble means among people who set up prior claims. Thus Mr. Rountree has repossessed himself of the watch which Jesse wore when he was shot, and which the latter had stolen from him in 1880; and Mr. Evans, in a replevin suit, has recovered a saddle of which Jesse robbed him, though the horse that went along with it has disappeared. If all the nominal property of the late Mr. James finds its proper owners there will be left very little indeed for his widow, and his kin.

Bishop Gilmour of Ohio may possibly be right in condemning the Ladies' Land League. But when young women join such organizations it does not follow by any means that they "forget their womanhood" and "turn themselvs into brawling politicians." The latter phrase, repeated several times in the bishop's card, exhibits too much feeling. Quarrels between Catholic bishops and Irish people, formerly regarded as impossible, are now quite frequent. They constitute a portion of the increasing evidence of the general decline of faith. Where there is perfect faith there is obedience, and quarrels are impossible. In the breaking of the ties between priests and people the church is weakened.—Sun.

The new Russian law on the Jews, which the emperor is pleased to approve, contains the following provisions: "1. We forbid the Jews to settle anew outside of the cities and the villages. Jewish agricultural colonies are exempted from this rule. 2. We forbid the Jews to purchase, to procure by mortgage, to rent, or to take charge of any real estate outside of the cities and the villages. 3. We forbid the Jews to conduct any trade on Sundays or on the twelve great Christian holidays, and order that Jews shall observe the same rules concerning the closing of places of business as are observed by Christians." And yet complaint is made by Christians because the law does not allow them to banish to the mines of Siberia any Jew whom they may "deem obnoxious."

The superstitious ceremony of "waking the dead" has for centuries been, and still is, practised in one of the northern Scotch counties. A house with a corpse in it becomes, for the two or three days between death and burial, the rendezvous of the neighbors, who sit and tell stories—particularly ghost stories—ostensibly to dissipate the grief of the bereaved. Such gatherings, which are largely attended by young lovers, differ from Irish wakes in that the Scotch bring their own tobacco and pipes. The people of this district are all free church and free drinkers. Whisky abounds. Great offense was given by a teetotaler substituting milk, and it is opined that there will be few mourners at the next funeral in that house. What connection there is between Scotch whisky and the resurrection is not clearly set forth.

The Sun hits the New York preachers a rap on knuckles already sore thus: "The usual number of preachers hav engaged passage for Europe this summer, and their flocks will get scanty attendance. In a recent Congregational council the candidate was asked whether he would receive into the church a man who insisted on going to Coney Island after morning service, and to the theater after he became a member of the church. The minister replied that he would consider such a one a subject for careful pastoral attention. It requires usually two Sundays with the intervening week days to cross the sea, but clerical brethren do not scruple at this, while a few hours on a Sunday afternoon by the sea makes the church-member who enjoys it an object of 'careful pastoral attention.' It would be inconvenient if some rules worked both ways."

The artless prattle of a babe is often to the point. One of those unreasonably bright children who are always getting people into difficulties was at a prayer-meeting the other evening with his mother, when he asked aloud, "Ma, say ma—who was Dinah Moore?" "Hu-u-sh," whispered his mother cautiously, "it's a hymn." "No, it ain't, ma," continued the hopefut, "it's a woman's name; say, who's going home to Dinah Moore?" "Willie," said his mother in a ghastly voice, "you're disturbing the meeting. It means going to heaven to die no more." "Dine no more! O ma, don't they eat anything there?" His mother explained as well as she could, and Willie sat still for half a minute, his bright eyes roving about the church. Then he asked in a shrill whisper, "Ma, is God out of town?" "No-o-o, no-no," answered the distracted woman, faintly. "Then what's Mr. Kelly running this meeting for, ma?" continued the sweet child. The choir sang him down, but as the meeting closed with a moment of silent prayer, his gentle voice was distinctly heard.

In view of the charges against our postal officials made in our columns last week by the secretary of the Anti-Monopoly League, and the general tyrannical and unconstitutional way in which the postmasters usurp power to pry into mail matter, the following from the Sun is of interest. We commend these remarks to the postmaster-general: "It seems that there is a missing witness wanted by the prosecution in the Malley murder trial at New Haven. His name is John J. Gilchrist. On the preliminary investigation he testified positivly to having seen James Malley and Jennie Cramer together on the evening before the body was found. Now he does not come forward to testify at all. His whereabouts is unknown. At the post-office in New Haven a notice to the clerks has been put up in these words: 'If you find a letter addressed to John J. Gilchrist, bring it to me. N. D. Sperry, Postmaster.' Now, we make bold to inquire, if Mr. Sperry shall thus obtain possession of a letter addressed to Mr. Gilchrist, what will he do with it? Does he propose to open it, in order to ascertain the name of some correspondent and acquaintance of the missing witness? Is it his intention to deliver such a letter, if one comes, to the district attorney, or somebody other than the person to whom it is directed? Or will he merely scrutinize the postmark and the handwriting on the envelope, to see what he can get in that way? Even if he intends to study only the exterior of the letter, we doubt whether he is justified in requiring its submission to him for the purpose which is here really in view. A postmaster may properly examin the superscription of the letters that pass through his office by reading them in person if he likes, instead of leaving that duty wholly to his clerks. But neither he nor they can warrantably carry their scrutiny any further than is necessary to ascertain the person to whom and the place at which the letter is intended to be delivered. Mr. Sperry's placard indicates that he is willing to use his power as postmaster to pry into matters which it may be very desirable for somebody to elucidate, but in regard to which the post-office ought not to be made a detectiv agency. The assumption of such authority is too dangerous to be tolerated. If a postmaster is disposed to use the letters which pass through his office as a means of informing himself concerning the affairs of those who write or receive them, the sooner he is translated into some other sphere of worldly activity the better."

News of the Week.

A revolution has broken out in Uruguay, S. A.

A scrap of land in this city 16x29 feet was sold recently for $168,000.

The freight handler's strike in this city has caused great damage to merchants.

Bradlaugh was recently ordered out of Parliament when he attempted to present a petition.

Seventy-five thousand bushels of charcoal were destroyed by fire in Pittsfield, Mass., on the 25th ult.

The Malley trial is approaching the end. There is said to be scarcely one chance in a thousand for conviction.

Mrs. Scoville, Guiteau's sister and wife of his counsel, George Scoville, is reported wandering about the country insane.

Col. Ingersoll is spending the summer at Long Branch, a watering place on the coast of New Jersey, where he has rented a cottage.

Gov. Blackburn, of Kentucky, has been "converted" by revivalist Barnes. Kentucky is a great place for horses, whisky, and religion.

Another cyclone in Iowa, this time in Emmetsburg, has caused the death of fifty people and destroyed many thousand dollars' worth of property.

The Rev. James Clements, of Brook's Station, Ga., was killed by his team while plowing one day last week. Obvious warning: it is blasphemy to plow.

Prof. Swing, of Chicago, has retired from the editorial control of the Alliance, and will be succeeded by Mr. George C. Miln, the recent convert to Agnosticism.

Michael Davitt, the founder of the Land League, is lecturing through the eastern part of the country amid great enthusiasm. The agitator has but one arm.

William H. Mundy, president of the Gospel Temperance Society, is in jail, charged with extorting money from keepers of disorderly houses in return for immunity from prosecution.

The Rev. R. Moffat Neil, of Brooklyn, is accused of preaching to his present congregation under an alias, previous immoral conduct having made unsavory his real name, which is O'Neil.

The New York Democrats are talking of the Hon. Roswell P. Flower as candidate for governor this fall. Mr. Flower has shown himself sound on many questions of importance to the people at large.

The Hebrew Aid Society hav notified the authorities that they can receive no more Russo-Jewish refugees. The number of arrivals is too vast for the society to cope with, and they will hereafter be turned over to the regular Castle Garden authorities.

The President and Cabinet hav decided not to interfere with the regular course of the law in Guiteau's case, and the murderer swings on Friday, the 30th ult. He still clings to the inspiration theory, and goes to the gallows a victim of the Christian superstition.

England is getting troop ships ready to send to Egypt to protect English interests in that country. It is not improbable that England will sooner or later add Egypt to her already extensiv domains. Arabi Pasha, the new ruler, threatens to blow up the Suez canal if he is interfered with.

The Hillsdale amateur four hav arrived in England. Amateur oarsmen in England, having not yet forgotten their recent defeats by American crews, are protesting strongly against the admission of the Hillsdales to their contests on the ground that the American crew is composed of men who work for a living.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

TEA AND CINCHONA.

Besides tea, much cinchona is being grown in these lower mountain districts about Darjeeling, and a few words about these crops may be admissible. Cinchona, as perhaps some of you do not know, is the tree which yields the bark called "Peruvian bark," which yields the very valuable alkaloid, quinine. This useful medicine was first learned by the Jesuit missionaries who went to Peru to teach the followers of the Incas a religion of "love," and the bark was long called "Jesuit's bark" in consequence. If they did not confer much benefit upon the Peruvians, the Peruvians certainly conferred a great benefit upon them, and through them upon the world. Quinine, and the other parts of cinchona, in the cure of intermittent fevers, has proved of inestimable value, though, like most other good things, they become evil when used to excess. Millions of people have been benefited by the use of quinine, and doubtless hundreds of thousands have been injured by using too much of it. The consumption of this article is immense, and the demand always good. To obtain a sufficient supply of the cinchona bark has been a great desideratum. The Peruvian stock has been greatly lessened, and other parts of the world have been looked to for a supply. India and Ceylon are now contributing largely to satisfy this steady and extensive demand, and the country around Darjeeling is doing its share. I saw a gentleman just from Ceylon, where the cinchona is much grown, to engage, five or six thousand feet up among the Himalayas, in the cinchona culture. The business is a profitable one, but it requires six years for a return. The trees are duly planted out on ground cleared up for the purpose, and when six years old they are cut down and the bark taken off. This gentleman told me of one man who, on a hundred acres, cleared the handsome sum of $40,000 in the six years. There are several different varieties, yielding greater or lesser percentage of quinine, but the calisaya is the favorite because it yields the most. There are now nearly 5,000 acres in cinchona in the vicinity about Darjeeling, and the increase of acreage steadily continues. This branch of culture was commenced here twenty years ago, and promises to become very extensive. The quinine being the most valuable alkaloid which the bark yields, that variety yielding the largest proportion is of course most esteemed. The other alkaloids residing in the bark are cichonine, quinidine, and cinchonidine. They exist in different proportions in the different varieties of bark. The calisaya quinine represents about ninety per cent of the entire alkaloids present. In the six years the trees reach a growth of four or five inches in diameter, and a hight of some thirty feet. This is far from their full size, but the planter is anxious to "realize" as soon as possible, and six years is regarded as a profitable age when to make the harvest.

Tea you all know about, but possibly you will not object to knowing a little more. The tea plant seems to thrive very well on these high and black hills forming the lower portions of the Himalayas. A fair yield for the tea plant when five years of age is six hundred pounds of cured leaves per acre. When twelve years of age it has reached maturity, and should then yield nine hundred pounds per acre. So if it averages in market price a rupee (forty-five cents) a pound, the planter is doing very well; all expenses are paid and a good margin for profit.

As I said before, it is not the matured leaf which makes the best tea, but it must be picked while the leaves are still tender. The natives become very expert at picking, and seem to know in an instant, and almost by instinct, which leaves to pick and which not. The more young and succulent the leaf when harvested the better the quality of the tea. It is important in picking to leave enough of the leaves at the end of the branches or twigs to keep them alive. If all the leaves of the plant were plucked it would be very likely to die.

The leaves are named as follows, from the teas they make; supposing there are six leaves on a shoot of the tree or plant: 1. Flowery Pekoe; 2. Orange Pekoe; 3. Pekoe; 4. Souchong; 5. Congon; or mixed together—1, 2, 3, Peakoe or 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, Pekoe-Souchong. No 6 is called Bohea.

In the evening all the leaf pickers are called into the factory, where, after weighing the leaf in their respective baskets, it is spread lightly on bamboo mats or trays, tier above tier, to allow the leaf to wither. There are several tests to show when the leaf is properly withered. Fresh leaf pressed in the hand, and held to the ear, crackles, but no sound should be heard from the withered leaf The stem part of a withered leaf will bend double without breaking, but a fresh leaf will break. In dry weather if there is any sun when the leaf is brought in, it is usually sufficiently withered already from the action of the sun through the day; but should it not be sufficiently wilted it is placed out in the sun; if there is no sun, artificial heat is employed. When sufficiently withered to roll without breaking, a quantity of about thirty pounds is given to each man, who rolls it on a strong wooden table, covered with a fine bamboo mat, the slightly rough surface of which facilitates the rolling. As much leaf as can be conveniently held in the hands is taken from the heap by the men, and this they roll with a backward and forward motion till the leaf comes into a soft state, and while being rolled it gives out juice freely. When sufficiently rolled it is formed into tightly compressed balls. These are allowed to stand in a body until fermented. This is the most important matter in the whole process. The fermentation must be stopped at just the right time, which practice enables one to do. As a rule the inside of the ball should be of a rusty, red color. The fermentation is stopped by breaking the balls and spreading them on mats and placing the same immediately in the sun. An hour in the sun is deemed sufficient; it is then placed on trays over charcoal fires, where it is shaken up and respread, repeating the operation several times until it becomes dry and crisp. Any piece then taken between the thumb and finger should crumble with slight pressure.

The manufacture is now completed; the balls have become tea. It has now to be sifted and assorted. For this purpose sieves of different sized meshes are used, the highest quantities of teas falling through the finest sieves, and the coarsest tea through the coarsest seives. All the red, hard, unrolled leaf is now fanned and picked out of the tea and mixed with the Bohea. All the black teas except the Flowery Pekoe are made in this manner. In preparation of this kind is very simple; when the leaves from the end shoots are collected, they are exposed to the sun, spread out on the mats until the leaves are shriveled. They are then placed over small, slow charcoal fires and roasted very slowly. If this is skilfully done the Pekoe tips come out a whitish orange color—the whiter the better. This is merely a fancy variety and is not prepared for general sales.

To make green tea the leaf must be brought in twice per day; that which comes in at the middle of the day is partly prepared the same day, while that brought in at the close of the day is kept over till the next morning. The leaf is placed in hot iron pans over a small furnace, and kept at a temperature of about 160°, and stirred with sticks about seven minutes, until it becomes moist and sticky, being then too hot to hold long in the hand. It is then rolled two or three minutes on a table, until it gets a little twisted, after which it is laid out on mats in the sun for three hours, and rolled twice during the time, and in the sun. It is then again placed in the pans and kept at the same heat as before, and worked with sticks until it becomes too hot to hold; when it is stuffed as compactly as possible in canvas bags; the mouth of the bags are tied, and then beaten with a flat heavy stick to consolidate the mass, and it is left in that condition through the night. Next morning it is taken out of the bags and worked with sticks, as before, for nine hours without cessation. During this last process the green color is imparted to the tea and the process is completed. These are the kinds into which green tea is sorted; 1. Ends; 2. Young Hyson; 3. Hyson; 4. Gunpowder; 5. Dust; 6. Imperial. The indigenous or hybrid plant makes the best black tea, and the plant produced from the seed brought from China makes the best green tea.

After another drying over charcoal fires it is packed in chests or boxes lined with sheet-lead, the boxes containing eighty pounds or one hundred pounds each; and then it is ready for market, where it is usually sold in large lots at auction, bringing from twenty-five cents to forty-five cents per pound.

The stories that have been told in America about green tea being prepared by the admixture of copper in some form is undoubtedly a misrepresentation. If the slightest quantity of any of the salts of copper were to be added to tea it would impart such a metallic taste to the tea as to be easily detected. All the poison there is in tea is what is inherent in the plant, and that not in enormous quantities. Much that has been said of the pernicious quality of tea is largely exaggeration. It is a stimulant of a mild kind, and taken very strong, and in too large quantities, it undoubtedly injures sensitive nervous constitutions; but if it is taken weak, and in moderate quantities, I do not think it will shorten life more than fifteen minutes, on an average, to each person. In my opinion, coffee is much more of a powerful stimulant than tea, and capable of doing more harm than tea. It is very possible that the lives of many have been shortened to the amount of half a day or more by the use of coffee. Water is the best of all drinks, and does not shorten life whether drank cold or warm, though large quantities of cold water, when the body was very warm, and on a very hot day, has often taken life very suddenly. Water does not stimulate, but it affords all the qualities that nature requires from any fluid. Blessed are they who like cold water better than any other drink, and will not indulge in anything stronger. If the world, or the people in the world, will only agree to relinquish the use of whisky, rum, brandy, gin, and tobacco, I for one, by way of compromise, would allow them tea and coffee and a reasonable use of wine and beer. They can all be dispensed with very easily, and everybody be just as well off, for nature requires none of them; but people seem to take a great deal of comfort in the use of them, and if used in a reasonably temperate manner they will not do much harm. But it will be a long time before the world will be willing to confine themselves to the comparatively innocent drinks; they are too fond of intoxication, delirium, and frenzy. If Liberals—those who believe in living true to nature and the laws of health and temperance—would step forward, and no longer use intoxicating drinks, and thereby set a noble example to the Christian world, it would be a great thing, and I would be most glad to see it. If we have good sense, we need to keep it all and make good use of it. One of the greatest teachers the world has produced—Buddha—totally condemned the use of intoxicants, and one of his strongest commandments was "Use no intoxicating drinks." This is one of the greatest and best commandments ever given, and I wish that the Rationalists, the Naturalists, and the Liberalists of the world would decide to follow it. Moses and Jesus never gave a commandment superior to this, and nothing of this kind. When one with pain witnesses the madmen and demons men make of themselves, and the wretchedness that is produced by the use of alcoholic liquors, it is enough to make him wish that the great injunction of Buddha could be followed. He said, "Man is naturally intoxicated quite enough, and he should use no intoxicating drinks."

With regard to the preparation of tea, I will add that machines have been made for the rolling of the tea-leaves, which do the work very much faster and equally as well. Most of the tea is now rolled by machinery.

Between two and three thousand acres in the Darjeeling district are in cinchona-trees, which seem to flourish at altitudes of 9,000 feet. The culture is simple; the ground is cleared of its natural growth, holes mades where the tree is to be planted and filled with good soil, and the ground suitably plowed or dug during the six years they are allowed to remain, when the young trees are cut down and peeled.

My stay at Darjeeling was short, and I must not hold you there too long. I arrived there about 4 P.M., and left at 10 the next morning. I would have been glad of three days there to ride out to Mount Sinchul, and have a look at Mount Everest, and look around among the mountains, but that desire could not be gratified; I had to hurry back to Calcutta. The road down the mountain was nearly as interesting as the ride up. I saw the same grand sights over again, and also some points that escaped my attention in making the ascent. Although the train could come down much faster than it went up, the engineer kept it under control, and made about the same speed as in going up.

I need not again describe the grand, picturesque scenes all along that mountain railway, though they are extraordinary enough to merit a double description. One sight seen while descending I will mention, and that, the Marchioness of Ripon. While we were on a side track to let her train pass, it came along, and as the lady was sitting in a large rocking-chair in the center of an open car or carriage, I had a good opportunity of seeing her—a fine, tall, middle-aged woman, of decidedly English characteristics. She looked entirely at her ease, and seemed to be enjoying the scenes all around her, as well as the conversation of the English gentleman in tete-a-tete with her. As I understand it, the marchioness is the wife of the governor-general of India, who receives the snug salary of $200,000 per year, and has the office for a term of five years. One would think she would be able to pay her own fare to Darjeeling, but she did not, and not only an entire carriage but a whole train was furnished for her use. It may be all right, but I noticed they did nothing of the kind for your humble servant, although he does not make the two thousandth part of what is paid the Marquis of Ripon. Well, let them rip-on if they want to; perhaps I am as happy paying my way through the world as they are in being carried "free gratis for nothing."

DEPARTURE FROM CALCUTTA.

I was back in Calcutta in time to write a few letters and mail them previous to taking a gharrie for the steamer Teheran, lying three miles below the city. As it was to sail at 5 A. M., it was necessary to be on board the night before. Arriving at the steamer, we were visited by a good thunder shower, with abundant flashes and reports of an electrical character. This was the first real rain I had seen in India, and it continued two or three hours. It was pleasing and refreshing.

Sunday, Feb. 12.—Before daylight we had weighed anchor, and were steaming slowly down the river toward the Bay of Bengal, some eighty miles away. We passed through a long stretch of level, fertile, tropical country, with a free growth of cocoanut-trees and bananas on either side. Within twenty miles of the city we passed several brick-yards, where the brick for Calcutta buildings are turned out. All are molded by hand; I saw no machines and no steam engine at work among them all. The kilns are square, and not so large as we make in our country. On the left bank of the river I saw an establishment with an engine and tall chimney, which I took to be a sugar factory. We left thus early to take advantage of the tide to help us over the bars in the river, and, as it was, we had to lie by two hours at a bar for the water to rise and enable us to get over it. When we reached the Bay of Bengal we found a strong head-wind, and the sea so rough as to make the steamer toss and pitch in a manner to make several of the passengers sea-sick, I making one of the number. The stirring of the waters also stirred our stomachs, and for a few hours there were stirring times.

TEMPLE OF JUGGERNAUT.

On Monday morning the sea was still rough, but not sufficient to cause sea-sickness. I was in hopes we would pass near enough to the Cuttach shore to enable us as to see the temple of Juggernaut, at Pooree, near by, but that wish was not gratified; we kept too far away. The temple is said to possess an imposing appearance from the sea, when at proper distance, though not very remarkable for its architecture. It is composed of rough stone, and plastered over with chunam. The khek (chief tower), and other minor buildings connected with it, are comprised within a wall surrounding a platform, raised high above the ground, and six hundred and fifty feet in length. The hight of the tower is two hundred feet. According to Brahmanical records, this temple was erected many centuries before the Christian era; it was destroyed and rebuilt several times, and was lastly restored in 1198 by Rajah Bhim Deo, of Orissa, who is said to have expended $2,500,000 upon the work. Within its holy precints it is said many minor deities are provided with lodgings and attendants; but, of course, the most revered of all the deific occupants are Juggernaut, the "Lord of the World"—one of the aliases of the many-named Vishnu—Buldeo (his brother), and their sister, the saffron-colored Sabhadra.

The average number of pilgrims who annually resort to Pooree, to pay their adorations to this great deity, is said to be one hundred and twenty thousand. Many of these infatuated pilgrims never return to their homes, as thousands of them die of famine and over-fatigue on their long journey. Many of them are said to actually crawl at great distances, when no longer able to walk, to this, the Mecca of their hopes. No people could evince more sincerity or true devotion. If those two qualities prove the truth of a religious system, then the worshipers of Juggernaut must have the truth. But sincerity proves the truth of no religion.

Great numbers are also destroyed by the pernicious climate of the rainy season, and their dead bodies, which are thrown on the sands, near the the English station, are either burnt, or left to be devoured by the troops of dogs, of the pariah class, and the jackals and vultures, which are numerous enough for all emergencies; for, though as many as one hundred and fifty bodies have been seen on half an acre of ground, there were enough of these scavengers to dispose of them in a short time.

The grand ceremony of the installation of the god on his triumphal car is called Rath Jatra, and takes place in June. The influx of pilgrims to attend this ceremony is usually enormous, but it is said their numbers are decreasing year by year; for this big god, like many others of the mammoth gods of the past, is losing ground in the faith of the people. As civilization and a knowledge of nature and her laws spread over the country, the veneration for Juggernaut, and all the other equally monstrous gods, grows less and less. Men no longer throw themselves before the huge car of this monster god to be crushed into the earth, and it is to be hoped that the day will come when men will no longer prostrate themselves before any god which the imaginations of men have created. There is better work to perform—to study that which is true, which has a real existence, to fully learn the laws of our being, and to know best how to bear ourselves toward our fellow-men, so as to most increase their happiness, and our own at the same time.

This temple is inclosed by a high wall, inclosing grounds nearly eight hundred feet square. Gates are on each side of the square, which look to the cardinal points. The eastern entrance is guarded by two lions roughly carved in stone. The gateways all rise in pyramidal shape, with sculpture and portraiture above them. On looking in at the eastern gate, the one entered by the pilgrims, the only thing to be seen is a broad flight of steps, which leads to the temple. A handsome black stone pillar, the shaft of one piece, and twenty feet in length, stands immediately before the entrance. It is said to be one of the most chaste and elegant pieces of art ever seen, and equal in design and proportion to any pillar of Corinthian order.

The grand temple in which the gods are imprisoned is a very high tower in the middle of the square, and from its great elevation, like the domes and steeples of many cathedrals and churches, forms a conspicuous landmark, and may be seen at a long distance; sailors can espy it far out at sea. The form of the tower is square two-thirds of the way up, whence it decreases by a slight curve to the top, and thus follows the configuration of most of the Hindoo temples, and is also fluted at the top. On the top of this is a large circular, flat black stone, cut in shape of a melon. On the summit of this, again, is the chucker, or wheel, the distinguishing symbol of Vishnu, and precisely resembling the wheel of a ship's rudder. The whole is surmounted by flags and pennons, of the appropriate colors of the god in whose memory they are displayed.

The modes are various by which the devotees conceive they render their offerings acceptable to their god. The great ceremony, however, is that of their Rath Jatra; but a minor and preliminary ceremony is that of bathing the gods. Their godships are placed in a line on an elevated terrace within an inclosure, and protected from the night dews (lest they should catch cold probably) by an extensive canopy of many-colored cloth. They consist of three frightful wooden faces, and are, respectively, black, brown, and yellow in color. The lower portions of the figures are closely swathed in cloth wrappers. The following day the idols are consigned to their respective niches in the temple; but Juggernaut complains of not feeling very well, his exposure to the night air, to which he is not accustomed, having given him a cold. He does not get over this cold, fully, till the day of the grand ceremony, when, by the wise treatment of his physicians, he is sure to recover. The priests find it to their interest for the god not to recover too speedily, for during his prostrated illness many presents are made him by his devoted followers, and these the priests take in charge, of course.

At the festival of the Rath Jatra, the idols are conducted in state to visit their country-seat, one mile and a half from Pooree, but a journey which require three days. The manner of inducting these heavenly dignitaries from the temple to their raths, or cars, is not extremely reverential. Ropes are fastened round their necks, and they are dragged neck and heels through the mud and dirt, and are finally hauled by the same gallows sort of process to respective vehicles, where they are decorated by the priests, and welcomed by shouts of admiration and triumph from the fanatical multitude. The raths on which the monster deities are drawn are of lofty and massive dimensions and clumsy architecture; that of Juggernaut is forty-five feet in hight, has a platform thirty-five feet square, and moves upon sixteen wheels of solid timber.

The Black Pagoda is situated sixteen miles north of Pooree, near the village of Kanarac. It was built by Narsing Deo Langora, rajah of Orissa, in 1241, though many claim it was built much earlier—many centuries earlier. In the days of its pristine glory it was designated as the Temple of the Sun, and was dedicated to its worship under the title of Suriga, in consequence of that deity having cured the son of Vishnu of leprosy. Now, the way in which the young god became infected with that filthy and troublesome disease was in this wise: One day some fine ladies of the rajah's palace were taking a bath, and that young god was sensual enough to look at them with carnal pleasure, even as a human being would do under similar circumstances. He claimed that he saw them by accident, and did not look on purpose; but appearances were against him, and he was duly punished. But perhaps it was a kindly act in Suriga to cure the young god, for leprosy is a terrible disease, which more than one god is said to have tried his hand at curing.

What remains of the building is the pagoda, or square building, the sides to the cardinal points; the walls are fifty feet high, and of amazing thickness. From thence upward, the roof is an exact pyramid, on the apex of which are the remains of some symbol of the god. The pyramidal part is divided into compartments, each overhanging the other, like the roof of a Chinese temple, flat, and decreasing to the top. The part still most perfect is the inferior tower, which is called the Jug Mohun.

The sanctuary in which the god was lodged is almost destroyed; what does remain marks a freak in the operations of time, or whatever is the destroying power. The sanctuary was in the shape of a tall tower, exceeding in hight the other part of the temple. From half way down it had a slight curveture, and terminated in a point. Only one quarter of this building is still erect; the other three are thrown down in undistinguishable ruin; it seems the tower has divided in the center and then crosswise, cutting it in four parts. When the three parts fell, it was difficult to account for the fourth remaining.

Foliage is springing up in its crevices, and will soon lay its glories in the dust. A complete shrubbery has grown upon the summit of the temple, which was once graced with the Leel Chucker, or blue wheel of Vishnu. An absurd notion prevailed among the Hindoos of the temple having a loadstone at the top, which, attracting the passing ships, drew them to destruction. Some desperate foreigners, having suffered such a catastrophe, stormed the pagoda and carried away the magnet. The sanctuary being thus defiled, the shrine was deserted by the Brahmans, and many of its ornaments were removed to the temple of Juggernaut.

My traveling companions are an Englishman, a Scotchman, and an Irishman. The first is an engineer, who has been in India some fifteen years, and is now going home on a furlough of a year. The Scotchman has been the same length of time in the military service, and has held an office. He now retires on a pension of four shillings ($1.00) per day for the rest of his life. He will not be able to live in much splendor on that pension, but, as he has no family, it will feed and clothe him. The Irishman has served thirteen years in the army, and reached the office of sergeant, but rather than make up the necessary number of years for a pension, he has availed himself of the priviledge of resigning, and is going to Australia to invest the $500 he has saved, and try his fortune at baking, of which he has some knowledge.

Two men are also on board who are in the menagerie business in Australia, and are taking there with them a big tiger, some large wildcats, some cobras, monkeys, wild hogs, deers, cranes, herons, and numerous other birds and animals. These are on deck, and a free show every day.

The weather continued rather rough, and the "white caps" very numerous. The water was rough enough to induce a little vomiting. On two or three mornings, while standing on deck, I saw great numbers of flying-fish. I several times saw as many as twenty rise out of the water at the same time and place and fly off like so many swallows catching flies over a pond. They at first have much the appearance of birds. Some of them keep on the wing a distance of twenty or thirty rods, but they usually fly so near the water that the waves hit them, and down they come. The greater share of them are small in size.

MADRAS.

The brisk head-wind accompanied us all the way to Madras, where we arrived Wednesday, the 15th, at 11 A.M., three and a half days from Calcutta. We had no sooner cast anchor than we were surrounded by a perfect swarm of small boats, with naked natives in them, or very nearly naked—a race called Klings—wishing to take us ashore. They are noisy and clamorous, and show the greatest avidity in securing patronage. They have the same kind of oars I noticed at Bombay—a straight pole with a round paddle at the end eight or ten inches in diameter. Several of us (the retiring army gentleman being able to converse with the natives) chartered a boat and went ashore, as the steamer is to stop here all day, for we of course wished to see the town. It is a place of considerable size, though not equal to Bombay or Calcutta. It is the capital of the portion of India called the Madras presidency. With its suburbs it extends some eight miles along the coast, and some three miles inland, though not all compactly built. It has no harbor, and the vessels doing business at this port have to lie off in front. As a port, however, notwithstanding its exposed condition, it ranks third in India, both as regards the number and tonnage of vessels and the value of its imports and exports. The anchorage is good, and deep water is found near the beach. The sea-board is dry and sterile, with a sandy shore exposed to the fury of the waves. While the sea continued an open roadstead, the possibility of landing or receiving cargo was often attended with great difficulty, especially in the stormy season; but new harbor works are being constructed which will greatly obviate this. The boats used for taking cargoes to and from ships and steamers are different from any I have noticed before. They are called massoola-boats, and are employed to cross the heavy surf of the coast. They are large and light, constructed of thin planks sewed together with hide-thongs, and packed or caulked with coir or cocoanut fiber. The fishermen also use an extraordinary craft called a catamaran, which is formed of two or three small logs, six or eight inches in diameter, and eight or ten feet long, made smaller at the ends, and fastened together by thongs, a carved piece of wood between them constituting the stem-piece. A primitive sail is set up in the middle log. They will carry two or three men, and, with a brisk wind, sail at a good lively speed. It is curious to see this craft thus down to the very surface of the water, with three naked men aboard, five and ten miles from shore. To sink them would be impossible, while men with nothing but a piece of muslin six inches wide and eighteen inches long for clothing, in a land of perpetual summer, care nothing about getting wet. This kind of craft will face any weather, and are very useful for carrying letters between ships when no other means of conveyance is possible. An elegant lighthouse 125 feet high stands near the fort. Its light is a flashing catadioptric, and can be seen from a vessel fifteen miles at sea.

The population of Madras, given ten years ago, is 400,000, classified as follows: Hindoos, and those claiming that caste, 330,000; Mohammedans, being Arabs and other nationalities, 53,500; Eurasians (mixed with European blood), 12,000; Europeans, 4,000. The latter live chiefly, as in other parts of India, in detatched houses in the suburbs, surrounded by "compounds" of several acres, tastefully decorated with shrubbery and flowers. The city is not a healthy one, the death rate being thirty-three in a thousand. The cholera was reported rather bad while we were there. The streets and roads have a very red appearance, a top coating of hard earth, containing iron ore or pounded brick, having been put upon them. Many of the streets are wide and neatly kept.

I visited the botanical and zoological gardens. In the latter are some fine animals. I also looked at some of the Hindoo temples, and saw two cars of Juggernaut—large, crude things, much as already described. One of them is much larger than the other, and is used but once a year, in June, when the ceremony of the god taking a ride comes round. A good deal of idol-worshiping is done here. The missionaries are making great exertions to establish their religion, but it is hard work to make converts, and they get badly discouraged. I visited the bazars and principal business places. They are not so fine as those of Calcutta.

The chief buildings are a cathedral, a Scotch church, a hall, the senate house, Chepak palace (revenue offices), a college, the Central Railway station, etc. A strong fort is here, named after St. George, who was a fighting saint. Within it are the secretary's offices, and two or three statues of noted English men who served in India. Here is also an observatory from which all India takes its time. The town is blessed, or cursed, with three bishops, one Church of England and two Catholics. They ought to be able to attend to God's business for the moderate number of Christians here, though it takes a great number of men to attend to his business in the various parts of the world, and it keeps the people hard at work to pay their salaries. God does not pay them, and if the people do not "shell out" they get nothing, and as soon as the pay stops they quit working. As much as they think of their God, and as valuable as they think human souls, the former would go unserved and the latter would go unsaved if their money is not forthcoming.

In the fort are two guns, captured from the once famous Tippoo Sahib. There is here a monument to Bishop Heber, who traveled much over India and wrote most intelligently about it.

I called, of course, upon Mr. P. Murugesa Mudaliar, editor of the Philosophical Inquirer, a small Free-thought journal, published half in English and half in the native language, and conducted with ability. Upon my arrival in India he had spoken very complimentary of me, and expressed the hope that when I visited Madras I would stop long enough for the Secular Society and the Theosophical Society there to give me a fitting testimonial of their regard. He repeated this hope upon my arrival, but as the steamer was to stop there but a few hours, and another of the same line would not be along for two weeks, it was impossible for me to stop. He seemed to regret this very much, and said the "brethren" would feel very much disappointed to learn that I had come and gone without their having an opportunity of seeing me, as many had calculated upon having a visit with me. I tried to convince him that the loss was not much, and that he must give my best regards to them, and assure them I would be very glad to see them and make their acquaintance were it possible to do so. He accompanied me to the beach, where I took boat for the steamer, and looked quite downhearted about it, and said he did not know what to tell the "brethren." Had I then known that the steamer would not leave till the next day at 1 P.M., I could have spent the evening with the "brethren," without any difficulty; but not being able to read the future I did not think the steamer would be so long taking on freight, and I did not wish to be ashore when the vessel weighed anchor and left. It would leave one separated from his baggage, etc., in an unpleasant predicament.

The freight taken aboard in such large quantities was indigo and cinchona bark, the first in boxes and the other in large bales. Indigo has long been a staple crop of India, and cinchona is fast becoming so. Three steam hoisting apparatuses were kept at work for more than ten hours at hoisting these two commodities on board. The hold was completely filled, and a large pile was made over the entrance to the hold, on deck. This steamer goes home to London, and that is the market where indigo and bark are handled in immense quantities. This cargo must be worth $100,000.

The excellent blue dye extracted from the indigo plant makes it a plant of great value, and as it is successfully grown in the southern part of India, it is largely cultivated. The cultivation and mode of preparation are simple. The soil must be one that is favorable to the growth and must be fertile. The ground being well prepared, the seed is sown at the commencement of the rainy season. In three or four days the plants appear, and, so rapid is this climate, in two months it is cut.

The factory consists of a series of vats of brick-work and chunam; into one of these the plant is thrown, and a sufficient quantity of water is let in to cover it. In a few hours fermentation commences; after a short time the liquor is drawn off into another vat, where it is constantly agitated with wooden stirrers. This is done to separate the true dye from the salt of the plant; the former is thus precipitated to the bottom of the vat, and the water being allowed to run off, the indigo remains at the bottom, after which it is taken out and drained in cloth bags, and then dried gradually in the shade in shallow wooden boxes or trays. While yet damp it is cut into small cakes an inch square, end when sufficiently dried it is packed in cases for shipment.

The life of the indigo planter is by no means free from anxiety. The crop is liable to a variety of misfortunes before it is secured. It may be washed away, in the first place, by too heavy rains, or from inundations of the rivers near which it is usually grown. It is also apt to suddenly dry and wither away, or it may be destroyed by a peculiar caterpillar, which its deadly enemy. Then again in preparing, if the fermentation is not stopped at the precise moment, or if the dye is not properly separated from the salt of the plant, the whole may be totally lost. Again, the fluctuation of market prices is a great source of anxiety to the planter. Many have made large fortunes in the indigo culture, while many others have been totally ruined.

While waiting for the steamer to load we were visited by various native dealers with numberless kinds of wares to sell. I purchased a pretty large assortment of curious sea-shells which abound here, as well as some specimens of native work made of seeds, etc. And among my other purchases I made one which may surprise you, for it surprises me now while I think of it. The purchase was four young parrots. Now I never was specially fond of parrots, but a native had some twenty of them in a cage, and they looked so lively and cunning that they attracted my attention, and I thought I would like one in THE TRUTH SEEKER office to help do the talking which which has to be done there; and as they are said to be very liable to die, I thought if I started with four I ought to be able to get one home. I offered the native a rupee for a bamboo cage and four of the young parrots. I think it must have been a generous price in his estimation, for he accepted at once, and before I had time to think twice about the trouble they would be to me in the fifteen thousand miles I have yet to travel, I found myself owner of the birds. I am far from sure that they are the talking kind, but if they are not it will be from no lack of lung power. I am certain, at all events, that they are of the squawking kind, for that has already been fully proved to me. They are about twenty days old and as hearty as you please. I take them into the stateroom with me; bread and boiled rice is the proper food for them, and these I can easily get. They chipper and squeak away pretty lively through the day, and they serve as company for me while I am reading and writing. If I succeed in getting them home I shall be pretty sure to have an affection for them for the trouble they will have cost me. The mother always likes the boy best which causes her the most care and anxiety.

There were other natives on board who had monkeys to sell, and some of the passengers made purchases of them; but as I have no hand organ, and do not care to buy one, I concluded not to invest in monkeys. My parrots, I think, will be all the live stock I shall require till I again tread the soil of America.

JUGGLERS.

Among our other visitors were two jugglers, who performed some very clever tricks. I had often heard of the Madras jugglers, and of the astonishing feats they perform, among others causing apparently a plant from the seed to grow up into a tree and blossom, and bear fruit, all in the space of a few minutes, and when they had no apparatus about them save a piece of cloth and the breech clout which they wear about them. These men did not perform that trick nor anything else equal to it, but they did very skilfully what they did do. One was the usual ball and cup trick; they had two balls and three cups, and the way they made the balls appear under the cups where they apparently did not put them, and made them vanish where they seemingly did put them, was rather curious, though the trick is an old one. They then performed a trick of catching small pebbles about the size of robins' eggs from the atmosphere and placing them one by one in the mouth, holding them there in sight as they were added, one by one. Then they apparently swallowed the stones and then brought them up one by one from the stomach, and took them from the mouth and several much larger in size than they had swallowed. The lump which the rising stone made in the throat could be seen, and then to see it appear in the center of the mouth and then in front when they were taken out, and this repeated several times, looked real and puzzling. After some tricks with cords, snakes, and eggs in a bag, which I will hardly undertake to describe, they brought forth a couple of small figures, one of which they called a policeman and the other a criminal. The manipulations they put these two fellows through, making them obey orders, dance, etc., by the voice only, looked very curious. They were independent figures, without wires or strings; still, when they were told to fight or kiss, or dance, they would obey orders at once, but what moved them I could not see. They also borrowed a rupee from one of the lookers on (a silver coin the size of a half dollar), and laid it on the deck of the steamer, and at the word of command the coin moved along in the direction they indicated, while no one was within three feet of it. I could not see what moved the coin. I thought perhaps I had better hold on to the rupees I had in my pocket, or those jugglers might order them out.

After the performance was over one of the accomplished deceivers offered to show how six of the tricks were done for a rupee. The Scotchman and myself joined together and took the lesson; and now, as I do not intend to engage in the juggling business after I return home, I will not object to giving you a part, at least, of the information I paid for. The cup and ball trick was done as all jugglers do it, by skilfully catching the ball between the ball of the thumb and the palm of the hand, taking pains every time when they lift the cups or move the balls to show the palms of their hands save the very time when they catch up the ball in the way described, and one does not notice it, it is so adroitly done, so that one is almost surprised when the cup is lifted under which he surely saw the ball placed, to find it gone, and under another where it was not. Of course there is much manipulation of the hands to show how honestly they are performing the trick, and at the same time they are doing it all on purpose to cheat you.

In the trick of the stones in the mouth, before commencing the trick the performer, unnoticed, places five or six smooth pebbles in his mouth and under the tongue, which do not prevent his constant talking; and when he pretends to catch a stone in the air and place it in the front of his mouth he simply brings one of the pebbles in his mouth to the front, looking just as though he had placed it there with his hand; he keeps on catching stones in the air and placing them in the front of his mouth so long as the stones under his tongue hold out, and then he catches no more in the air. Then when he pretends to swallow them they go adroitly back under his tongue, and when he opens his capacious mouth for you to look in, it appears as empty as a corn-crib in the spring of the year. I can hardly tell how he makes his throat look as though one of the stones was coming up from the stomach, but it is done by working the muscles of his throat, and he shows much dexterity in making the stones appear in the back part of his mouth. He continues to raise the stones up from his stomach (apparently) so long as those he had under his tongue hold out, and when he puts up his hand to take out the last one he skilfully places a much larger one in at the same time to bring up from his stomach in the same way as the others, and you are not a little surprised to see him take such a large, smooth, flat stone from his mouth, which you had not seen before. He continues to carry another stone to his mouth every time he takes one from it so long as he wishes to keep up the deception. The art in the thing is to make the manipulations so adroitly that the trick is not discovered. Now that I know how it is done, I am sure I would do it so awkwardly that any person could see through it in a moment.

His trick with an egg in a bag, which he jams and thrashes about, and turns inside out, showing that nothing is inside, after which he takes out the egg all sound, is done by a pocket inside the bag in which the egg is placed, and when the bag is turned inside out it does not show, and when he thrashes the bag and stamps on it he is very careful to have the corner where the egg is in his hand. It is curious how blind a simple little thing of that kind will look when a dextrous man is the manipulator.

The trick of a snake skin being turned into a live snake is done by having two bags, one in which the skin is placed, and one containing a real snake, and then adroitly changing them. I did not think this trick was as well done as the others.

Another trick was to take some tender cotton thread, which he picked apart, breaking it into a hundred pieces, right before your eyes, then rolling it up in a wad, and next getting hold of an end and hauling off twenty-five feet of whole sound thread without a break in it. This was done by keeping concealed in the hand a small ball of thread not broken, an end of which was easy to get hold of, and which was brought to the front when the time comes to heal the thread up, to join it all together, and pull it out so that you can see that the hundred short bits are all joined together again.

The trick of the strings, pretending to pull them, after cut off, and heal them together again, I can hardly explain intelligently, and will not attempt it, for it does not amount to very much.

Another trick, of a smooth pebble in the hand being converted into a bird, and nodding its head "good morning," and chirping, was done by holding an artificial bird's head between the butt of the thumb and the opposite part of the hand, and at the right moment bringing it up between the thumb and forefinger; the chirping is, of course, done by the juggler, with some show of ventriloquism, and the movement of the false head was done by the hand, and was not so blindly done but what one could see that the juggler made it bow with the muscles of his hand.

The tricks of the figures moving, talking, fighting, dancing, kissing, etc., and the rupee moving along on the deck at word of command, he did not explain, and wanted another rupee to show it. I did not see that I could make the knowledge worth a rupee to me, and declined to invest; so, perhaps, you and I will have to go down to our graves without knowing how it was done, though they were the best tricks performed.

GOOD-BYE TO INDIA.

When the indigo and cinchona were taken on board, the jugglers and pedlers were sent away. Anchor was duly weighed, and in an hour or two we were far out a sea again, and the hills south of Madras grew fainter and fainter, and soon were lost sight of altogether. This was the last of India—the last I will probably ever see of it—but I shall long remember my visit to its broad boundaries, and will not soon forget much that I have seen in its wide domain. A great deal might be said with respect to its past, its present, and its future, which I have not said, and perhaps what I have not said had better remain unspoken. I fear I have already detained you too long. I will, however, add a few words more, by way of good-bye.

The government of India by England is one of the anomalies of the world; how so small a country as England, and so far away, and with but from thirty to sixty thousand of her sons in the country, all told, can keep under complete subjection 250,000,000 of intelligent people, is indeed a mystery. There are two or three reasons for this. One is the people of India are not a homogeneous, united people, to begin with. They are really some thirty different nations, speaking different languages, and are jealous and suspicious of each other; and even if they were to be free from the control of England to-morrow, they could not unite themselves under a united home government. England obtained control over the country, to a great extent, by taking advantage of this spirit of jealousy which exists among the people, and securing the adhesion of one tribe by making war upon another, the enemy of the first. Had the people been united and true to each other, England could never have subdued them in the way she has; and were it possible for them to be united next month or next year, and to act under the control of one able leading spirit, the English could not retain their foothold in the country for sixty days. But this, under the circumstances, cannot be. It is hardy possible for this people to be a united, free people, though there are many of the best minds of the people who indulge in the remote hope that such a state of things may take place at some time in the future; and the ultimate liberation of India is the fond dream they cherish in their hearts.

Another striking peculiarity between the English people and the Hindoos is the great dissimilarity in their characters. The English are bulldogs and the Hindoos are sheep; and you know a resolute bulldog can worry and drive five hundred sheep. And as there is in nature no means by which a sheep can have the characteristics of a bulldog, so the Hindoos can never have the courage, resolution, and fixed purpose which the English possess. A few of the latter will always be able to keep under subjection large numbers of the former.

The English are far from being angels, for they have faults which angels are supposed not to possess. They are overbearing, domineering, and oppressive; they rule with a heavy, iron hand, but they are good administrators; they possess decided executive ability, and there is no doubt but that they give to India a better government than she would be able to organize herself, had she the liberty to do so. It is my opinion that India is better off to-day than she would be under an emperor, rajahs, and maharajahs of her own. She has lost the right of having native rulers of her own blood and color, but she has gained railroads, telegraphs, hospitals, schools, European machinery, and a permanent, creditable government.

England has borne a most commendable part in what she has done for the education of the people of India, as well as for her own ignorant soldiery, who go there to serve a term of years. With all the faults of style, with all her fondness for command, and with all the overbearing and almost insolence of manner, the English have proved themselves the friends of education, and the promoters of general intelligence. There is no nation which has surpassed England in this direction, and what America has of greatness, what she has of love for education, she received much of from the mother country—England.

It cannot be denied that the native characteristic of "John Bull" is to be surly, dictatorial, overbearing, self-importance, excessive conceit, fondness for authority, with a love of making other people subservient to his own will. This character "sticks out" so plainly with many whom I have met in India, and elsewhere, as to be almost painful, and extremely unpleasant. When John Bull is greatly puffed up with his own vast importance, and his immense superiority over all other men, he is not the most polite man in the world, and is capable of making himself extremely disagreeable. And this characteristic prevents people from loving him. He does not seem to take any means to make people love him. The manner of the highest in authority in India, down to the man who has charge of a railway station, is curt, short, and crabbed toward the natives, and almost all about him. It is not strange that the Hindoos do not love the English, nor that they feel the heavy rod that is constantly held over them. Nor will it be strange if there are other mutinies in India, for this heavy rule, this insolence of manner, cannot always be quietly submitted to. But so long as England is able to hold the control she has in India to-day, it cannot become free, or have a government of its own.

I wish to qualify, somewhat, the character I have given to Englishmen. I have met hundreds of them, who are as genial, friendly, and agreeable as any men in the world. Many of my best friends, friends whom I esteem almost as the "apple of my eye," are Englishmen. No, no! all Englishmen are not conceited, all are not cold and forbidding, all are not haughty and insolent; but very many of them do show that they think themselves superior to all other men in the world, and that they have the natural right to govern others; and by evincing this trait too plainly, they have failed, to some extent, to gain the love of the world. The other nations of Europe, the Hindoos, and many of the people of the English colonies, do not bear the love for Englishmen that so intelligent, so administrative, and so grand a people ought to be entitled to.

It is a question as to how much England is benefited by having India as a dependency. It is doubtful whether her net gains from this country are excessively large. I think I said in a former letter that John Bright said in Parliament that India cost more than she is worth to the people of England. This may be so. But the greatest benefit that India is to Great Britain is that it affords good fat situations for thousands of her sons who could find little to do at home. It is a good field to which to send the second and third sons of the better English families who can inherit none of the homestead, nor any of the paternal acres. Here they are paid good salaries, and find a plenty of the poor natives to "lord it over." The first positions in the goverment here are perfect "godsends" for recuperating the fortunes of some of the bankrupt of England's nobility, who have expended all their money at home, and who are willing to "go abroad" to obtain more. The governor-general of India is paid a salary some four times as great as the President of the United States receives, with hardly a tenth part of the duties to perform; and it is much the same way with officers holding lower positions—they are all well paid. In fact, Englishmen are in favor of good salaries for their services. Even the colonels and captains of the regiments here get far better pay than they do at home, and after serving a stipulated number of years they can retire on a pension that supports them comfortably the remainder of their days. This is probably all right, and perhaps it is proper for the people of India to pay all the bills. They assuredly have it to do, and when any of her sons perform the same services rendered by an Englishman, they do not receive one-fourth the pay for it. Perhaps it is sufficient for the people of India to work hard all their lives to pay the English lords and lordlings for being willing to govern them.

It has seemed to me if the English would not hold themselves so far above the people of this country, would mingle more on terms of equality with the people here—raise the people up to their level, instead of treating them like slaves infinitely below them—it would be far more human and far better. The distance between the class which rules here and the class which is ruled over is very great indeed. The white soldiers and the black soldiers are never mixed together in the same regiments. The black soldiers are told thousands of times, and in thousands of ways, that they are immensely below their rulers; and though in case of war the Hindoo blood should be shed in defense of Britain's honor and glory, it must not be done on terms of equality; it must not even be in the same regiment with the white soldier. It has seemed to me if the white and Hindoo soldiers could be more together—be placed more on terms of equality—that there would be far less tendency to mutiny. If one-third or one-fourth of each regiment were composed of Europeans there would be very little probability of a mutiny occurring, as there would at every moment be that checking element directly among them. In 1857 all the revolting regiments were composed wholly of native troops, save the superior officers, who are willing to command colored soldiers for the pay the service affords them. It would, of course, not be pleasant to the high-toned Englighman to serve in the same regiment with the natives; but could that predjudice be overcome, benefits would accrue in more ways than one.

It is said by the English that the Hindoos are deceitful, time-serving, and dishonest. It is not improbable that there is much truth in this. The natives of India have doubtless about their share of human failings and weaknesses. They are not so muscular, not so self-reliant, not so independent by nature, as the sons of Britain are, and it is only following out a natural law for those who are by nature weak and timid to exercise cunning and duplicity. Stratagem and deception are the natural defense of those who lack strength and bravery. As it is impossible for a cat to become a good watch-dog, to stand as a brave sentinel to guard the entrance of a castle, so it is impossible for a consciously weak people to have the self-reliant qualities belonging to the strong and brave. They have to do the best they can with such qualities as they have. So if the Hindoos use more duplicity and deception than the Europeans it is not very strange. But I have not found the Hindoos especially false, deceitful, or vicious. Some of them, of course, will lie and cheat if they can; but if they are any worse in this respect than Europeans and Americans, I have failed to perceive it. They will show not a little finesse in obtaining good prices for their services and for their wares, but I cannot see that they are any worse in this particular than many white races I know. I have found the people of this country submissive, patient, and faithful, and I cannot see but they have as many of what are called "the virtues" as many people I know of. They have not as much independence and self-reliance as some men, and I cannot think they are to blame for it; there are natural causes which produce it; but according to their ability they are willing to perform as much as any other race. I have fancied I perceive "a fitness" between the English and the Hindoos nearly as great as between the stone which was hurled by a strong arm and the poor head which it struck (the English are the stone, and the Hindoos are the head); the English are very willing and fit to rule, and the Hindoos are willing and fit to be ruled over. Perhaps it is all well enough as it is.

The people of India have many disadvantages to labor under. Their conquerors and rulers have a different religion, a different civilization, a different estimate of manhood. It is to some extent the effort of the ruling class to convince the ruled that they, the latter, are wrong in their religion, wrong in their customs, and wrong in their mode of living. The missionaries are working in the same direction, constantly urging upon this ancient people that they must change their religion. It is not strange that now and then one should do it. The natives are wholly the dependent class. The government has all the money and patronage. The positions and clerkships are all at the disposal of the predominant, ruling class. The better classes of the Hindoos are very anxious to obtain these positions—they are the best and about the only desirable positions open to them—to get into government employ. To be a clerk in some department is the highest they can hope for, and this teaches them subservience to powers that be. And when they believe that by accepting the religion of the ruling class their chances for making a living and filling a respectable position are better, it is not strange that some should be governed by such motives. I have heard of instances where men have worked in the employ of the government, and professed to believe in Christianity, who, at the close of day, and when night had thrown her mantle over the earth, would betake themselves to their temples and worship the gods of their childhood and the gods which their fathers and grandfathers worshiped before them.

In justice to the government I must say that I do not believe that they aim to do missionary work, or to induce the Hindoos to abandon their own religion; but the Europeans here are nearly all adherents to and advocates of Christianity, and it is not strange that their natural preferences and predjudices should often appear; and the efforts of the missionaries are constantly to induce the natives to abandon their own religion and accept in place that of the missionaries; and often and often the idea and the promise has been held out that places, positions, and good pay would be far more within their reach if they would consent to acknowledge Jesus. Many times places and salaries have been promised them upon these precise conditions. Some birds may be silly enough to be caught with chaff, and some Hindoos may be weak enough to be caught with Christianity, but their numbers are small. Very few of them are changing their religion. And those who are induced to profess a change are not thereby improved in habits and morals. It is a lamentable truth that while Europeans have brought enterprise and a stable government to this country, they have also brought many vices. They have taught the simple natives to drink intoxicating drinks, and they have taught many of the natives to yield to libidinous indulgences. Intemperance, prostitution, and dishonesty have been increased by the advent of the English people here, despite all the doctrines of Jesus that have been preached. And even in the estimation of Christians themselves those natives are most respected who remain faithful to their own religion. I have heard of Christian people looking for servants inquiring as to the religion of the candidates for service, saying: "If you are Christians, I do not want you; I prefer for servants those who do not profess to be Christians." This tells plainly how much the missionary effort is doing for India. It is well to introduce into the East the enterprise, the improvements, and the civilization of the West, but it will also be well if the vices and the religion of the West can be left at home.

I will mention one fact with which I have become acquainted since my visit to India, and that is that the children of Europeans born in this country, whether full European blood or half-bloods, do not prove to be of much utility. Some of them fill subordinate clerkships, but as a rule they are indolent, thriftless, and worthless. Those having business to be done, and requiring efficient men to do it, much prefer sending to England for men to giving employment to those who were born in the country. In this way I have noticed that the children of European parents who were born and raised here labor under decided disadvantages, and are almost a tabooed class. A few of this class have distinguished themselves in mechanics and in literature, but it has by no means been the rule. As a general thing, they are "no good."

The rule of caste in India in confessedly an evil productive of great wrongs to the lower classes, and every good person would gladly see it abrogated, and every child of the soil placed upon an equality. But is there no caste in other countries? Has England no caste? Are not a few there born lords and gentlemen of high caste, while other castes of traders, manufacturers, mechanics, sailors, soldiers, farmers, and the toilers of numerous kinds, fill all the subservient castes below them? Is there a country in the world where caste rules more severely and more cruelly than in England, and where the incident of birth—where, when, and how—makes such great difference in subsequent destiny? Has happy America no caste? Is not the caste of wealth, more cruel, perhaps, than all other kinds of caste, rapidly growing up there to be a heartless, a soulless tyrant? Yes, even America has caste as really and as cruelly as India.

Now the broad lands of India have receded from sight, and now her virtues and her vices must be forgotten for the present; for there are still other lands to explore, other Asiatic countries to visit and describe. In what I have said of India, though I have not pretended to be exhaustive, nor to cover the whole field, I have endeavored to be fair, so far as I have gone. Good-bye, India. You are a great country in many directions—great in the number and expanse of your broad acres, great in your vast mountains and plains, great in your rivers and streams, great in the crops produced upon your bosom, great in the character of your people, both in the past and present; great in your philosophies, in metaphysics, in language, in literature, and in founding great systems of religion that have lived for many thousands of years. You have established a good record in the history of the human race. You have had many virtues, you have also had some vices, and you surely have had misfortunes. You are not as happy as I would be glad to see you; and I fear the day is not close at hand in which your children will be as independent, as prosperous, and as happy as they and I desire. Bright but unhappy India, good-bye!

Twelve Days in Ceylon.

ON THE WAY TO PENANG, March 3, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS ON THE OPPOSITE SIDE OF THE GLOBE: It required a little more than two days between Madras and Galle. We arrived at the latter point, the southern port of Ceylon, on Saturday afternoon, February 18th. We passed down the eastern side of Ceylon, the channel on the western side being shallow, and for hours saw the mountains and highlands of the island. The town of Galle is situated on a point of land running into the sea, with another arm reaching around it farther out into the sea, has a good harbor, and is a point of a good deal of outgoing and incoming shipping, and is pleasantly located on the southern part of a fertile plain, with a most profuse growth of cocoanut-trees, banana-trees, breadfruit-trees, etc. Take it all in all, this is the most lovely country I have yet seen. It is greatly diversified with mountains and valleys, with hills and plains; it has a most luxuriant growth of tropical plants; it abounds in fruits and flowers; it has a warm and equable climate, but not excessively hot, for, being surrounded on all sides by the sea, the air is considerably modified, so that the mercury rarely or never rises above 94°. The air is never hot and dry, but if warm, it is also moist, and rains are frequent. In this respect it differs widely from India, where it rains four months and then goes without rain eight months. My visit to Ceylon has been very pleasant, and I set it down as coming nearer being the "garden of paradise" than any country I have ever seen.

Not the least pleasant feature I met with in Ceylon was the kind reception which the intelligent and genial people gave me. I may say they took me to their very hearts. Before my feet had touched the soil of the island, and while yet standing upon the jetty, or slight wooden dock, on which I stepped from the boat which took me to shore, I was met by kind friends who were expecting my arrival and were prepared to extend hospitalities to me. They waited on me to the Custom House, where my baggage passed a slight examination, and then accompanied me to the hotel. Mr. Edmund Gooneratne, one of the wealthiest and most respected natives of the place, and who holds a responsible office in the revenue department of the government, called upon me at my hotel and cordially invited me to his house, saying he had a room prepared for me, and that I would be very welcome there so long as I wished to remain. But I said to him that my mail matter had been sent to Colombo, and I was anxious to hear from home; and as I could take stage that night for that city I had decided to go on at once, and to make my visit to Galle on my return. He reluctantly acceded to my wishes, but exacted a promise from me that I would stop at his house upon my return. And the same kindness I have found at every place I have visited. I have found friends waiting for me at stations; carriages have been in attendance upon me to carry me where I wished to go; my hotel bills have been paid; my railway fares have been dispensed, and even my washing bills have been settled before I had the chance to do so. My utmost wishes have been anticipated, and all have seemed desirous to do all they could for my comfort. This kindness almost took me by surprise, for though THE TRUTH SEEKER is taken at Colombo I did not dream I was so popular on this opposite side of the globe, or that friends were so closely looking for my coming. I think I have Col. H. S. Olcott to thank for much of this. I am quite well persuaded that he corresponded with friends in Ceylon and advised them about the time I would arrive there, and expressed the wish that they would receive me kindly.

I took stage for Colombo, seventy-two miles north of Galle, on the west coast of the island, at nine o'clock in the morning. The road is as level as a "barn floor" all the way, and as smooth as any road I ever rode over. All the roads on the island are of a similar character. They have had a heavy surface-coat given them, of stone or something of the kind, which has been broken up finely and ground to a smooth surface, which is not easily converted into mud. The road leads for much of the distance through the most luxuriant cocoanut groves, well interspersed with the plantain or bananas. I found far more of the cocoanut-trees here than any place I had before visited. Perhaps I should describe this tree, as some of you may not know all about it. You do, however, know that it belongs to the family of palms, of which there are some one hundred and fifty members, but none of which are more useful than the cocoanut-tree. This grows one hundred feet tall, without a limb or branch. Its foliage is wholly at the top, and consists of huge leaves, about fifteen feet long, or rather a leaf of leaves, for on its main stalk are about two hundred leaves, an inch or an inch and a-half wide, and three long in the middle of the large leaf, and six inches shorter, or more, at the ends, like the parts of a feather on each side of the main stem. The lower of these large leaves lop toward the earth, the center ones stand out horizontally, while toward the top they stand obliquely or upright, making at the top of the tall trees an open mass of verdure fully twenty-five feet across each way, and around the base of these leaves grow the cocoanuts, the trees having an average of about fifty nuts to each tree; sometimes they have nearly a hundred, but that is not usual, and they often go below fifty. It requires thirty or forty years for a tree to reach a hight of seventy-five or a hundred feet, and the tree grows in hight from year to year far more than the trunk increases in size. They are seldom seen more than ten or twelve inches in diameter, and the trunk becomes of that size when six years old, while each subsequent year's growth is added on to the top. They will live to be one hundred years old, and are always profitable. There is perhaps no tree that grows so wholly useful, or which can be put to a greater variety of purposes. When the fruit is about half matured it contains over a pint of sweet water, which is very pleasant and nutritious as a drink. I took my first drink of it that night on my way to Colombo, and found it very refreshing. The ripe fruit you know about; cocoanuts are used for many purposes, entering into many dishes made by the cooks, and into many forms of confections, and many are eaten as food in the native state; chocolate, cocoa, and broma are prepared from them; the nuts are gathered by the natives, cut open, and when somewhat shrunken from drying, they are taken out and ground or grated, and the oil of the meat pressed out, or it may be obtained by boiling the meat in water and skimming off the oil. After the meats are thus pressed they make excellent food for cattle and sheep. The oil is put to a great variety of uses; it enters into cooking, somewhat as we use lard; it is burnt in lamps for illumination; it makes good hair-oil; it makes good soap, and hundreds of tuns of it are shipped annually to Europe and America, where it is put to a great variety of uses. The shells are made into buttons, used for cups, dippers, and other vessels; the fiber which grows on the outside of the shells, after being rotted a month or so under water, are taken off and picked apart, when they are spun and twisted into small cords for making rope, for carpets, mats, etc. I have seen hundreds of the native women picking the fiber apart, and spinning and twisting it for various purposes. It makes a very strong rope, and a very serviceable carpet or mat. The leaves are used for roofs of buildings, and for braiding up into hundreds of forms of baskets, sacks, and various articles for domestic use. The leaves are also plaited into carpets for floors, and for screens and partitions. The stalk parts of the leaves are large and substantial, and are used for fences, and for fuel to cook by. The cocoanut-tree is one of the few trees which has within itself the elements for making soap. The ashes of the burnt leaf-stalks contain considerable potash, which is obtained by leaching them, and this combined with the oil of the fruit makes good soap. The trunks of the trees makes good beams for houses, and are used for bridges, etc. The blossom of the tree, when duly cut, yields pretty freely of a sweet juice called toddy, which quickly passes, by fermentation, into beer, and is so drank; or it can be distilled into a form of alcohol called arrack, having a peculiar flavor, and possessing the power to bring intoxication readily. These two last uses are the worst of all the purposes to which the cocoanut-tree is applied. It is better to place a lump of lime in the receptacle for the juice, which prevents fermentation, when it is easily boiled down to a syrup, and granulates into a pleasant form of sugar. If the natives only have plenty of cocoanut-trees and a good supply of bananas they cannot die of starvation, for those will surely sustain life; both trees afford much nourishment. Perhaps there is no tree more deserving the title of the "tree of life" than the cocoanut tree; but even that does not afford eternal life, for people die, though for years they have eaten of its fruit. But even though this may be called the tree of life, it is to be feared the "tree of knowledge" cannot be found. Ceylon has a great number of trees which bear fruit, and many kinds remarkable for their richness, but I found none there which imparted knowledge. It is claimed by some that the original Garden of Eden was planted on this island, and there are probably as many reasons for believing that it was planted there as anywhere, but I am sorry to think, if the tree of knowledge luxuriated on those shores, that it has run out, and no longer exists.

We changed horses every five or six miles, and as they were fresh, and traveled at good speed, we got along well, riding at all times near the coast, where we could plainly hear the waves constantly dashing against the shore. When we stopped to change mail, or to change horses, I listened with rapt attention to the ceaseless thundering and pounding of the waves. They have certain qualities of music in them —rhythm, if not melody—and there is an eloquence and grandeur about this music not found elsewhere.

I had six or eight fellow-passengers, and all natives. One was an employee in the postal department, and could speak English; so I could manage to talk some as we rode along at night by the sea, where the sea-laden air was refreshing and agreeable. Still the night was a trifle wearisome. Stage riding, after a few hours, becomes monotonous, even to one who has been several days on the ocean. But when nearly 4 A.M. we reached the end of the stage route, Kaluptara, where the railway commences which carried us the remaining twenty miles to Colombo. As we had an hour and a half to wait, I took a cup of tea and a horizontal position on my India guttree, and did succeed in catching a short nap. I will inform you that I left my young parrots with one of the waiters at the hotel at Galle, charging him to take good care of the little fellows in my absence, believing that would be better than if carried with me. The man was faithful to his charge, for upon my return I found the little fellows lively and well, and they chirped and flew about as though glad to see me. A rupee satisfied the servant for his attention to the birds.

The train arrived at Colombo about 7 A.M., and I made the mistake of not getting off at the right station, where several friends were awaiting my arrival. I supposed that Colombo had a general station at the terminus of the road, and that I would certainly know it when I came to it; but instead of that it has some four stations at different points through the town, after which the road continues on to Kandy, seventy-two miles east. I arrived at the fourth and last station, when I deemed it best to make some inquiry, and found I should have got off two stations before; so I had nothing else to do but hire a conveyance and ride back to the other part of town where I should have got off. I went to the British India Hotel, and spent the day in writing and sleeping. My friends were looking for me at different stations, and two of them went down to the end of the railway to see what had become of me. They also called at several hotels, but by some means not at the one at which I was stopping; but of all this I was perfectly oblivious, and spent the day very pleasantly in my chamber, which looked out upon the restless ocean, dashing against the rocks along the shore. It being Sunday, I could not obtain my mail, at which I felt a trifle impatient. But on Monday morning I was all right. I not only received several letters from home, and a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I also found the friends I wished to find, and who had been so anxiously looking for me. THE TRUTH SEEKER is taken in Colombo, and I found I was famous there. Several of the Truth Seeker

Tracts have been translated into Singalese, and pretty largely circulated among the natives to help the missionaries, or rather help against them. My "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" had been sent there, and pleased them hugely, and they seemed very glad to take the author by the hand. The meeting was cordial, and I felt at once that I was among friends.

Mr. Andrew Perera, the president of the Theosophical Society, holding a position in the surveyor-general's office, and Mr. J. Robert De Silva, one of my patrons, and engaged in the same office, informed me that they had quarters prepared for me at the hall of the society, and I must go there. Being unskilful at making excuses I complied without a word, and found indeed that most comsortable quarters were furnished, with a cook to attend to getting up my meals, and a room to write in, etc. So I had nothing to do but enjoy myself and become acquainted with the numerous friends who called upon me, and every one of whom seemed full of friendship and sympathy. They had heard of the wrongs which had been done me, and it seemed to do them good to see me and hear me talk. These people are natives, called Singalese, and originally were of the Hindoo stock, but seem quite distinct from the Hindoos, and intelligent and enterprising. Many of them speak English well, and I find it easy to converse with them. They are Buddhists in religion, with a decided leaning toward Freethought, and are totally unbelievers in supernaturalism and miracles. I took much interest in those kindly people; noticed their physical and phrenological developments particularly, and was struck with their well formed heads, their good reflective abilities, and perceptive powers. They are not, as a rule, so dark as the Hindoos; they are not so spare and not so sad. They are a pleasant, intelligent, cheerful people, with much to be admired in their characters and dispositions. I was pleased to find the Theosophical Society flourishing here, that they have a commodious hall for their public meetings, with rooms for other business, and also a printing-press on which to print tracts and other matter to spread among the people. They print a paper also in the Singalese language which has considerable of a circulation. I will tell you that the Singalese language has many points of resemblance to the ancient Sanskrit, aud there can be no doubt that the Singalese are the regular descendants of the old Aryan race. I felt complimented when the friends informed me that a considerable portion of their paper is made up of extracts from THE TRUTH SEEKER. That paper must have a strong light which can reach to the opposite side of the globe and shine so brightly.

I need not tell you with what gladness I perused letters from home, for when one has been seven months in foreign lands it is particularly gratifying to receive letters from the loved ones at home, and who in spirit follow the wanderer in all his journeyings and meanderings. Neither need I tell you how much good it did me to read copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, printed since the present year came in. I must confess I read that paper with great pleasure, and I will own to you that I regard it one of the very best papers published, and its patrons among the best people in the world. It does me much good to see that it is so well conducted in my absence, and that its friends still remain true to it. Long may its lamp burn brightly, and continue to shine clearly into the dark places of the earth which need illumination. May it continue to grow stronger for a century to come, and do a great work in dispelling the dark clouds of religious superstition and error which for ages have been hovering over and darkening the earth. I feel proud of that paper, and proud of every person that takes it and pays for it. Long may they live, also.

Through this valuable medium, I heard a prayer offered to me, from Winchester, Ill., and which appeared in the paper for January 14th of the present year. It is, as many of you may remember, of this tenor:

"Our Father, who art in Asia; thou who hast ever shown by word and deed that thou lovest thy followers with a love equaled by no other gods; thou who givest thy time, yea, and who freely offerest thy life, for the happiness of thy children; thou who suffered revilings, persecutions, and imprisonment that those who would be saved might be saved from the black and eternal night of superstition, ignorance, and woe; thou who art even now traveling in a foreign land where pestilence and famine, deceit and treachery abound; thou hast gone even there that we, thy adorers, might learn the ways and conditions of the children of men, the false teachings and works of other gods, not so noble, grand, and loving as thou. Hear thou my prayer, and grant this my petition. Thou didst, through thy spirit of love, send me thy Bible (THE TRUTH SEEKER), which took the scales from my eyes, and the blind did see. Thou didst thus enable me to change my course in life, and as I did follow thy words of wisdom, and wherein thou teachest us to love another, and did thereby obtain a wife, also one of thy children; and as she did aid me to increase and did bear me a son, and he, O Bennett! was born on the twenty-fifth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, thereby through the power of thy word, he is thy son, and also a god with thee. Now, O Bennett! hear thou this prayer, and grant this my supplication. Breathe thy holy spirit upon him; anoint him with the oil of thy love; clothe him with thy wisdom; gird upon him the sword of thy power, and let him be a god like unto thee. Bless thou my son, thy son, James Bennett Travers, and thine be the glory, the power, and the supremacy now and forever. So be it. J. B. TRAVERS."

Winchester, Ill., Dec. 26, 1881.

Of course under the circumstances, surrounded as I was with the kindest and most pleasant influences, this prayer contributed to place me in a most gracious mood; and though I had never thought of setting myself up for a god—though perhaps in point of harmlessness and real worth I must confess I believe myself better than many of the gods I have seen and heard of, or, I may say, as any I have seen or heard of. It is not strange, then, that while in this gracious mood I vouchsafed a reply to this sincere prayer, though I am well aware it has been the custom of most of the gods I know anything about to take no notice of any prayer offered to them, and though the supplications were poured out to them in a stream of eloquent desire, they remain as silent as the grave, and take no more notice of them than they do of the whistling of the winds. Now, I do not wish to be that sort of a god, and I am resolved I will not be. So far as I am able I will respond to the prayer made to me, and will send my blessing upon those who ask for it, to the extent of my power. Here then is my answer to the above prayer:

MY BELOVED SON, J. B. TRAVERS (for in the sense that I am thy father thou art also my son): Thy earnest prayer has reached me; though offered up on the great plains of Illinois it has found me here in the tropical clime of Ceylon, which, I feel sure, is much farther than thousands and millions of prayers before offered have ever reached. And it pleaseth me, yea, it seemeth good unto me, to vouchsafe to thee a few words in reply.

Be it known to thee, and to all men who care to know, that I have not at any time proudly set myself up as a god; nor have I claimed to have more knowledge, more power, or more love than my fellows. I have even entertained a slight opinion of gods generally, for I have been unable to see what good they have done in the world, either to themselves or to those who have believed upon them; I have failed to see that they have made the world any better or any happier for their existence. Far be it from me, even had I the amplest power that can be imagined, to be like some of the gods I wot of. Far be it from me to cause human beings to suffer or be unhappy. I would not, had I all the power that blind mortals have conferred upon all the gods they have created, devise and form human beings without any choice or consent of their own, place them here in this world of temptation, endow them with the tastes, desires, and passions which would surely lead them into temptation and transgression, and make them unhappy while they live, and then consign them after death to an existence of unutterable torture and wretchedness, from which there can be no possible escape. Nay, nay, I would not be such a god as that, and I cannot think any one is under any obligation to love such a god as that or even to believe in him. Far better would it have been to leave the human race in a state of eternal rest and nihility than to create it to be wretched in this life and ten thousand times more wretched in the life to come. Verily, indeed, I would not be such a god as that. I would instead be a benevolent god, a merciful, a happiness-conferring, and a prayer-answering god.

Thou didst correctly recount some of the experiences I have passed through, and thou didst also correctly state the objects and purposes which have governed me. Thou hast perhaps spoken words of praise too strongly in my favor, but pray-ers are privileged characters, for nobody believes half they say when thus occupied.

It pleases me, my son, to hear thee acknowledge the good thou hast derived from THE TRUTH SEEKER; it rejoices me to know that it dispenses light and truth in the world; and I would that thousands more have their understandings enlightened by it in the same way thou hast done, and be made happy in the truths which fill it columns from week to week. I would say to thee and to all others who sympathize with thee, do all in thy power to add to the good influence which the paper wields by increasing the number of its patrons, the number of its readers, and the number of those who are willing to lay down all their errors, all their prejudices, all their blinding creeds and superstitions, and their lives if necessary, to promote the happiness of their fellow-men.

Thou and thy helpmeet have acted wisely; you, my children, have done well. It pleaseth me that you, my son and daughter, have a son to cheer you on your journey through life and to be a support to you when old age and feebleness come upon you. It pleaseth me that thou hast so early conferred my name upon your young offspring. It will be my pleasure, so far as in my power, to bestow the same blessings of truth upon this new candidate for earthly life and sorrow that you acknowledge I have bestowed upon you.

My son and daughter, you have taken a heavy responsibility upon yourselves, but a responsibility which should not be skirked or evaded. By your agency another human being has been brought into the world to do good or ill to himself and his fellow-beings. Do all in your power to mark out before him the course he ought to pursue. It depends much upon you how this tender bud of humanity is directed and inclined, and whether he is an honor to himself and his race or the reverse. All your wisdom and carefulness will be required to help him become a useful member of society when he comes to the age of maturity, and to be a blessing to his race and to himself in after years. Very much depends upon early education, and those who are instrumental in bringing young human beings into the world should feel the responsibility which devolves upon them to bestow upon their offspring the right kind of education.

I conjure you, my son and daughter, to teach your little child the truth in all cases, and to instruct him to always be true. Do not suffer his young mind as he grows into childhood and youth to be filled with the foolish theories, the absurd notions, and the wild vagaries which for thousands of years have led the world astray and driven it into darkness, error, and unhappiness. But always place the truths of nature before him; teach him the laws of his being, and what course must be pursued to preserve health, happiness, and honor. Look well after his physical health. Without a healthy body there cannot be a healthy mind. Never forget the importance of good examples being set before him. Teach him to obey the laws of nature; teach him to love the truth, and to always obey its precepts. Teach him to love and do good to his fellow-beings, and I will give you my assurance that he will be in a fit condition to receive all the blessings you can desire to rest upon his head; and I will promise to the extent of my power to bless him, and enlighten him, even as I have blessed and enlightened you. Peace be and abide with you, the trinity. I AM THAT I AM.

My friends were very kind to show me about the city and take me riding about the suburbs in various directions. Colombo contains over a hundred thousand inhabitants and covers a large area. A pretty little lake, nearly a mile across, lies back a little way from the landing, and the town is built around it, the part east of the lake being occupied with pretty residences with very commodious grounds, well decorated with flowers and ornamental plants. Mr. Perera took me to his residence, which is a pleasant establishment, also to a new house he has built, still more tasteful, with extensive cinnamon gardens adjoining. Cinnamon is pretty largely cultivated here on the white sands where was once the bed of the ocean and upon which little else would grow. Cinnamon is a pretty, clean-looking shrub which grows in clusters, from three to five feet high, and is cut off twice a year, the bark scraped off its outer part and then peeled off the rods, dried, and packed. If allowed to grow year after year it makes a pretty large tree, but the large bark is not good; it is the new growth that yields the fine aromatic article. My friends cut me some shoots of the cinnamon to take home with me for walking-sticks. I have not used a cane yet, and perhaps when I do it will be one of cinnamon.

We visited the main Buddhistic temple of the city, near which is a large open hall for meetings, where one of the priests holds forth to the people. A large edifice is also being constructed upon the grounds for a festival to come off after a while. In the temple, by a side entrance, is a colossal, reclining or sleeping, figure of Buddha; and here I was sorry to see were images of several Hindoo gods of large size, prominent among which was Christna. It did not seem to me that the Hindoo gods had any business in a Buddhistic temple, for neither Buddha nor his intelligent followers had any belief in gods of any kind, nor did they believe in worshiping them. All around this outer court or corridor, which surrounds the inner temple, are allegorical representations of scenes in the life of Buddha, of his temptations by the evil powers, his triumph over them, and many other interesting incidents in his career, much the same as Christians are so fond of doing by their deific hero or demi-god. In the interior, or sanctuary, is a sitting figure of Buddha in his meditative mood, and here offerings of flowers are often made to his memory. They claim not to worship the image, but that it is only placed there to keep their great father constantly in remembrance. I said to them that it was precisely the same feeling which prompted Christians to place figures of their god and of his mother in their churches and sacred places, and that in both instances, especially with the unlearned and unthinking classes, the tendency was to image-worship, and I regretted to see so many images among them. I was told that the figures of the Hindoo gods were introduced a few centuries ago by their native kings, with a view to conciliating the Hindoos, who dwelt in considerable numbers in the country, and to unite them and the Buddhists together. But it is a compromise I am sorry to see. I would much prefer to see the Buddhists stand strictly by their principles, and wholly discard everything that looks like image-worship. This is perhaps the largest temple in Ceylon, and is decorated richly with gilt and paintings in the historical and allegorical pictures. All the images of Buddha, like the pictures we have seen of him in America, represent him as a thoughtful, meditative, passive, genial, plump young man; and with not quite that sanctimonious, super-earthly look given to Jesus in images and paintings of him. There is too much of a tendency among Buddhists to multiply images of their adored teacher, and while they do not really worship those images, their veneration comes so near to worship that it is difficult to perceive the difference. But if all the wood-cuts, engravings, lithographs, paintings, and images that have been made of Jesus were counted, they would probably exceed those of Buddha ten to one. And the adoration which Christians pay to those representations amounts to worship, precisely the same as with the Buddhists. I have seen thousands of Christians kneeling and bowing before the images of Jesus and the Virgin, worshiping them as really as any idolater worships his image. And what numbers of Christians keep the crucifix, with their dead god upon it, in their dwellings, or upon their persons, making a fetich or an idol of it as much as does any pagan. The Christian thinks it impossible for him to adore his Jesus too much, or to have too many representations of him before his eyes, and the same with the Virgin. These representations doubtless amount to hundreds of millions. It is the same with the followers of Buddha; they believe him the greatest teacher ever upon the earth, and they think they cannot have him too often placed before them. I have said to them that I did not believe that Buddha himself would approve of making so many images of clay, stone, glass, and metal, for they would inevitably draw the minds of the ignorant to the images instead of to the teachings of the man. I said the teachings of

NEW YORK SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1882.

A Chicago Liar.

The meanest specimen of Christian malignity extant has recently been forwarded to us by several friends the past week. A subscriber, probably new, says:

JACKSON, MICH., June 19, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: This [the inclosed slip] was clipped from the Inter-Ocean of Chicago. Please let us know how near the truth it is. Yours, A SUBSCRIBER.

This is the slip:

9,482.—BEAST BENNETT.

OKETO, KAN.

Please giv a short history for the last three years of D. M. Bennett, formerly editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York.

JAS. BIGHAN.

ANSWER.—D. M. Bennett became notorious some years ago as a chief purveyor of obscene literature. About the time he had attained his "bad pre-eminence" in this meanest of all attempts to debauch the minds of the youth of America, male and female, Mr. Anthony Comstock, of New York, the friend of young manhood and apostle of pure literature, ran Bennett down, had him arrested, tried, and convicted of sending cartloads of the foulest and most obscene books, papers, etc., through the mails to all parts of the country. He was convicted and sent to the penitentiary for several years. After serving part of his time he was pardoned by the governor of New York state, who in so doing used his authority in such an arbitrary way as to giv pain and offense to the better class of citizens, not only of that state but of the whole country, and much was said and written severely animadverting upon his conduct. After this Bennett skipped out, and the next heard of him he was in the East Indies, in Bombay, Calcutta, and Ceylon, where he has been indentified with the Theosophists under the leadership of Colonel Olcott of New York, and Madam Blavatsky, a Russian woman, who claims citizenship in the United States. The trio, at last accounts, were lecturing about India, giving seances, as clairvoyants, and publishing a paper called the Theosophist in advocacy of their doctrins.

Perhaps about the best answer that we can make to "A Subscriber" is to print the letters of some other older subscribers, who are conversant with the fight Mr. Bennett had with the church three years ago. One writes:

ROCKFORD, ILL., June 17, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was for many years a member of the "press-gang," but during all my journalistic days, when lying was in fashion, I believe I never saw so many falsehoods compressed in so little space as I find in the inclosed, which I clip from the Chicago Inter-Ocean of the 12th inst. I think the general head, "Our Curiosity Shop," very appropriate for articles of that character. As I hav enjoyed my full share of newspaper abuse, I trust, on returning from your "skipped out" expedition to the Indies, you will get your fill of the same, and feel none the meaner for it, for lying is the special prerogativ of the partisan press.

I had supposed that Tony would out-Tony the world in downright lying, but giv me the editor of the Inter-Ocean, who as much excels Tony as Tony does the common sinner.

Congratulations, Mr. Bennett, on your return to America, and congratulations again that, by meritorious actions, you hav made yourself worthy of so much sectarian and partisan malignancy. As worthy a name as Thomas Paine has been traduced for near a century, "whose pen did as much to secure the independence of America as did the sword of Washington." You, who are striking as vigorous blows as he did at the citadel of tyranny, may expect to be assailed in a similar manner. I trust there are men who will survive you who hav sufficient honor to vindicate your good name, while his were "summer friends," who deserted him in the hour of trial.

Sincerely yours, G. W. BROWN, M.D.

Another pens these indignant lines:

TECUMSEH, MICH., June 20, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Inclosed you will find a clipping from the Chicago Inter-Ocean of June 15th, in which Mr. Bennett is most grossly assailed. I do not now remember of having before seen so much wilful lying condensed in so little space. Anthony's dirty ear-marks are so plainly visible in every line that one can't help placing the writer among his well-trained lickspittles, and unless the boss defamer looks well to himself some of his toad-eaters out West will some day outrank him in his dirty work. Such fools will never learn that Bennett can't be put down by such means, but instead they giv him a boost up every time. J. GUIWITS.

And a friend from Wisconsin has taken up arms, as he writes us:

BELLEVILLE, WIS., June 18, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Inclosed you will find a slip of paper cut from the weekly Inter-Ocean, of Chicago, which you will please publish, and also the statements setting forth the facts in the case. I shall also send to the Inter-Ocean a statement of the facts as I understand them, but hav no reason to think it will rectify it. You may use this as you see fit. Would say that more than one-half of our village are pronounced Liberals.

Yours for truth and right, JOSEPH GREENWOOD.

There is very little use in replying to this Inter-Ocean stuff in THE TRUTH SEEKER. All our readers ought to know it is a lie. But we hav written a letter to the offending paper of Chicago, which we hope to see them print. It seems to us, although no lawyer, that an action for libel could be sustained against the paper, and heavy damages recovered. The libel was printed in the daily, semi-weekly, and weekly editions of the Inter-Ocean, and consequently has had a very wide circulation, to the detriment of Mr. Bennett's character among those who do not know him or the work in which he is engaged.

However, for the benefit of our newer subscribers, we point out more specifically the lies. What the "9,482" means we do not know, unless it be that that is the number, up to date, of the lies the Inter-Ocean has told to inquiring correspondents. The lying begins promptly with the first word. To call a man a beast may be Christian courtesy, but even Christians should hesitate to do so unless they hav some evidence to corroborate their assertions. The only evidence they hav is that Mr. Bennett was tried on the ostensible charge of sending obscene matter through the mails. While Mr. Bennett was in prison he received the following letter regarding that conviction and sentence:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 20, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Friend: I hav just read your letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav thought of you every hour that I hav been awake since your imprisonment. Every man on the jury that convicted you committed a crime. Benedict committed a crime when he refused a new trial, and Hayes committed a crime when he listened to the hypocrits and religious zealots, and refused a pardon. Well, we will get even with them all some day. Superstition cannot rule the world forever, and the quicker the decisiv struggle comes the better. I hope the keepers of your prison will hav sense enough to treat you as you deserve, and not put you on a level with criminals. You hav violated no law, committed no wrong, and made no being unhappy. You hav lived an honorable, useful life, and in any country not governed by Christians you would be free and respected. Well, bear up as well as you can. Time goes on, and in a little while liberty will unlock your cell and giv you back to home and friends.

Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

Would Colonel Ingersoll hav written that to a beast, or the editor of the Inter-Ocean?

But a few short weeks ago, on learning there was to be a reception tendered Mr. Bennett in San Francisco on his return from his trip, James Parton wrote the promoters:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., April 6, 1882.

You intend, I hear, to giv Mr. D. M. Bennett a reception upon his arrival in San Francisco. You will do yourselvs honor by the act. The wrong which he endured was one which can never be compensated or atoned for, but it can be turned to our profit and his solace by such a public welcome as you propose to giv him. He suffered for us. Human nature itself was outraged in his person. The act for which he suffered was as innocent as selling a loaf of bread to a hungry person. He violated no law, and he injured no creature.

Would James Parton hav written that about a beast, or an Inter-Ocean editor?

The lying is consistently continued in the first sentence of the answer: "D. M. Bennett became notorious some years ago as a chief purveyor of obscene literature."

This is certainly news to us, who hav known Mr. Bennett for the past eight years, during all his trials, and to his life-long friends, who, one and all, regard him with the highest esteem. Obscenity is justly and righteously regarded by all decent people with detestation and disgust, and its venders loathed as slimy reptiles. And yet they are honorable compared with a man who will falsely charge another with the crime. A Presbyterian hell would be too comfortable a place for such a fellow.

The next is: "Anthony Comstock, of New York, the friend of young manhood, and apostle of pure literature, ran Bennett down, had him arrested, tried, and convicted of sending cartloads of the foulest and most obscene books, papers, etc., through the mails to all parts of the country."

In the first place Anthony Comstock is not a friend of young manhood. He is a detestable man, the willing tool of an ecclesiastical organization composed of soap-boiling hypocrits and wholesale knaves. His life is one of lying and deceit, and the example he sets is an extremely bad one, and one that if followed would deservedly land "young manhood" in the penitentiary unless protected by the whole power of the church, as he is. Neither is he the "apostle of pure literature." He is rather the "apostle" of nastiness, for if there is any dirtier book, in some of its parts, than the Bible he worships, it has not yet been named to us. The only grain of truth in the whole thing is that Mr. Bennett was "arrested." The rest is false. He was never "tried." The farce called a trial was but one of the legal preliminaries necessary to his incarceration. He was condemned from the first. Everything in his favor was ruled out by the bigoted judge. A long life of usefulness and honor, of business integrity and social worth, even the book itself upon which he was to be convicted, all were set aside by the judge and jury who "committed a crime," and his liberty taken from him at the behest of a church organization, which dreaded him as a powerful and incorruptible opponent. There were no "cartloads" of "foulest and obscene books, papers, etc." There was only one little fifteen-cent pamphlet, which hundreds of the foremost citizens of the United States hav declared not obscene. Charles Devens, then attorney-general of the United States, wrote of it: "In regard to the book itself, while it seems to me a publication not desirable to be made, I am aware that there may be much difference of opinion upon the subject, and do not confound it with those obscene publications, the effect and object of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions." He wrote this, his opinion of the book, to Elizur Wright, January 13, 1879. Regarding Mr. Bennett's trial, the New York Evening Express said:

"It involves the right to print, publish, sell, and circulate through the mails matter which is no more offensiv to good taste, and no more objectionable on the score of morals, than passages in Shakspere and the Bible. It is fast becoming the general opinion that Comstock is doing more harm than good by a zeal that is not according to knowledge, and officious meddling with private and public rights."

As to the book and trial, the Washington Capital was equally explicit. It said:

"While we boast of our freedom, and claim for ourselvs the widest range of opinion on all subjects, we are practically subjected to a despotism from sectarian interference that is perfectly intolerable. The latest instance of this reaches us from New York, where D. M. Bennett was prosecuted by that Christian and scoundrel, Anthony Comstock, for sending, as it was claimed, obscene literature through the mails. Comstock had mailed an order, under an assumed name, for a book Bennett had sold to popularize certain opinions concerning the marriage tie.

"When the case came to trial before a judge of the United States Circuit Court, Bennett's lawyer attempted to introduce the book itself, but the honorable Dogberry decided that the defendant should go to trial on such passages as the prosecutor had seen fit to quote in the indictment. Such ruling surpassed anything of the sort since Pontius Pilate, and would make it dangerous to mail a Bible or a copy of Shakspere to any one.

"Of course a judge capable of such ruling was one who would let no jury escape him, and he accordingly left the impartial twelve no other course than a verdict of guilty.

"The worst feature of this wretched business is that Congress has sanctioned by law the tampering with mails on the part of this charlatan that is fatal to the postal service. He travels at the expense of the government, enters any postal car or office he pleases, and trifles with private mail matter, at his sweet will.

"This is all uncalled for—a melancholy farce. There is law enough on the statute books of the states to arrest the circulation of obscene literature without invading the mails. The trouble is that these laws are not enforced, and while such prosecutions are neglected, a great noise, with the smallest results, is indulged in to giv this very unnecessary individual a national notoriety."

One of the jurors was also conscious-stung at the great wrong he had been instrumental in committing in convicting Mr. Bennett, and wrote this letter to the New York Herald of March 27, 1879:

NEW YORK, March 24, 1879.

To the Editor of the Herald, Sir: The newspaper reports of the trial of Mr. D. M. Bennett for mailing "Cupid's Yokes" seem to make a few words of explanation on my part necessary. For instance, the Herald report says: "Despite of all arguments of eleven jurors, Valentine continued to vote for the acquittal of the prisoner, but seemed to tire of his confinement toward daylight, and at half-past six yesterday morning, when the last ballot was taken, voted for conviction." Now, it is quite true that I was tired of confinement, and that another juror was extremely anxious to get home to a sick wife; but it is not true that I changed my vote for those reasons, for I felt sure that we would be discharged in a few hours whether a verdict was found or not. One reason for changing my vote was to enable some appeal to be taken so that the true meaning of the words "obscene" and "indecent" as used in the statute in question might be determined by some higher court. After the jury retired for deliberation there was doubt about the meaning of those words upon which the whole case hung. We had been charged to follow strictly and only the definitions of the judge (Hon. C. L. Benedict), and accordingly we sent to him for them and received them in these words, which I copied at the time (the italics are mine):

"The test of obscenity is whether the tendency of the matter is to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall."

"'Lewd' means a tendency to excite lustful thoughts."

"Passages are indecent within the meaning of the statute if they contain obscenity, that is to say, matter having that form of indecency which is calculated to promote the general corruption of morals."

These definitions were so broad and uncertain that it seemed to me they might be used to condemn a very large, and perhaps the larger, part of the literature of the country, as well as the isolated passages that had been picked out of "Cupid's Yokes." I say isolated passages, for the court did not allow the whole book to come in evidence before us, although we each had a copy of it in the jury-room. I felt, and I still feel, that these definitions carry the statute much further than Congress ever intended, or a fair application of it would warrant.

The pamphlet in question seems to me immoral from our ordinary point of view, but not obscene within the strict meaning of the statute, although the isolated passages selected might, standing by themselvs, come under the definitions of the judge. I wished, therefore, to maintain the right of the author, Mr. Heywood, and of those who agree with him, to differ from me.

Under these convictions I hesitated to do what seemed an act of wrong and injustice to Mr. Bennett (of whom I had no knowledge whatever), but I could not violate my oath nor disobey the instructions of the court. I could only express my conviction by withholding my concurrence for a reasonable time—about fifteen hours; then I gave it with a protest and as a means to obtain a less sweeping construction of this statute upon appeal or a change of it by those who made it. Had the jurors been left to construe and apply it Mr. Bennett would never hav been convicted. Yours very respectfully,

ALFRED A. VALENTINE.

Commenting upon this letter, the New York World said:

"The letter which is sent us by Mr. Valentine, the dissenting juror in the case of Bennett, deserves careful consideration. The questions involved in that trial were very serious. A writer who advocates unpopular opinions on important subjects is liable to be made the victim of legal prosecution unless his legal rights are protected with the utmost care. . . . In this case Judge Benedict made a decision surprising to laymen in ruling that the context of the phrases quoted and relied upon in the indictment should not be read to the jury. Some of the noblest books in our languuge could be so garbled by a selection of phrases as to bring them within the prohibition of the statute.

Judge Benedict's definition of the offense, concerning which the jury was required to find, had the misfortune of being so vague as to be almost worthless, and required a judicial construction from the jury. The tendency of Federal judges since the war has been to usurp the functions of the jury. Whether Judge Benedict has yielded to this temptation or not, there is food for reflection in Mr. Valentine's remark that, if the jury had been left to construe and apply the statute, Bennett would not hav been convicted."

The New York Volks Zeitung was of the same opinion, as its issue of March 27, 1880, shows:

"If anything were needed to confirm our original judgment about Mr. Bennett's prosecution, the above card of Mr. Valentine is just that thing. Particularly weighty is that part of it which points out that not the character of the whole book, but only certain isolated passages of it were passed upon. How appropriate is the remark of Mr. Valentine, that measured by that 'test' the greater part of literature must be condemned. In fact, what would become of Goethe, Schiller, Shakspere, Byron, and similar unimportant (?) authors? Above all, what would become of the Bible if we should take therefrom single sentences and words, and upon them found a judgment upon the moral or immoral character (or tendency) of these writings? O ye pharisees and hypocrits!"

The Winsted (Conn.) Press also felt deeply the outrage, and gave this expression to its feelings:

"D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in New York, has been for some time under arrest for sending through the mails a copy of the now famous 'Cupid's Yokes'—the book for circulating which Heywood, its author, was unjustly imprisoned in Massachusetts, he being soon after released by order of the president. Bennett has had his trial, which has resulted in a verdict of guilty. The trial was an infamously one-sided affair, the judge being an enemy to Freethought and apparently determined to convict the prisoner and punish an Infidel by fair means if convenient, by foul means if necessary. He refused to admit the testimony of such men as O. B, Frothingham, Elizur Wright, and Oliver Johnson to prove that the book was not obscene. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty at last, not because they considered Bennett guilty, but to accommodate a juror who wished to be liberated in order that he might go home to his wife. The court held that the good object of the writer of the book was not a matter to be taken into consideration. The jury were to consider 'whether the tendency of the matter was to deprave or corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences and into whose hands publications of this sort may fall.'

"On this principle a jury of Infidels might find every Christian publisher in the land a fit subject for the law's vengeance, and a Christian jury might cause to be fined and imprisoned every Infidel publisher, or a jury of Prohibitionists every advertiser of intoxicating liquors, or a jury of vegetarians every publisher who dared to advertise the virtues of meat, and so on through an endless category. Catholic might punish Protestant, and vice versa, it being not a matter of right but of might in these cases. Whether or not the tendency of a book is to 'deprave and corrupt the morals' is a matter of mere opinion, susceptible of no proof whatever. Every reformatory document has a tendency to 'corrupt the morals,' if we are to take the opinion of those who are opposed to reform, and they are generally in the majority. The abominable ruling of Judge Benedict in Bennett's case would muzzle the press of the Democratic party throughout the United States during Republican ascendancy and vice versa. Not an abolition paper could hav been tolerated under it. Every Greenback journal might be silenced. Liberty of speech and press is a miserable farce if law sanctions the punishment of a man for sending through the mails, not matter that has corrupted anybody's morals, but matter that in the opinion of a probable set of bigots and ignoramuses may possibly tend at some future time to corrupt the morals of some imaginary human being!

"This outrage upon Bennett and liberty is perhaps the opening of a Y. M. C. A. plot to root out 'heresy' and establish the pet Christian God and his lackeys in power over a people heretofore superior to either or both. At any rate, every friend of freedom ought to make Bennett's case his own at once and aid him by voice and pen, ballot and pocket-book, in maintaining in this struggle that great pioneer of truth, conqueror for justice, and guardian of liberty, which all bigots and tyrants and 'heaven-ordained' public beggars and pilferers with good reason fear and detest—the right of free speech.

"Bennett has taken an appeal, but if not successful we shall soon hear of him in his honorable old age as an occupant of a felon's cell—not there for any deed of dishonesty, or for lawfully cheating his creditors, or for oppressing the poor, or for injuring his fellow-man in any way, but for simply sending through the mails a book which in the opinion of less than a dozen incompetent men may hav a tendency to corrupt the morals of some person or persons, the existence of whom is neither known nor specified. If this is the beginning, what may we expect in the end from the Comstock 'morality' mill, and the Y. M. C. A. who grind it?"

These are but a few of an immense number of opinions by the press of the country we might quote; but they are enough to show that there was not even one obscene book in question. All are agreed that the pamphlet in question was as free from obscenity as the classics and hundreds of books freely allowed the privileges of the mail. The "cartloads" is the infamous invention of Christian malignity.

The next lie, that Mr. Bennett was sentenced to several years' imprisonment, is so small compared to the rest that it is almost lost sight of. The sentence of thirteen months, and not several years, was due to the great feeling manifested by the public in the case, and not to the leniency of Benedict, who, judging from the disposition manifested on the trial, would like to hav made the sentence a dungeon for life, if not the stake.

The ignorance of the writer on the Inter-Ocean in regard to the case is fully shown by his statement that "after serving part of his time, he [Mr. Bennett] was pardoned by the governor of New York state, who in so doing used his authority in such an arbitrary way as to giv pain and offense to the better class of citizens, not only of that state, but of the whole country, and much was said and written severely animadverting upon his conduct." As he was convicted in the United States court, the governor of New York state had no more authority to pardon Mr. Bennett than the meanest editor of the Inter-Ocean, and, so far as we know, no more disposition to do it than that editor has to tell the truth or be an honorable man. But Hayes was applied to by a petition bearing the signatures of over two hundred thousand reputable citizens of the United States, and it was his conduct in refusing the request which Col. Ingersoll denounced as a crime. There was nothing said or written about the governor of New York, but there was very much said and written "severely animadverting" upon the conduct of Hayes, who after once saying he did not regard the pamphlet as obscene and promising to release Mr. Bennett "listened to the hypocrits and religious zealots and refused a pardon."

As for "skipping out," we presume the editor of the Inter-Ocean would be pleased to "skip" in the same way did anybody regard his services as a writer of sufficient worth to purchase a book of his, or run the risk of intrusting him with five dollars without having a sheriff to watch him. But there is no apparent danger of his "skipping" to India unless a company of liars should select him as the chief among ten thousand. We respectfully recommend him to the various harmonious Christian societies who are engaged in spreading their gospel of dirt through the Indias. His services would be of value to them in making their reports of conversions.

Mr. Bennett did lecture in India, as Jo Cook can testify, but this is the first we knew of his developing into a seance-holding medium. We were also in complete ignorance of his having any connection with the Theosophist beyond being a friend to its editor.

These facts are all familiar to the majority of our readers, but judging from the number of letters inclosing clippings from the Inter-Ocean and making inquiries, there are a large number of new recruits to Liberalism who are not yet in possession of them. Those desiring further information can obtain it from the "Trial of D. M. Bennett," price 75 cents. Also the Iconoclast last week published a brief sketch of the life of Mr. Bennett, which can be obtained of W. H. Lamaster, Indianapolis, Ind., for five cents.

We hav only this much to add: That a writer on a paper who will use his position to wilfully injure the character of a man who not only never harmed him, but never knowingly injured any one, or who deliberately writes what he knows to be a lie, can expect and deserves only the execration of all decent people. And this is just what one of the editors of the Inter-Ocean has earned for himself.

Mr. Bennett's Movements.

Last Monday we received a note from the returning pilgrim, from which we infer that it will be along in July before he gets East. But we will print the letter, and then THE TRUTH SEEKER family will all know as much as we do about it:

SAN JOSE, CAL., June 17, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: I am spending two or three days with the good friends in this beautiful Santa Clara Valley. Yesterday I visited the quicksilver mines of New Almaden twelve miles south of this place, where, within the last thirty years, 55,563, 327 pounds of quicksilver hav been procured from the bowels of the earth. With the exception of the Almaden mines in Spain, these are the most extensiv quicksilver mines in the world. The process of reducing the ores by roasting, and the distillation of the heavy metal, are interesting to investigate.

Last evening the friends here gave me a reception in the California Theater, a very neat establishment. The audience was fair in numbers and appreciativ. The stage was profusely and tastefully decorated with flowers and presented a beautiful appearance. Thomas Jacob, president of the San Jose Liberal League, presided and made the opening remarks. The City Band discoursed excellent music. Miss Maud Loud recited "No Sects in Heaven" in a very creditable manner. Mr. R. H. Schwartz performed a cornet solo. Dr. J. L. York made the speech of welcome, and made a brief examination of the claims and purposes of Liberalism. He made me welcome to this beautiful portion of California. I followed in a brief description of what I had witnessed in the Old World, the religious superstitions of the various countries, etc. Thirteen young men of the Turn Verein sang a favorit song in fine style, when Marion Todd, lawyer of San Francisco, made the closing speech in excellent style and spirit. After more music by the orchestra the meeting was closed, and pretty extensiv handshakings and congratulations followed.

To-day several friends will accompany me to Mount Hamilton, where the observatory is being constructed with the funds munificently donated by the late James Lick. I shall next visit Stockton, Fresno, the Yosemite Valley, Modesto, etc., when I will turn my face eastward, stopping at various points on the way. Up to July 1st I may be addressed care The Great West, Denver, Col., and after that care of J. C. Jones, 45 Franklin st., Chicago. Yours truly, D. M. B.

NOTHING can be more gratifying to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to the friends of Freethought generally, than the account given in our present issue, of the reception accorded to Mr. Bennett by the people of Ceylon. His farthest wish, he states, seems to hav been anticipated, friends met him with outstretched hands at every point, and ample provisions for his accommodation were made in advance at different points which he was expected to visit. It is interesting in the extreme to know that in the very centers of Christian missionary labor the standard of Freethought is raised above the ecclesiastical banners of the church, and that thousands rally to its support. Mr. Bennett lectured in Ceylon to an audience of over three thousand, and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed throughout the meeting. Next week the traveler's own account of the occasion will be given, together with the lecture, which the committee requested leave to copy and translate into Singalese, the nativ language of the spicy isle.

A Reception to D. M. Bennett.

A PROPOSITION THAT A DINNER BE GIVEN TO THE OLD PILGRIM AT THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

As Watkins Glen is the place where D. M. Bennett was first arrested, and where the persecution against him by the Comstock crew first commenced four years ago, I think it would be eminently proper that the Freethinkers of the United States tender him a dinner and reception from his long journey at that place, at some time during the session of the coming Freethinkers' Convention, to be held Aug. 23d. And, as a member of that association, I move that such a dinner and reception be given to Mr. Bennett on the evening of the third day of that convention, and that the following named persons be the committee to make the proper arrangements, viz.: Hon. Elizur Wright, James Parton, T. B. Wakeman, J. P. Mendum, Courtlandt Palmer, and Amy Post. And I ask all who second this motion to indicate through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, or both. H. L. GREEN.

A NEW auxiliary League has been organized at Galva, Henry county, Ill., Dr. James F. Todd, secretary. Mr. F. F. Follett has been there.

Buddha are so good that they require no image to enable you to remember them, and if you keep the import of those teachings in your hearts, or in your minds, you will not require any images. It is better to exercise the memory more, and to have less images for the eye to rest upon. It is the same with regard to Jesus, and the endless images made of him are prompted by precisely the same spirit that has led to the images of Buddha, and all the gods of pagandom. There are no idolaters so ignorant as to think the image of stone, wood, or metal which they bow down to is really the Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, Osiris, Jupiter, or any other god they may please to worship; but they regard the images as simply the epresentatives of those gods, which are themselves invisible. To my view, all the principal religions of the world, with the exception of Mohammedanism, are little better than idolatry, and I cannot see that there is any difference between a Christian having a picture of his god before him, and a worshiper of Siva, Kali, Christna, or Mumbo Jumbo, doing the same thing. It is all idolatry alike; the only difference is in degree.

While visiting at the temple or vihare, I was introduced to the chief priest of the temple, and said to be the greatest orator on the island, and a controversalist of the first order. He is the one who held a public debate with Christians a few years ago at Panadura, twenty miles from Colombo, which, was published by Messrs. Colby & Rich, under the title of "Christianity and Buddhism Face to Face." This orator acquitted himself well, and vanquished his opponents. His name is Mohottiwatte Gunamanaa. He does not speak English, and the conversatien between us had to be interpreted; but he received me very cordially. He said my "My Open Letter to Jesus Christ" had been translated for him, and he had read it with great interest, and he was now glad to see the person who wrote it. In a day or two he returned my visit, and called at my room, and we had another pleasant visit, and I availed myself of the opportunity to inquire about several matters relative to Buddhism, which I wished to know more of.

All Buddhistic priests wear a yellow robe of common cotton, colored in a dye made of the bark of the jackwood, a tree which grows abundantly on the island (the yellow is duller than that made by annatto and more like that produced by copperas). Their dress consists of three yards of muslin, also colored yellow; this goes around the body and held by a strap above the hips. The robe is about the size of an ordinary bed-sheet, and is worn much in the style of the Grecian and Roman toga—placed upon the shoulders, and brought around and thrown over the left shoulder, leaving the right arm and shoulder bare. This is their entire dress. They either go barefooted or have sandals on the feet. Their heads are shaved, and I think also the eyebrows cut off. They live lives of celibacy, eat little animal food, and take no solid food after 12 o'clock M. Their time is passed in studying the teachings of Buddha or in copying the books containing his teachings and the voluminous commentaries upon them. Buddha did not allow his priests to be owners of property, but in modern times they have degenerated somewhat in this respect, and some of them now are rich. This custom is also said to have been introduced by the native kings who made large donations of lands to the priests for the benefit of education, etc. These gifts were undoubtedly made in much the same spirit as Christian kings and princes have given property to the church and the priesthood—to place themselves on a good standing with the clergy, and to benefit their condition, possibly, in a future life. Property and money, however, are corrupting influences in all religions, and a rich priest or bishop cannot be regarded as so pure and unworldly a man as one who "lays not up treasures on earth." It is probable that wealth has the same corrupting influence upon the priests of Buddhism as of any other religion, and it is to be regretted that they have so far departed from the strictness of Buddha's teachings as to become the owners of property and money.

I will here mention the ordinary style of dress worn by the people. It comes nearer to the European than any other nation's dress I have met with. The principal part of the men in the cities and towns wear the European coat, vest, shirt, hat, and shoes, but in place of pants they wear three yards of cloth held around the waist by a leather strap, and they wear neither drawers nor pants. This is all they retain of their original tribal costume. The ordinary dress of women is the same waist cloth, held by a strap or belt, and coming down to the feet, and a very short, open, loose jacket or spencer without sleeves, coming down to the waist, and seldom fastened in front. The dresses of the better classes and for extra occasions are much in the European style—long skirts, etc., with decorations of jewelry, and the like. The farmers and laboring people dress much as in India—a simple waist-cloth. It is the custom here for men to wear the hair long, and to do it up on the back of the head as women do in our country, nearly all wearing round combs to help hold the hair in place. Their long suits of profuse, jet-black, glossy hair would doubtless be the envy of many American women were they to see it. The eyes and hair of all these people are intensely black, the hair straight and glossy. I saw very few baldheaded people.

Five or six of my friends, on Washington's birthday, accompanied me out eight miles in the country, where a Buddhistic festival was being held. The ride was a very pleasant one, surrounded as we were by all kinds of the most luxuriant tropical vegetation. The festival building was constructed of tall bamboo poles, with a good deal of ornamentation, Buddhistic pictures, etc. In the center was an altar, or something of the kind, containing a figure of Buddha, and around it a company of people were sitting, chanting some of the sayings of Buddha, or a style of liturgy used in worship. It was not the time of day for the masses to be present, and no public speaking was being held. I was, however, introduced to some dozen of the priests, and was very kindly received by them. The principal one was a fine, large, genial, intellectual man, who, in his physique, the shape of his head, the plumpness of his face, and his round, good-natured look, generally reminded me of Col. Ingersoll, so much so, that it comes handy to me to call him "Bob" in preference to his real name—Amaramoli. We sat down, and through an interpreter had a good long conversation, upon the point of Buddhistic belief. The Buddhists do not usually sit down in the presence of the priests, but I am not quite enough of a Buddhist yet to be governed by all their rules, so I retained the sitting attitude. I will give you a part of our conversation as nearly as I can remember it, which will give you some hints as to what Buddhists believe. P represents the priest, and B myself.

B.—I wish to inquire of you relative to a few points of your belief.

P.—I will cheerfully answer all inquiries you wish to make if I am ahle to do so.

B.—Do Buddhists believe in any creator or personal deity?

P.—No, we have no god.

B.—Do you believe that matter eternally existed?

P.—Yes, it is impossible to either create matter or destroy it.

B.—Do you believe that the laws of nature are ever set aside, or, in other words, that miracles are ever performed?

P.—No; the laws of nature are never set aside; there is not a moment in which they cease to operate. There never was, and could not be, such an operation as a miracle, because to produce one the laws of nature would have to be subverted, which cannot be the case.

B.—That is much my belief. Do you believe that there is any efficacy in prayer?

P.—No; we have no being to pray to, and do not believe that there is any efficacy in prayer. What a person wants done he must do himself, and get some of his fellows to help him. That is the only kind of prayer that can avail.

B.—We will not quarrel on that question, for I think much the same way myself. Do you believe in a future life?

P.—Buddha taught a kind of immortality, that we never had a beginning, and hence we can never entirely end. But when we attain to Nirvana we lose our personal existence and become absorbed in the great fountain or body of intelligent existence.

B.—I have great respect for much that Buddha taught, but I cannot understand what grounds he had upon which to base the doctrine of an eternal prior existence of the mind or intelligence. According to my belief the mind originates with the body; it is a product of our organization, and dates no farther back than the time when we were begotten. The material of which we are composed of course always existed, but our individuality, that which makes us persons, began only with our conception.

P.—Buddha spent a great deal of time and thought upon this subject, and he came to the firm conclusion that the doctrine of metempsychosis is true, the same as did Pythagoras, the great Grecian philosopher, who was contemporaneous with Buddha. He said he could remember some of his previous existences, and that once he was a cock, and at another time a king. You cannot think such a man as Pythagoras would be guilty of falsehood.

B.—No; I entertain too high an opinion of Pythagoras to think he would utter what he believed an untruth, and I have a similar opinion of Buddha; but they lived in an age of the world when metempsychosis was almost the universal belief among the intelligent nations of the earth, and it is very natural that they should have fallen into the same kind of belief. No doubt they were perfectly honest in maintaining it. I can hardly see any grounds for believing it true. It is just as easy for nature to originate the mind as the body, and in my opinion the mind had not a preëxistence any more than the body. We see that a new-born infant has less mind than body, but that it has in an undeveloped state the apparatus or machinery for producing mind, and with the use of the eyes, ears, and the other organs and senses, the little intellect became expanded and enlarged to what man is capable of attaining. If our minds had a previous existence, why cannot we remember something about it, and why are we such absolute know-nothings when we are born?

P.—Our previous existences were like dreams, real and conscious, while being lived, but like a dream the memory of it passes away when the dream is over. Buddha taught that after Nirvana is attained the memory of all previous existences returned, so that the whole course of being could be reviewed if desired.

B.—Yes, but I can see no warrant or authority in nature for all this, and I cannot accept what Buddha taught any more than anybody else, unless there are real proofs to sustain it. Now, does not the fact that families, tribes, and nations bear a strong resemblance to each other in mental qualities as well as physical go to prove that we inherit the mental part of our being precisely as we do the physical? If it were not so, and the doctrine of previous births and existences is true, would we not see the greatest possible differences between the mental characteristics of numbers of the same family, tribe, and nation? Would there be one chance in a million for two brothers, or for father and son, to bear any mental resemblance to each other?

P.—Well, perhaps I cannot fully explain how it is, but we are told to believe in previous births, and without that previous existence there is no logical grounds to expect an existence hereafter.

B.—I admit that logic indicates that we cannot be immortal after this existence unless we were immortal before, for, as I have often said, whatever has a beginning must have an end—whatever has one end must have two. So if we have an existence after this it must be regarded as merely a continued existence and not immortal life. It may last ten thousand years, but at some time we must come to an end if we had a beginning. I admit that the only logical argument in favor of immortality is the doctrine of reincarnation, or your doctrine of previous existence.

But, admitting for a moment that the doctrine is true, where is the law that governs the matter that there shall always be a soul ready to step in every time a new person is begotton or born? There would seem that there sometimes must be derangements in the law of demand and supply. There would seem to be a liability of there being an over-supply of souls at one time for the bodies to be supplied, and at other times that there would not be enough to go around. For instance, scientists tell us that there was a time when this earth was unfit to be inhabited by organized beings—that there was a time when no plant or animal could live upon it. Now at the present time there are some 1,500,000,000 human beings upon the earth, and perhaps ten times as many animals of different kinds. Supposing for a moment that 500,000,000,000 years thus passed before any form of animal life was upon the earth needing a soul, what were all the souls doing through that inconceivable period? And does it not show a hitch in nature's arrangements that so many souls should have to remain unoccupied all that time? And again, suppose that within the next fifty years the men and animals should increase on the earth five hundred per cent, where could the souls be found to supply them all? Is there not an incongruity, a great probability of derangement in the principle of supply and demand, a great want of perfection in the system?

P.—Yes, but you must remember that this is not the only world in existence; there are perhaps millions of other worlds to draw from, and if there were a deficiency of souls for instance in this world for the births taking place, there would be a plenty in the other worlds to meet the demand.

B.—No matter how many worlds there are, the principle is the same. There is a possibility of the demand for souls for new animal births to be ten times as great at one period as at another, so if there are enough of souls to meet the greatest possible demand there must be an immense number to remain in idleness or inactivity for immense periods of time. Besides, there appears to be no authority that we get any part of our being, whether physical or mental, from any other world than this. By the laws of the universe the matter and the existences of individuals that belong to the earth cannot leave it or get away from the potent influences that hold it here. It is probably the same with all worlds; the laws of attraction and gravitation hold on each permanently every form and substance that belongs to it. There is nothing that warrants us to believe that any form of organized life that belongs to any world can throw off the forces which hold it to that world; they are a part of it and cannot dissever themselves from it. Does it not seem to you a more perfect system for each world to furnish all the necessities and material for the animals and beings which live upon it rather than that they should be dependent upon some other world for a part of their existence —their soul, for instance? And so long as we can find in our parentage the mode of our origin in nature, all the necessary resources to furnish what we have and what we are, is it not needless to look elsewhere?

P. (hesitatingly)—I do not know that I have any further arguments to advance. I have given you the substance of the teachings of Buddha upon this subject. I think you had better see the high priest in Colombo; he may be able to make the matter more clear to you than I can.

B.—Will you please give me Buddha's doctrine of Karma?

P.—I will refer you to the high priest on this subject also, for he can explain it better than I can.

B.—May I ask you, Do you believe in a state of future punishment—a hell?

P.—We accept the law that bad actions necessarily entail unhappiness, and that if this is not reached in this life it will be in a future life, though it is our belief that most of the punishment for bad conduct comes in future bad births. The better we do here the better will be our condition the next time we are born. When Nirvana is reached then repeated births are over; we have to be born no more. We then enter into a state of rest and peace with no further anxieties, do further desires.

B.—Do you believe in a center or head, devil who inflicts punishment for bad conduct performed here?

P.—No; nothing of the kind. We recognize the existence of bad spirits, of dark spirits, but we have no supreme devil.

B.—Let me ask a question about Nirvana. Is it a continued existence, or is it a cessation of existence? Does Buddha still exist as an individuality?

P.—There is a difference of opinion among Buddhists on this point. Northern Buddhists, those living in Thibet, Nepaul, etc., believe that Nirvana is a state of conscious but peaceful existence—a state of rest and peace but still retaining consciousness—while we of the south, in Ceylon, Burmah, Siam, etc., believe that Nirvana is a state where personal consciousness ends and where there really is no individual existence. We understand Buddha's doctrines to be this; then since he reached Nirvana we believe he no longer exists. Existence and perfect rest are incompatible with each other.

B.—Do you as a people believe that the planets have an influence over the destiny and fortunes of individuals in this world? In other words, do you regard astrology as true?

P.—We do.

B.—Do you personally believe in Occultism? Do you believe that by a course of mental and physical training the mind becomes able to exercise control over the forces of nature, as, for instence, to be able to move small bodies of matter by will power, for two people at a distance to hold communication with each other, and to cause one form of matter to pass through other forms?

P.—I do.

B.—Have you witnessed anything of the kind yourself?

P.—I have, several times.

B.—Let me ask you a question about your priesthood. You profess to lead strictly celibate lives. The Catholic priesthood do the same, but we find that Christian priests have been known to step aside, yield to the allurements of nature, and thus break their vows; in fact, we have got to think the Christian clergy about as sensual as any other class among us. I want to ask if you Buddhistic priests sometimes act in this way. Are not the attractions of the opposite sex too much for you?

P. (smiling)—I cannot say but what priests among us have sometimes been guilty of such conduct as you allude to, but the cases are not common. If they do wrong in that direction they are expected to withdraw from the priesthood.

B.—Do not some of your priests hold property in their own name, and do they not show a fondness for acquiring worldly possessions? (I was informed that this same priest owns a good deal of property.)

P.—Yes, this custom has gradually crept in within the last few hundred years, though it is not strictly in accordance with Buddha's requirements. Perhaps a wrong has been done in this direction.

B.—I thank you for your kindness in answering my questions. I thank you for the genial manner in which you have received me. My interview with you has been very pleasant. I thank you for it. I find we agree on a good many points.

P.—You are very welcome for whatever I have been able to tell you. I feel honored by your visit to me, and thank you for coming. I think were you to study the teachings of Buddha closely we would agree on more points still.

After looking at a couple of elephants which were in attendance at the festival, going through a series of performances, and after partaking of a lunch which had been prepared for us, we returned to the city.

A half day was spent in visiting by carriage several places of interest in the suburbs of the city. Mr. Wm. Fred. Wijeyesakera, secretary of the Theosophical Society, and Mr. J. R. De Silva accompanied me. We called at the hospital and medical college and museum, which is a well constructed establishment. The hospital is very roomy and cleanly, and capable of accommodating several hundred patients. The presiding physician is a native, and a man of fine parts and abilities. He has some thirty young men with him in the hospital learning practice, etc. The college is a suitable building for a medical school, a modern structure. The museum contains a good deal of interest to medical men, including representations of morbid conditions of various parts of the body, of abnormal formations, etc., with much of natural history, osteology, etc.

We also visited the insane asylum, the museum of antiquities of the island, and the cemetery, the front part of which is used for Europeans, and the rear part by Buddhists, who inter their dead, save the priests, who are cremated. The Buddhists leave their graves entirely plain, without tombstones or other decorations. In the cemetery I saw the gombogetree, from which that drastic drug is obtained. On our return we stopped at Mr. Wijeysakera's home, quaffed the juice of King Cocoanut, looked through his extensive grounds, and saw several kinds of palm, the breadfruit-tree, the jackfruit-tree, the nuxvomica-tree, pimento or allpspice shrub, nutmeg-tree, pineapples of different varieties. It is not the season for breadfruit to be ripe, but I have eaten some which were sliced and fried in cocoanut oil, much as potato chips are fried with us and called "Saratoga chips." The fruit is now about half grown. The fruit is said to be more like boiled potato than like bread. It is cooked before eaten. This tree grows erect, often to pretty large size, with a leaf a foot in length and divided into lobes, rich and shiny in appearance. The jackfruit is as big as a large watermelon, and grows on a tree as tall as the elm—not at the ends of the limbs as with most fruit, but on a stout twig for the purpose on the trunk of the tree or the main branches. It is much eaten by the natives, and has a sweet taste, though the meat seems a little tough and coarse, like a pumpkin. Its enormous size makes it ample as a meal for several persons. The wood of the tree is yellow, somewhat like some varieties of mulberry, and is used for building-timber. The bananas are also largely depended upon here for food. I saw many of the large bunches of fruit on the trees covered with a kind of basket made of palm-leaves. Upon inquiring what that was for, I was told it was to prevent the effects of any evil eye which might be cast upon it. The more ignorant people seem to believe that some evilly disposed persons possess the power to destroy the growth of fruit by the power of the eye.

Let me mention the harbor works which the government have in course of construction at Colombo. A heavy wall of concrete stone, made in very heavy blocks, weighing nearly a ton, is being laid across from one point to another, a distance of two miles, inside of which will be a very secure harbor where ships and steamers can safely rest, no matter how furiously the storm may rage outside. The blocks are composed of sand, broken stone, and Portland cement. The breaking of the stone and the mixing of the blocks is done by convicts. The blocks are lifted and placed by steam cranes. The work is heavy and expensive, but it will be of great utility to the town when completed.

Among the items I have picked up in Ceylon I learn that it is not very desirable for a man to have a family of danghters, for with every daughter he has to give with her in marriage quite a handsome dowry, when he is able to do so, as scarcely any young man thinks of marrying unless he gets a good dowry with the bride. When a father has several girls this is a very heavy tax to him.

Partial Corections of English Spellings.

APROVED BY THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.

[This Comunication is spelt in acordance with the Corections.]

BY MRS. ELIZA B. BURNZ.

The English Philological Society has recomended for general use sum "Partial Corections of English Spellings;" thoze corections, with the reazons for them, being set forth it a pamflet publisht under the auspices of the society. In this action it has shown a sound common sense, without which the greatest atainments in lerning ar of littl practical value. It would be exceedingly gratifying to lern that the English Spelling Reform Association accepted theze corections and uzed them in printing its transactions and in carrying on its educational work. It would be also cauz for rejoicing if members of the American Philological Association, and the American Spelling Reform Association, recognizing the importance of concerted action with English reformers, wer also to recomend and uze theze "Partial Corections" in writing and printing. This coud be done without any loss of dignity by American spelling reformers, sinse the English "Partial Corections" and the American "Five Rules" harmonize. There is reazon to beleev that spelling reform would progress far more rapidly than it has yet done if a determined effort was unitedly made by its friends to put in use these partial corections, without further change, until they wer adopted by the press generally; perfect alfabets, new letters, and exact fonetic spelling being, for a time, relegated to the indefinite future, or to "spelling experimenters," publisht at the expense of their authors.

The "Partial Corections" comend themselvz to the press and public, becauz they ar in harmony with the English uzage of the Roman letters, and becauz the rezulting print is eazily red; each of which considerations may be considered as an essential toward efecting that partial change of spelling which must precede a complete reform of Fnglish orthografy. The chief value of the "Partial Corections" (which ar now recommended by Dr. Murray and his fellow filologists upon etymological or historic grounds) wil consist in their becoming precedents for analogus changes, made not for historic, but for purely fonetic reazons. At prezent, however, we may be satisfied to go no further than the "Partial Corections" prescribe, sinse quite a large per cent. of spelling is changed by the corections alone.

The progress of spelling reform has been greatly retarded by the wholesale changes proposed for immediate adoption by many of its frends. I hav felt deeply greevd at what, in my opinion, has been a great waste of the splendid oportunities ofered to its leaders. Four years ago, if the distinguisht filologists who heded the moovment had prepared articls spelt on the basis of the "Partial Corections" or the "Five Rules," they would hav been welcumd and readily printed by the Independent (N. Y.), New England Journal of Education, Princeton Review, and other first-class papers. I think they miht almost hav made historic spelling fashionable, and thus prepared the way for still further simplifications; but insted of a revized orthografy, which peopl generally would hav acknowledged to be, at least. "sensibl," a style of spelling was urged upon the Spelling Reform Association and the public which neither, and especially the latter, was redy to apreciate. The new print was un-English in apeerance and dificult to read; the script quite unsuited for business use or for corespondence with non-fonetic persons; while the compozitors of frendly papers wer so hevily taxt by new and cut letters that the publishers could not aford to giv the help to spelling reform which they really dezired to bestow. A number of papers, however, as the Home Journal and TRUTH SEEKER (N. Y.), Tribune (Chicago), the various shorthand periodicals, and many others, ar regularly printed with a simplified spelling of certain classes of words selected by their editors; and it is to be hoped that, when the book of "Partial Corrections" is more widely distributed and its teachings better understood, the latter will be accepted as a basis for concerted and uniform action by spelling reformers and frendly publishers.

Ho! for Watkins.

Less than ten years hav passed since the Freethought movement in this country began to take upon itself the form of organization. What strides the movement has made in the decade! Not so much in the matter of organization, perhaps, as in the wide diffusion of the spirit of investigation and individualization. It seems but a short time since the Liberals held at Wolcott, N. Y., their first great meeting. No one could hav foretold whether many or few would attend the proposed convention, or whether or no those who might be present would be in sympathy with the movement. But when the time came, to the great surprise and delight of the Liberals, they found their numbers in the Woloott Grove much larger and the people more enthusiastic than they had dared to hope for.

The next question that flashed upon the minds of the leaders of that project was, "Can we hav other meetings like this in different parts of the state, and in other states?" It was decided there that an effort should be made to get up such conventions in different parts of the country; and from that day to this New York has kept up its Freethought convention, while other states hav imitated her example to some extent; and, as a result, Freethought, like a tide, has flowed far and wide over the land.

Now, this matter of coming together in convention was no mere accident. The seed of Freethought had been sowed broadcast by the Liberal press for many years.

The Boston Investigator for half a century had been doing battle for mental freedom, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, though but recently in the field, was swinging its battle-ax with telling effect upon hoary-headed superstitions. The Wolcott Convention was the natural fruit of these labors. But while we delight to honor both of these grand papers, we cannot forget, and should not overlook, the service performed by our indefatigable colaborer, H. L. Green. It was he who agitated the matter regarding the convention several months previous to its session. And to him belongs the credit of keeping up that agitation every week in the newspapers, and by correspondence and lecturing until his efforts resulted in the success of that grand meeting. It was grand because we had never before had anything like it, and grand because so many similar conventions, in all parts of the country, hav followed in its wake.

H. L. Green worked hard, and without remuneration, for all he received was comparativly nothing for the service he rendered the cause. And although so poorly paid, he has, nevertheless, kept on in the same kind of work, and at the same price. Now it is because he has labored hard, in season and out of season, for Freethought, that I, for one, feel bound to honor and aid him as much as I can.

Brother Green is at present making every effort he can to insure success to our next convention, which will be held in August, and I most sincerely hope he may find the hearty co-operation and support of the Liberals of New York and other states, as he certainly deserves a more generous support than he has ever yet received. Liberal friends, let us lend him a hand—an open hand—and we shall find, when the Watkins convention is held, that our contributions hav been wisely bestowed.

Boston, Mass. W. S. BELL.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent to new subscribers three months for half a dollar. Let those who are interested in the spread of Freethought induce their friends to become trial subscribers.

WE hav received from Burnz & Co. a copy of the "Partial Corections of English Sspellings, approved by the English Philological Society." Mrs. Eliza B. Burnz advocates their adoption in an article which we take from the New York Independent. THE TRUTH SEEKER is recognized as one of the leading spelling reform papers.

Letters from Friends.

MODENA, June 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: As I see you hav the first volume of your book, "A Truth Seeker Around the World," finished, and ready for your subscribers, please find inclosed $5, and send the book by return mail, also one dollar for your paper for three months to two new subscribers, which I made a raise of last week. Please forward their papers by first mail.

Yours truly, H. B. DORRANCE.

DAYTON, June 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 for the Round-the-World books. I hav followed the faithful old man as he journeyed on through the rotten Old World, meeting with all kinds of obstacles in his way, even some of his old New York opponents following him and trying to destroy what little pleasures he might enjoy on his journey. But I am glad to see that he is more than a match for them, and that he is receiving great attention from the higher and most educated of the different countries through which he passes.

Respectfully yours, J. B. RILEY.

DESIGNED FOR THE EYE OF MR. J. PETTY.

SEDALIA, MO., June 20, 1882.

J. PETTY, LA CROSSE, WIS.: I hav just finished a careful perusal of your communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 28th, headed "A Talk With the Workingmen," and as I am one of the class addressed, I am prompted to respond to so disinterested an effort in my behalf.

As you appear to possess quite a fund of acquired information, I shall infer that you are not a workingman, for you hav put the brand of "fool" on every workingman.

Friend Petty, do you really think that the five thousand workingmen who weekly read THE TRUTH SEEKER never hav a thought above the thought of fools?

Do you sincerely believe that the hundred thousand readers of the Irish World are driveling fools?

Did it never occur to you that possibly a few of the three hundred thousand workingmen of the Greenback organization might possibly possess a "Petty" amount of information on the subject of finance as practically applied in the administration of the government?

Did the thought ever present itself to your mind that the thousands of workingmen who read THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, This World, Age, Iconoclast, and Liberal, and who hav read Voltaire, Hume, Paine, Volney, Bennett, Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, Underwood, Frances Wright, and Slenker, might also hav read the Old and New Testaments, and possibly committed to memory as much of their pages as brother Petty has kindly quoted for their instruction?

Did you ever realize that for every material comfort and luxury that you may enjoy you are indebted to the workingmen and workingwomen? The million palaces, with their beautiful surroundings, that deck the earth, the magnificent steamers that dot the surface of every sea, the priceless volumes that constitute the hoarded thought of past ages, the printing-press, the sewing machine, the telegraph, and the photograph, are each and all the product of the brain or brawn of the workingmen and workingwomen. Bro. Petty, I refer you to these results, and ask you, in all candor, were they conceived and brought forth by a mass of gaping fools?

Bro. Petty, if you might collect all the intelligence of civilized society in one aggregation, and could separate that which is practically useful to humanity from that which has little or no value to the race, I think I should be able to demonstrate, beyond a doubt, that all practical and useful intelligence is monopolized by the workingmen and workingwomen. Believing thus, I refuse to wear the collar you hav prepared for my neck.

I do not share in the opinion that ignorance is the mountain that stands between the workingmen and their rights. What is most needed, as I think, is ORGANIZATION—no amount of intelligence will effect any great object without proper organization. We hav formed our line of thought in isolation, and the consequence is there are no two who think alike; there is no cohesiv force, no right, no left, no center; no standard to rally around, no commander to direct our movements; we are simply a mob. Allow me to giv you a crude illustration of what little weight intelligence has when exercised individually, or independent of organization. D. M. Bennett and Patrick Ford are men of extensiv information; they claim to be reformers, and are accepted leaders in certain lines of thought; they are true friends of the oppressed. I wish to confer with these men in the interest of humanity. I request them to meet me at a certain place, and they promptly present themselvs, and I open the conference thus: "Brother Bennett, what do you consider the basic principle of reform?" Brother Bennett promptly answers, "Mental Liberty." Brother Ford remarked that Bennett's answer was suggested by that imp of hell, Infidelity. I turn to brother Ford, and ask, "Brother Ford, what do you consider the basic principle of reform?" Promptly came this answer, "Free Lands."

There sat Infidelity on one side of the room, self-possessed, self-reliant, cold, with no disposition to conciliate. On the other side of the room sat Christianity, sweating under the weight of the mantle of charity, with no disposition to extend even the hem of the mantle to the other side of the room. At this juncture, as with one voice, they inquired of me what I considered the basic principle of reform. I answered, "Love for justice and humanity." Brother Bennett started for the door on his side of the room, and Brother Ford started for the door on his side of the room, each exclaiming, as they strode away, "Too indefinit—too indefinit."

The conference was a failure, and why? For the reason that our education has been too individualistic, while it should hav been cosmopolitan. We must merge the individual into that of brotherhood—we must become welded together into one solid phalanx. Thus organized we might dictate the terms to our oppressors; we should be invincible. Unorganized, we are compelled to paddle our own canoe; organized, we may float in a magnificent steam palace. I hav taken the Irish World for three years and a-half, and I am not acquainted with its equal in ability, zeal, or honest purpose, as an exponent of the oppressed, yet I hav no sympathy with its religion, its God, its Christ, its Mary, or its saints. If Patrick Ford had not this one weakness, I should be as apt to fall down and worship him as any object I know of. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly three years, and value it highly; am pleased to notice that it givs space occasionally to the workingman's cause; I hope the space will increase, as the labor question is increasing in importance daily, and it is destined to be the question for the next decade.

Brother Petty, you hint that "A Talk With the Workingmen" might be your last appeal to them. To me this sounds strange from a man who has well-defined convictions of right and wrong. Hav the courage of your convictions. and repeat the assault so long as there appears a Shylock in the field. Let the banker, the land-grabber, the lawyer, the priest, the great and small gamblers, and the most contemptible dogs in the kennel—the political jobbers—know that a day of reckoning awaits them in the near future, when not only justice for the future, but restitution for the past, will be demanded.

Brother Petty, I will strike with you blow for blow against the whisky and tobacco fiends. Twelve hours per day labor upon a shoe-bench leaves me but little time to devote to the pen, but I feel anxious to bear my testimony against the evils that afflict humanity. Truly yours, A WORKINGMAN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Startling, terrible facts are portrayed in that able letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 27th. Reader, please peruse that article again, and then ask, Will not every truth seeker exclaim, What is the remedy?

Mr. Bennett speaks against the oppression of the laboring classes in every country through which he traveled; and in his honest, brave search for truth will welcome to his columns full discussions upon this subject. Now, I propose that those readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who hav a remedy for the evils spoken of in Mr. Pettey's letter, ventilate it in a short article in our glorious Freethought organ.

O dear TRUTH SEEKER friends, I beseech you to seriously consider this important subject. Do you know that our nation is doomed to destruction unless labor reform triumphs? Do you know that aristocracy has caused the downfall of every nation which has been destroyed? For this there is a philosophical and physiological reason. The brains and bodies of aristocrats become weakened for the want of proper useful exercise; the brains and bodies of the laborers by overwork. Thus both classes degenerate until a nation is ruined and many arts and sciences lost.

Now, the remedy is for all people to do their share of the world's work. How shall we bring this about? By industrial organization! We laborers must unite, own our own business, and cease working for aristocrats, hav our own currency, and cease using the Shylock banker's money. We will thus bless them as well as ourselvs, for they will be healthier and happier if they perform some useful labor. The workers of the world are now arising to the truth that labor is honorable. Oh! may it be freed, not by the sword, but by the pen! For a peaceful solution of this great question let us hope.

Yours for all truth, SADA BAILEY.

INGALLS, LINCOLN CO., KAN., June 15, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I read a great many papers of all kinds, and my judgment would be that those who would pronounce Liberalism dead or defunct, to say the least, are not keeping up with the times; to be short, they don't know what they are talking about. They may be able to talk very learnedly upon a variety of subjects, but their judgment in regards to Liberalism is not worth any more than that of some enthusiastic Christian of the Protestant type who thinks Catholicism is dead. If B. F. Underwood had said that Liberalism—the grandest ism of the age, the concentration and crystallization of all isms—was gradually warming into life, he would hav been far nearer right. Some Spiritualists, no doubt, would differ with me about its being the grandest ism of the age; but if they would take the second thought, they would see that one must first become very liberal before he will giv Spiritualism its due consideration.

Once I called myself a Christian, and said I believed all the Bible taught, but that was before I had learned to read much; having great anxiety to get my soul saved, of course I believed, for I had been told that that was the proper way; but my organization was such that reading was one of the greatest of pleasures, and gradually my mind has changed into what I call true Liberalism. I hav read a score of Bibles, and found gems of thought in all of them, also much that is crude, and the Christian Bible is no exception. Well may it be called the book of books, teaching as sublime morals as ever were taught, and at the same time teaching as damnable doctrins as the brain of man could conceive. And here is what Liberalism does for a man: It sets him free, it teaches him to discover between husk and chaff, to accept of a truth wherever he finds it, whether in the Bible or THE TRUTH SEEKER, to think and believe as reason teaches him, to freely speak his honest thoughts, and to grant unto others all the rights and privileges he claims for himself. Here is only one thing out of a thousand that one has got to believe in order to believe the Bible. Let any one read the various accounts of the numbering of the children of Israel. He will readily see that about ten million of people went into a country one-sixth or one-seventh the size of Kansas. This would make a very dense population; and we are told in Deut. vii, 1, that there were seven nations more mighty than they already there. Then there were in this little country about thirty little nations. The Philistines was one of the little nations; and we read in 1 Sam. xiii, 5, that they went to fight Israel, and they had thirty thousand chariots, and footmen like the sand on the seashore in multitude, besides a body of horsemen; and this is only a little nation. We read of little fights where one, two, three, four, and even five hundred thousand were slain on a side; and after one of the little nations had fought and lost hundreds of thousands one day, they were ready to fight and lose as many the next day, and the third day kill a few hundred thousand of their enemy; but this was in the days when wonders were heaped upon wonders. Liberals generally look upon such stories in the Bible as idle tales. But when they read "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you," they are willing to acknowledge that it is good, it springs from a noble heart; all Liberals should love it, they should think of it every day, and try to make every action of their life correspond to it. It was taught by the greatest sages of earth. But what man can read David's prayer for his ememies—"Set thou a wicked man over him; and let Satan be at his right hand. When he shall be judged, let him be condemned; and let his prayer become sin. Let his days be few; and let another take his office. Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. Let his children be continually vagabonds and beg; let them also seek their bread out of their desolate place. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath, and let the storms spoil his labor. Let there be none to extend mercy unto him, neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children."—and say it's good; it comes from a man after God's own heart? Surely, he that can do it, is lost to all sense of honor.

I look upon thousands who believe these dogmas with pity instead of contempt. Thousands of Christian women are in as great a darkness as the women of Utah, and men, too. But Liberalism is gradually doing its noble work. Martin Luther lived to see Protestantism flash over Europe, the pope tremble on his throne, and lose all his vast dominions except Italy and Spain; but in a few years the church had regained it all, besides adding much. It was because she had the most perfect organization. Throughout the world the pope has 1,000 bishops, who wear the miter of the ruler. These bishops hav 250,060 priests to help them pull the wool over the eyes, and the stamps out of the pockets, of 225,000,000 of ignorant dupes. Then there are thousands of other organizations to combat. But Liberalism is the ism for the emergency. She's not dead, nor in her last throes. Sensible Liberals know before the accomplishment of a revolution of this kind that the people must hav time to adapt themselvs to the new order of things. All truths hav been very slow in gaining ground, and the very last thing one will part with is gods, devils, and ghosts. Liberalism says deeds, not creeds; humanity, and not Christianity; salvation for all denominations; justice instead of faith, saltpeter, and brimstone; love to mankind, not to God and ghosts. Liberalism teaches justice to all, favors to none. This is simply grand. This is not a Christian nation. Christ had nothing to do with making it, and it seems to me that Christians would be ashamed to claim a descendant from the assassin and polygamist, David, on one side, and the prostitute of Uriah on the other, as the son of God.

A. BUTTERFIELD.

LIBERAL, MO., June 13, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.50, and employ as follows: $1 to my credit for THE TRUTH SEEKER, 25 cents for a "Liberal Hymn Book," and 25 cents for our old hero, Jeremiah Hacker. I wish I could do more for him and you both, but it is not in my power to do so at present; but I look for better times in the near future. My subscription expired

June 1st, and I hav felt bad ever since for reading a paper not paid for; but it was my misfortune and not my fault.

Well, Mr. Editor, I will tell you something which is very strange to me. I am only a three-year-old Liberal, although fifty-six years of age. Since I became a Liberal, I hav had a desire to belong to the Liberal League, hence my move here; and what was my surprise in learning that there were none. One was organized last winter, I am told, but it is no more; whether it died a natural death, or by other means, I do not know. We claim we are living in the only town in the United States that has a Liberal foundation; but where is the Liberal foundation, if not in the National Liberal League? Some one says it would not benefit us any more. Are we so selfish that we can think only of ourselvs; hav we not a cause to fight for, or do we intend to confine our strength to the citadel already won, and leave the balance of the Liberals do the best they can against odds? Well, no; we ought to organize—giv the chance to our enemies to count noses, if nothing else; counting noses has won more than one battle, as our Liberal voters saw last spring at our school election. But I must close. Wishing our captain home soon in good health, I remain, Yours, JOSEPH A. HALLOTTE.

TOWN CREEK, ALA., June 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I here inclose you a small subscription for your valuable paper. Times are very close at present in these parts. When my time is up again, I think we will be in a better condition financially, and, possibly, religiously. If there be anything in the efficacy of prayer, I presume I will do well (or good). I understand that I am a special subject of prayer by my Christian friends in this part of the moral vinyard.

A certain minister told me that he had spent time enough upon his knees in prayer for the salvation of my soul to make bread to do his family for a year. Said I: "Parson, perhaps you did not exercise faith. Also, if there be a God, and he made me and put me here, he did so without consulting my feelings; and more, if he sees cause to damn me throughout all eternity, because I can't believe in certain religious dogmas, he will hav to go ahead; I can't see what he will make by it."

He said that was blasphemy. 'Tis a horrible thing with some people here to think of a man going off into Infidelity. They hav been in darkness so long, they can't bear the light. I imagin the light that has been shining through THE TRUTH SEEKER recently will be like bread cast upon the waters—taken up many days hence. My best wishes for your much esteemed paper. Yours, etc., W. J. BEENE.

BISHOP CREEK, COL., June 10, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received a letter from D. M. Bennett, saying he was here on this coast, the first news I had of his arrival, as I am so far from any telegraph communication. If the railroad through this valley was completed I would go out to some point on his ronte and see him and hear him lecture. I hav been reading the first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and wonder how he found time to rest his brain enough to write so much in a hurry or under depression of spirits, as is often the case with travelers, but with the ease and elaborate description of one viewing a panorama passing before him in a quiet room. Only once or twice he speaks of a little discomfort, such as his getting nearly drowned in the Jordan, and of his ride of a hot day in an ox-cart to see some caves in Siam. But, to me, the most interesting portion of his observations is what he sees below the surface of external life—the various religions of the world and their effects upon different peoples and nations. It appears plainly that all these mythological ideas and forms of worship, with their priests and costly cathedrals, hav been like an incubus upon the minds of men, retarding their normal development in reason and true science, misleading man in regard to his true relations in the universe.

There seems to be more real knowledge in Occultism than in all the theisms ever taught; and if it were divested of its too severe asceticism, and had more of Spiritualism, more of the blending of the thought and life of the orient and occident, the world might become the wiser and better for it. There are many pearls of truth deeply hidden in occult lore, but few there be who find them.

L. HUTCHINSON.

P. S.—I think with many others that the present calendar should be changed to accord with the progress of the age, and I would suggest, if some one else has not already done so, that E.M.—era of man—should be adopted in place of A.D. I shall so date my letters henceforth. L. H.

PLAINWELL, MICH.

MR. EDITOR: Among the many agents at work for your valuable paper we find C. S. Rowley, a veteran in the cause of Freethought, a man of experience, and withal an earnest, energetic agent, who makes friends for THE TRUTH SEEKER wherever he goes. As a speaker, his fund of knowledge must place him among those who are able to instruct the masses and point the way to progress and reform.

His poems are in many points fine, breathing the sentiments of original thought and culture. Anxious to labor more ardently in the cause of human rights, he will be glad to make engagements to lecture before such societies as desire his service, and can be addressed at Lansing, Mich. Mr. Rowley has grown gray in the cause of liberty, but does not seem to weary of well doing, and is still anxious that his last days may find him a standard-bearer in the field of liberty, and his sun set after many a well fought day. Keep him at work, for he is sowing the seeds of truth, which will bear fruit in the years to come, and furnish food for the hungry. L. E. DRAKE.

PEORIA, ILL., June 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find 48 cents for the postage on my Round-the-World books.

Very truly yours, SAMUEL WEBBER.

PRACTICAL THEOSOPHY FOR AMERICAN INDIANS.

PHENIX, OR., May 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The great success of the Theosophical Association in harmonizing the different castes in India is suggestiv of what might be done in America, where millions of dollars hav been spent to convert heathens abroad, and where vastly more has been spent to destroy our Indians at home, all of which under Col. Olcott's Theosophy, could hav been saved. He does not tell the Buddhists and Brahmans that their religion is all wrong, and affirm, like missionaries, that Christianity is all right, but appeals to their instincts and interests to judge for themselvs as to the natural right or wrong of both systems.

It is not because the Indians are savage or incapable of civilized habits that they hav so long refused to adopt them, but because of the blighting influence of whisky, avarice, and lust with which they are associated. They hav been too often treated more like brutes unfit to liv than like human beings with inalienable rights equal to the white man. But thanks to the law of progress and the spirit of the age for the following report of an Indian school in Washington Territory, published in the New North West, by Mrs. Euniway, editor:

"Here are collected about a hundred young Indians, ranging in years from five or six to twenty, and all as well fed, well clothed, healthy, and happy, and, for anything we can discover to the contrary, as intelligent-looking as an equal number of of young Anglo-Saxons of both sexes in any school in Oregon. And yet these children were taken but recently from the wild prairies, wilder woods, and wildest mountain gorges, and brought here in blankets and moccasins, with unkempt, uncut hair, and destitute of all civilized training. Already they hav learned to sing like nightingales and work like beavers. They learn their lessons promptly and with average readiness, and so seldom break a rule that severe disciplin is unknown and unnecessary. The boys are learning to make boots and shoes, build houses, make furniture, shoe horses, and cultivate the soil. They dig stumps, level grounds, raise vegetables, play ball, and run races; they read and study, sing and pray, and attend meetings and lectures. In short, they are learning white men's virtues without their vices by acquiring white men's industry without their idleness. The girls are learning to make men's and women's clothing, darn stockings, sew on buttons, wash, cook, churn, iron, wash dishes, set tables, entertain callers, keep their rooms in order and superintend households in detail, and, like the boys, are delving deeply into book lessons with equally gratifying success. They are also permitted to play at regular hours, the smaller ones taking as much comfort with their dolls as the petted young daughters of any white mother in the land."

Similar reports come from every Indian school in which they hav fair treatment. Surely this appeals to Spiritualists and to the Liberals of all parties to stand up more prominently for the rights of the Indian. It should not be forgotten that it is from that race that we hav derived our continent, our Indian corn, and two (Randolph and Jefferson) of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

If Liberals fail to recognize the Indian race as equal fellow-heirs to freedom in religion and to the enjoyment of a common country, they may depend upon it that the advocates of Sunday laws and of God in the Constitution never will. But they must help to disarm the Indians as proposed by the Secretary of the Interior, help to support standing armies, wars, and missionaries, and appropriate $250,000, as proposed by Senator Hoar, for the education of Indian children, all of which is a needless expense.

Only proclaim Col. Olcott's Theosophy as a practical truth, and the army may disband, and the so-called "savages" will hav ample resources of their own and soon become an element of strength and the glory of our country. JOHN BEESON.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., June 10, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $2.50—$1 to Jeremiah Hacker, $1 to Liberal Orphan Home, "Fruits of Philosophy," 25 cents; "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," 15 cents; and ten cents' worth of leaflets that tell how the inspired books jumped upon the table.

I hav no news to tell you this time except that my brother, S. M. Graam, an outspoken Infidel, has been elected superintendent of the Providentia school district Sunday-school. The Christians started a Sunday-school in that place, but it has now fallen into a kind of weekly sociable; nobody to pray.

I hope every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will use the new date, 282. Farewell, W. H. H. GRAAM.

SALT LAKE, June 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find fifty cents in stamps, for which send TRUTH SEEKER to address given.

Please commence with the first of Mr. Bennett's letter on "Occultism."

P.S.—I am afraid the Liberals here are not united enough to giv Mr. Bennett the fitting reception which he deserves. The assumed leader of the Spiritualists and Liberals is reported as saying that he did not know D. M. Bennett, and did not wish to. But perhaps some other man may arise in time and supercede Mr. E. L. T. Harrison, and a fitting tribute of respect may yet be given the returning hero. Many would like to see and hear him, but drifting sands seldom meet from whence they started.

The apostate Mormon is the same individual still, and generally has the same conceit that his particular ideas of Liberalism are right, and is Liberal only so long as any one will think or act as he wishes. Hence Liberalism is very much divided in Utah. When Mr. Charles Bright was here last winter there was an attempt to form a Liberal society, but Mr. Harrison announced that he did not want Liberals of a certain stamp, and I think it has all fallen to pieces. Mr. Harrison is an apostate Mormon from Spiritual phenomena, and principally follows the lead of Col. Bundy in his Liberalism.

Yours, W. R. FRINK.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., June 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I would report that the State Liberal League of Illinois, Auxiliary No. 16, National Liberal League held its first annual convention in Schroeder's Opera House, in this city, on Saturday and Sunday, June 3d and 4th. Considering the inclemency of the weather, as it rained nearly all of the time during both days of the convention, I think I may report that we had a successful session.

The most unpleasant feature of the meeting was a lack of attendance on the part of the charter and older members of the State League. But I take it for granted that they hav their own excuses for not being on hand to take in the important work that we, as Liberals, hav before us. And I cannot help feeling that those who did not attend are greatly losers by their absence. Prof. W. F. Jamieson gave us three of the most stirring, able, and convincing addresses it has ever been my good fortune to listen to, besides several short, cutting, and conclusiv replies to some of our orthodox neighbors, who, being present, were disposed to denounce us and our movement as ungodly and blasphemous, rather than attempt to giv any sensible reason why our principles should not prevail in this and every other country. All of Prof. Jamieson's speeches were received with hearty applause. And I, as secretary of the State League, am under lasting obligations to Prof. Jamieson for the noble and generous manner in which he came to my rescue, in helping me out of he financial embarassment I was under for rent, printing, and other incidental expenses connected with getting up and running this convention. And I hope every member of the state of Illinois, and as many more as can, who hav a spare dollar, will send him a yearly subscription. F. F. FOLLET, Sec. S. L.

RECEIVING recently a note from a friend, asking information about Daniel Tuttle, of Poplar, Crawford county, Ohio, we forwarded the note to friend Garwood, who is conducting the Hacker relief fund, with the request that he would investigate, if he could, the facts and report, so that if Tuttle is a proper object of Liberal sympathy he might share with the venerable Hacker the hearts and purses of the charitably disposed in our ranks. He now writes us:

BALTIMORE, June 25, 1882.

FRIEND EUGENE: I hav got the information I told you I was in trail after, respecting old Mr. Tuttle, and, if possible, it is a worse case than that of Hacker. The postmaster of the place tells me about it in the following language:

"They are both very old, and almost helpless. They are depending entirely on the charity of the good people of the neighborhood and friends from abroad. They hav no way of earning a living. They are considered worthy of all the assistance they can get; without assistance they would be obliged to be taken to the county infirmary, which would be considered quite a disgrace to the old people."

He then tells me I can use his letter and name if I choose. Now, what are we going to do about it? I feel that something ought to be done to help them out. Our people move so slow. There are, though, some noble souls, who come right square up to the work; the fault is there is not enough of such. Elmina is trying to do something for the Tuttles through the Iconoclast, but as yet I don't know what her success is. She is away from home, and at a disadvantage in working. If the Liberals had their hospitals, and old men's and old women's homes, it would be a different case; but they hav not, and its a shame there is no better provision for just such cases as Hacker and Tuttle. And yet, if one hundred out of every thousand who profess to be Liberals would giv the small pittance of 25 cents per month, it would amply relieve several such cases as these two.

Yours respectfully, C. GARWOOD, Box 878.

We suggest that Mr. Garwood be made custodian of the Liberal Relief Fund for these people, unless it is preferred to remit directly to the parties interested, and let them report to Mr. Garwood, who will publish lists of donors once a month. If Liberalism has come to stay, and Liberals' love of humanity is not all pretension, it is time we organized some practical work for humanity. It is much better to feed the poor than to giv to God, who does not need it, and a barrel of flour is better than the blood of Christ to conjure by. When the aged Mr. Hacker, and the still older Mr. Tuttle, and their faithful wives, are laid to rest, it will be a consolation to know that their last days were made comfortable by the contributions of the true friends of humanity—noble-hearted Infidels.

An Interesting Letter from London.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

One of the benefits accruing to those who hav "found Christ," to use a cant phrase, has just been exemplified in the case of a young woman who committed suicide by drowning last week. She had lately joined one of the sects of the church known as the "Bible Christians," and according to the evidence of a witness at the inquest, those who had become members of this terrestrial branch of the kingdom of heaven could murder either themselvs or others or commit any other crimes, small or great, without forfeiting their through ticket to glory. This unfortunate woman was no sooner assured that her name was entered in the "lamb's book of life" than she expressed great anxiety to "see Jesus," and accordingly took the shortest cut she could find to attain so desirable an object. As she left a letter behind detailing her intention and reason for same, there is no getting over the fact that it was a clear case of religious monomania, and yet for all that we do not find the orthodox and respectable newspapers saying a word against the system that can bring about such a circumstance. But if it could hav been shown in any way that this victim of priestcraft had ever read a Freethought publication or heard a Freethought lecture, such a howl would hav been set up all over the country, and the pernicious effects of Infidelity would hav been displayed in the most vivid colors. If they could only get hold of one case of the sort, if but a very small one, how it would be magnified and altered to do duty in various ways. But, unfortunately for them, the Freethinkers are about the most respectable members of the community, the salt of the earth in fact, and a good, genuin case of criminality cannot be discovered amongst them.

The May meetings in London hav brought up deputations from the elect of all parts, and the black-coated and white-tied brigade has mustered in force. The different casts of countenance hav been quite a study. Although there are many types of refinement amongst the faces, these are in a very small minority. Sensuality, greed, low cunning, and hypocrisy, together with stupidity, may be plainly perceived in the majority; the stupidity is most plainly seen in the faces of the sheep, the shepherds monopolizing the other qualities. The same old song has been sung at most of the gatherings. So much money received for the good work, so much more spent, so much due to the treasurer, and the deficiency must be made up or the Lord's vinyard will lack laborers. Accordingly the hat is passed round and comes back well filled; the givers are lending to the Lord and laying up treasures in heaven, so it is all right, and thus the game is kept up year by year. Some tradesmen find it a good advertisment to giv a large sum, as their names are printed and published with the amount of their donation. Others hav perpetrated a good big swindle, a bogus company or bank, or done a good thing in electric shares. Others make immense profits by grinding down those who work for them to the lowest point of remuneration. However dishonestly they gain their wealth, they fancy they make up for their rascality by doing something handsome for a missionary society. In the words of the Spanish proverb, they "steal a pig and giv the trotters in God's name," and hav thereby made their calling and election sure.

The Salvation Army was, of course, not going to be left out in the cold, so they had a series of holiness meetings at Exeter Hall and other places. It was stated that at one of these performances Booth made a powerful speech, with the usual finish, money was needed, and he so worked upon the emotions of his deluded followers that gold, notes, and checks were handed up to the platform aggregating nearly £4,000. When the supply slackened off and no more seemed to be forthcoming, he remarked, "The usual collection will now be made," and a further sum of over £500 was netted. For cool impudence and success, this man certainly stands in the front rank, consequently he is respected and envied by the other churches. They cannot sit still and see all the plunder going to an outsider, and as they are unable to stop it, hav resolved to try and get a share. The archbishop of York has given it out as his opinion that the army is doing a great work for the Lord, and that it ought to hav the countenance and assistance of the established church. The Quakers are also of the same opinion, and other dissenting bodies are looking upon it favorably, now they see what a good paying concern it is. The "general" will probably make use of them for his own purposes, but is scarcely the man to go halves with what he gets. I will not now further encroach on your space, but remain, Fraternally yours, J. D.

Stir Up the Enthusiasm.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

"Similar Cases," in your last paper, by Edward W. Chamberlain, was good. Stir up the enthusiasm. Mr. Bennett should be given a cordial reception at every point that he stops at on the route, from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Amazing combinations hav been made to crush the veteran editor, and every effort of his enemies in this direction has acted like a kicking gun. What are the facts? When the whole country lay, so to speak, at the feet of the members of the Vice Society and its agent, trembling with fear, Mr. Bennett courageously said, I will defy them. I will sell the condemned book. I will break the back of the Inquisition. He sold the book; he sent it by mail openly and avowedly. He was arrested. To convict him the prejudices of a Christian jury were awakened by bringing in charges and insinuations which had nothing to do with the trial—allegations not contained in the indictment. After conviction and sentence, when two hundred thousand free Americans clamored for his pardon, and President Hayes was about to accede to the demands of justice, still new charges were trumped up to keep him in prison. Chickering Hall gave its answer to the question whether such outrageous meddling with a man's personal affairs would be tolerated by a free people when a question of national concern was involved in Mr. Bennett's return to his family and business.

Now the more that his enemies can show that Mr. Bennett is a "very bad man," the more conspicuous will it appear that the American people will not in the long run permit the least interference with the freedom of the press. If they are disposed to leave Mr. Bennett with nothing else to stand upon for his popularity but his championship of this one principle, then will the liberty-loving men and women of this continent gather about the old hero and giv him all praise for his courage and manliness in standing up against church and state for free thought, free speech, free printing, and free mails. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant took the same course in England, and the people gathered around them and they won. Our battle is not altogether ended, but we hav but to sustain Mr. Bennett to carry away the war-worn banner.

In justice to Mr. E. H. Heywood, Flora and Josie Tilton, and a very few others, it should be added that they, too, defied Comstock and his backers. Perhaps it should not be said that the whole country was paralyzed with terror. A few heroic souls stood firmly on the very top of the parapet and helped to fight the battle. But when Bennett fell in the encounter Mr. Heywood and a few others had recovered from the wounds they sustained as advanced skirmishers, and the attention of freemen fell upon Mr. Bennett as the standard-bearer in the fight. The evidence that the battle is not over is shown in the late suppression of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." The terrorized condition of the general book trade is exhibited in the immediate surrender of Osgood & Co. Heywood raises the standard of revolt by advertising and selling Walt Whitman's book. But when may we hear that the wealthy and "highly respectable" publishers bid defiance to the Vice Society by openly selling the condemned work?

To help awaken the whole American people to the dangers which confront them, let Bennett hav a triumphal march from the peaceful waters of the Pacific to the roaring surf of the Atlantic. He has been honored at every step of his progress in his trip around the world. Let his countrymen not be behind in their readiness to wash off the mud his enemies and the enemies of a free press hav heaped upon him. E. B. Foote, Sr., M.D.

New York, June 17, 1882.

The "Index" and Lucy Stone.

I hav just finished reading a report in the Index of the New England Woman Suffrage Convention held in Boston, May 29th. The article is from the pen of Charles Ellis, who begins by saying that "the meeting was called to order by Mrs. H. B. Blackwell (Lucy Stone)." Now, I was not aware that there was, or is, any Mrs. H. B. Blackwell. I am familiar with the name and life-long labors of Lucy Stone, but hav not been informed of the fact, if fact it be, that this heroic advocate of woman's rights has so far stultified herself as to assume a badge of servitude by changing a name, celebrated the country over, for that of the gentleman with whom she is matrimonially associated.

Is it possible that Mr. Ellis has purposely designated the lady in this manner that he may prevent the readers of the Index from learning the fact that Lucy Stone does not countenance, theoretically or practically, the prevailing custom of marriage, which makes woman the property of man? As the National Ballot Box so aptly puts it: "This changing of names is a part of the old slave code under which women hav lived. During slavery a negro was Cuffee Jones, Cuffee Smith, or Cuffee Brown, just as he changed masters. When a woman, by marriage, takes a master, or by remarriage, changes her master, she, in like turn, is expected to change her name." And a correspondent adds: "The custom of women writing themselvs down as Mrs. John Doe, or Mrs. Gov. Brown, or Mrs. Acting-Lieutenant Stebbins is enough to make a horse laugh."

It is time that this matter of badging women as serfs were done away with, and that she hav sufficient backbone to retain her own name and her own individuality, no matter who or what her husband may be.

We hav reason to be proud of Lucy Stone and Julia E. Smith, of Glastonbury, Conn.—the latter of whom, notwithstanding an age which might naturally be expected to bring conservatism—has also been consistent and brave enough to insist upon being Julia E. Smith, notwithstanding her recent union with Mr. Parker. In the Woman's Herald of Industry I find a letter, closing in this manner: "Mr. Parker is much interested in your bright readable paper, and joins me in wishing you success. Cordially yours, Julia E. Smith." And in a letter from Mrs. Stone in regard to a statement in the Chicago Times that she had had difficulty in retaining her name, she wrote me: "All that has been said by the newspapers about the refusal to register me as Lucy Stone has not a particle of foundation. I hav never had any trouble worth mentioning, about keeping my name. I assumed my right, and it has been respected"—by all except this Index reporter, who saw fit to violate that right; a violation which, it appears to me, justly calls for this rebuke from Yours truly, Mrs. H. S. Lake.

Obituary.

Charles W. Frankel, aged 71, passed suddenly to his eternal rest Sunday evening, May 28th, while some of his family were attending our League.

Mr. Frankel was born in Stockholm, Sweden, residing there and in Germany until 1852, when he came to this country. Instinctivly holding Liberal views in high esteem from early boyhood, he became more pronounced in his convictions as he developed mentally, firmly withholding from all religious sects throughout his life. Quite a controversalist, he enjoyed "cornering" his Christian friends or ministers in religious disputation. Ever indefatigable in his endeavors to place his family in a more comfortable sphere than he had experienced, he several times carried on quite extensiv furniture factories, was thrice reduced by fire, and twice by dishonest partners. His life was full of generous deeds, considerate acts, and domestic harmony, always endeavoring to assist oppressed humanity. An Abolitionist, Socialist, Atheist, those who so often prophesied his death-bed repentance are probably satisfied that a brave and benevolent Infidel can die without recanting. His children will cherish the memory of an affectionate father and an honest man. Prof. Baumgras, our vice-president, spoke at the family residence, previous to the remains being taken to LaPorte, Ind., for interment, where Henry Goodman, editor of the Journal, pronounced an impressiv oration over his grave.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at the League Sunday, June 4th.

Whereas, For the first time since our organization, we are forcibly reminded of mankind's destiny, dissolution, in the passing away of C. W. Frankel, the honored parent of our esteemed members, Charles A., Wm. F., Theodore O., and Louise Frankel,

Resolved, That in the severing of those tender ties we offer the stricken family our most fervent sympathy and condolence, feeling that they cannot but grieve at the severity of this sudden separation from a devoted husband and father, whose memory they will ever cherish.

Resolved, That while in his demise we recognize the departure of a brave apostle of rationalism, the loss to the Liberal community of an intelligent student and thinker, society an honest, energetic citizen, his associates a faithful friend, instead of vain regrets we rather rejoice that he peacefully passed away in the firm conviction of the soundness of the principles in which he lived—the satisfaction of a well-spent life, having no terrors for the future, nor no regrets for the past.

Resolved, That the cause of radicalism has lost an earnest advocate in one who consistently educated a respected family to uphold, above everything, the lofty emblem of Freethought.

E. A. Stevens,
Sec. Chicago Liberal League.

To Liberals and Leagues.

The National Liberal League is organized for the purpose of securing universal mental liberty to ourselvs and our posterity. Its motto is "Justice for all; privilege for none." It is battling against tremendous odds. It finds everywhere opposed to it the compact and magnificently-disciplined army of the church.

Princely donations swell the coffers of this enemy of liberty. The hard hand of toil and the delicate one of wealth alike drop into her treasury the dollars and dimes by which to keep the machinery in motion to turn out a "race of slaves." At the instigation of this power our "Leaves of Grass" are cut down and cast out; our "Cupid's Yokes" are made to cripple the supple limbs of liberty; our Sabbath sunshine is darkened by the black coats of her executioners; and if one of the victims givs vent to his indignation in "thoughts that breathe and words that burn," our statutes of blasphemy are invoked to save Almighty God from the vengeance of the people whose wrath his servants hav provoked.

Yet, notwithstanding all these things, you are not everywhere aroused. Our League treasury is not plethoric with the means to keep an army in the field. Our scouts are exposed to the vicissitudes of want and weather. We cannot salary our officers nor equip our army.

This ought not be. If we value what the revolution wrested from kingcraft, a free country; if we hate what the rebellion overthrew, slavery; if we love liberty and adore justice, let us at once, each and all, deposit our dollars and dimes in the treasury of the National League, and send in our names one hundred thousand strong to swell the ranks of freedom, and voice again, with added emphasis, the Demands of Liberalism at the next League Congress. I appeal to every League and every Liberal in the land. Mrs. H. S. Lake,
Ch. Fin. Com. N. L. L.

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,
A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.

The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of he work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

DEITY ANALYZED AND THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attacks the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

A Short History of the Bible,

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He givs, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts. he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

BEING

Six Interviews with the Famous Orator on Six Sermons by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, to which is added

A TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

Stenographically reported by I. NEWTON BAKER.

Printed in bold, clear type, on heavy, tinted paper, and handsomely bound in muslin, with heavy boards, beveled edges, gilt top, Octavo, 443 pages.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on 'Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, together with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts in the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. As a piece of satire, with earnest purpose, this production stands alone, and in the literature of Freethought has not its equal.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposite a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Gems of Thought.

If I am right, thy grace impart
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, oh, teach my heart
To find the better way.
—Pope's Universal Prayer.

A MAN'S thoughts must be going. Whilst he is awake the working of his mind is as constant as the beating of his pulse. He can no more stop the one than the other. Hence if our thoughts hav nothing to act upon they act upon themselvs. They acquire a corrosiv quality. They become in the last degree irksome and tormenting. Wherefore that sort of equitable engagement which takes up the thoughts sufficiently, yet so as to leave them capable of turning to anything more important, as occasions offer or require, it is a most invaluable blessing. And if the industrious be not sensible of the blessing, it is for no other reason than because they hav never experienced, or rather suffered, the want of it.—Paley.

A MILLSTONE and the human heart are driven ever round,
If they hav nothing else to grind, they must them-themselvs be ground. —Longfellow.

JACOB, who was a good hand at a bargain, makes his terms with Jehovah in a thoroughly business-like spirit. "If God will be with me," etc. (Gen. xxxviii, 20-22), the adoption of Jehovah as Jacob's God being thus entirely dependent on the performance by that deity of his share in the contract. Sometimes it is qualntly suggested that were the worshiper in the place of God he would not neglect the interests of his devotees. Thus the author of a hymn in the Rig Veda, addressing the "gods of the tempest" exclaims, "If you, sons of Prisni, were mortals, and your worshiper an immortal, then never should your praise be unwelcome, like a deer in pasture grass, nor should he go in the path of Yama." Another poet givs this hint, "Were I, Indra, like thee, the sole lord of wealth, the singer of my praises should be rich in cattle." —Amberley's Analysis.

WHEN Hercules turned the purifying river into King Augea's stables, I hav no doubt the confusion that resulted was considerable all around; but I think it was not Hercules's blame; it was some other's blame. The Reformation might bring what results it liked when it came, but the Reformation simply could not help coming. To all popes and pope's advocates, expostulating, lamenting, and accusing, the answer of the world is: Once for all, your popehood has become untrue. No matter how good it was, how good you say it is, we cannot believe it; the light of our whole mind, given us to walk by from heaven above, finds it henceforth a thing unbelievable. We will not believe it, we will not try to believe; we dare not! The thing is untrue; we were traitors against the giver of all truth; if we don't pretend to think it true away with it; let whatsoever likes come in place of it; with it we can hav no farther trade.—Carlyle.

HAPPY the man, who, studying nature's laws,
Through known effects can trace the secret cause—
His mind possessing in a quiet state,
Fearless of fortune, and resigned to fate!
And happy, too, is he who decks the bowers
Of sylvans, and adores the rural powers—
Whose mind unmoved, the bribes of courts can see,
Their gilded baits, and purple slavery—
Nor hopes the people's praise, nor fears their frown. —Dryden's Virgil.

THE cure of grief and of other disorders of the mind is one and the same, in that they are all voluntary and founded on opinion; we take them on ourselvs because it seems right to do so. Philosophy undertakes to eradicate this error, as the rest of all our evils. Let us, therefore, surrender ourselvs to be instructed by it, and suffer ourselvs to be cured; for whilst these evils hav possession of us we not only cannot be happy, but we cannot be in our right mind. We must either deny that reason can effect anything, while, on the other hand, nothing can be done right without reason; or else, since philosophy depends on the deductions of reason, we must seek from her, if we would be good or happy, every help and assistance for living well and happy.—Cicero.

How charming is divine philosophy,
Not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose,
But musical as in Apollo's lute,
And a perpetual feast of nectared sweets
Where no crude surfeit reigns.
—Milton's Comas.

THERE are souls so dull and passionless that they hav but a languid pleasure or a languid pain in any personal experience. And there are those who envy such their own disposition. But I prefer the alternating hills and valleys to these level prairies, wave they with whatsoever wealth of corn, bloom they with whatsoever flowers. I sicken of the sea's unruffled calm, and I am only myself when it begins to heap itself in whitened billows. There is but one sensibility to pleasure and to pain. And there are those who never felt a real pang of love or sympathy or sorrow, whose lives are less worth living, whatever they may think, than the lives of men and women who hav drunk the cup of sorrow to the lees, simply because these hav had the sensibility which makes a man responsiv to the touch of beauty or of love, simply because these know what it is to thrill from center to circumference, with an exalted passion of delight.—J. W. Chadwick.

NOT my will, thou unrelenting spirit of nature, but thine be done. Thou art a gentle, loving mother, but a severe, cruel, pitiless mistress. Thou givest life, and fillest the world with bliss unutterable, but just as freely dost thou shower upon us want, woe, misery, and pain; yet hav I that within me which outrides the wind and the storm, and surmounts every obstacle which thou placest in my path. My idols thou mayst shatter, if thou must; I will build for myself new shrines, where my soul shall find rest, and my heart meets its requirements. So long as life shall last, hope shall be my guiding star, and despair shall not dwell within me. I will be good and do good, and these two things always bring peace and quiet to the weary and way-worn!—Elmina D. Slenker.

A BOSTON burglar worked for six solid hours on a safe in a newspaper office, and was rewarded by finding, not any actual cash, but the note of hand of a prominent politician for $7, which he owed for election tickets he had ordered printed. As the safe was ruined, the best way, or rather the safest way, would be to leave the safe wide open, or else hav a glass window in it, affording from the outside a view of the lack of contents. Something should be done to protect the hard-working burglar from the impositions of journalists.

A WESTERN POOL.

"Is it not beautiful, sweetheart!"

As Lillian McGuire spoke these words she looked into Rupert Hetherington's face with her starry eyes, and as the light of holy love shot forth from within their dusky depths he felt instinctivly that she was going to hold him up for some ice-cream. But, conquering the somber reflections that this ghastly thought called up, the young man placed his arm around Lillian's waist to prevent her red sash from being sunstruck, and waited in the tense agony of a horrible suspicion for her to speak again.

"Do you not think it lovely, darling?"

"What?" asked Rupert, with an ingenuous owl-club expression on the perfect features of his west-side face.

"Why, the morning, to be sure," replied the girl, a sunny, six-button smile playing lightly around her lips as if afraid it might fall in. "The twittering of the birds, those silver-throated harbingers of summer, is to be heard on every branch and bough. The air is laden with the delicate perfume of lilac and apple-blossoms, while the dew-kissed leaves of yon sturdy maple reflect a little of the crimson and gold of the rising sun. Spring has been a sad laggard, but now that she has come in all her glory of bud and blossom, what can be more beautiful?"

"I cannot tell you," replied Rupert. "You are far too fly for me, dearest, when such matters are to be discussed. But in the dreamy, sensuous days of autumn, when the tasselled corn hangs ripe in the sheaves, and the leaves hav felt the blighting touch of the frost king's icy breath, I am more liable to get there. Mine, as you know, is a sensitiv, Sedgwick-street nature, which shrinks from contact with a cold and cruel world. To me the spring has naught of joy. The low, mellow note of the new milch cow, chasing a butcher's wagon in which her offspring uneasily reclines, seems to me like the wail of a lost soul, and weird fancies crowd my brain as I hear at midnight the mournful hoot of the owl, flitting like some evil spirit amid the desolate precincts of the village churchyard."

"Is it your liver, darling?" murmured Lillian.

"I sometimes think so," was the reply. "Ever and anon the thought comes over me like a black demon of the night that I am off my feed. But it cannot, must not be. Yet in autumn all is changed. The soft mezzo tints of the pumpkin pie fall gratefully on my eye, and all nature, laughing in the fruitage of an abundant harvest, seems joyous and free from care. It is to tell you this that I hav come around so early this morning—to tell you that in the months that are to come, the scorching days of midsummer, when the sun, hanging like a ball of molten brass in the sky, will send down its rays in pitiless fury, you had better get another fellow—one who will love you dearly as I hav done, and whose memory you can ever cherish with gentle tenderness."

"But whom shall I get?" asked the girl in agonized tones.

"I hav thought of this, sweetheart," Rupert replied. "You can do no better than take George W. Simpson. He loves you dearly. I know it because he has often told me that he doesn't, and George cannot tell the truth."

"I will do as you say," said the girl, choking back a sob. "And now good-bye."

"So long," said Rupert, kissing her as he spoke.

The girl threw her arms around his neck, kissed him, and went into the house.

Rupert walked around the corner, where he met George Simpson.

"Did you fix it?" asked George.

"Yes," was the reply.

"Which do I get, winter or summer?"

"Summer."

"You are in luck, as usual, old boy. They tell me she can beat the record eating ice-cream."

"Yes," said Rupert, "but think of the oysters!"

"True," replied George, "I had forgotten the oysters."—Chicago Tribune.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. V geli and Edmond Dubourg.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

HISTORY

OF THE

CHRISTIAN RELIGION

TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

This work has received the indorsement of the Society of Critical Historical Theology of Zurich, Switzerland. The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religion Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

THE BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.

The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

Notes and Clippings.

THE burning of Garibaldi's body is likely to giv a boom to cremation, at least in Italy. For there may be many to whom this method of disposing of the human body has appeared to be a mere whim, with which they had nothing in common, who will now think of it seriously, out of respect for the memory of Garibaldi and a willingness to follow his example.

THE Rev. John Jasper, of Richmond, says that a boy in his congregation has been struck dumb for telling lies. With this awful warning before him, he dares not stop preaching the truth about the flat earth standing still and the sun revolving round it. Jasper is a consistent Christian in his ignorance, and we hav often wondered why Talmage does not follow his lead.

BESIDES THE TRUTH SEEKER, the newspapers, magazines, and reviews which adopt the principle and use new spellings, more or fewer, in their regular issues, are the Home Journal, the Chicago Tribune, the Utica Herald, the Princeton Review, the Toledo Blade, the Library Journal, the Oberlin News, and others. The number, including minor examples, is stated by a writer of the New York Tribune to be about two hundred.

BISHOP PAINE is ninety. In asking the Methodist Conference at Nashville to relieve him from further activ service, he declared that sixty-five years of ministry had not shaken his perfect belief in the truthfulness of the Christian doctrin of salvation. The bishop must hav an impenetrable skull, or much less than sixty-five years of familiarity with ministerial ignorance and pulpit hypocrisy would hav sufficed to convince him of the injustice of the salvation scheme.

THE colored minister who whipped his wife at Alexandria, Va., was fined $4 by a justice. He had no money, and was given a week in which to pay. On the intervening Sunday he preached from the text, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," drawing from it the conclusion that he had punished his wife properly. Then he asked the congregation to contribute the $4 for his fine, and they did it, though the plates had to be passed six times before the amount was realized. The pastor's appeals were a great deal like those of Mr. Kimball in debt raising.

THE Evangelical Ministers' Association of Boston voted that it was "the duty of the republic to educate her future citizens in morals," and to this end a committee was appointed to produce a text book. This task was found difficult, and the committee sought to turn it over to the secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education, but he declined to undertake it. The association has now formed a new committee, including a Universalist, a Swedenborgian, a Roman Catholic, and a Hebrew, and a series of books are in preparation.

ON a recent Sunday the bishop of Liverpool went to preach at the evening service in a large church in his diocese. The second lesson appointed for the day happened to be in the chapter in Timothy in which the duties of a bishop are defined, and in which he is directed to be "the husband of one wife." As the bishop happens to be the husband of a third wife, the obsequious incumbent thought that he might feel disconcerted, so, in the plenitude of his servility, he ordered the curate not to read the proper lesson, but to choose another.

THIS is the way a Sun correspondent talks about the Freethought orator: "Col. Ingersoll livs at Long Beach this summer. He has rented the cottage nearest the hotel. Any day his portly form may be seen riding indolently upon the billows beyond the region of surf and making a large defiant hummock on the line of the horizon. In the place that he has selected he can step upon sand that is as compact and smooth as velvet; the surf that tosses him in an interesting manner is white as milk, unmingled with clam shells or metropolitan wreckage, clean and beautiful; and, moreover, he can shower his person with fresh tepid water on emerging from the sea, and disrobe and array himself in a spacious and well-ventilated compartment supplied with a foot bath and a looking glass, and chock full of towels of a size adapted to his person. Whenever the band plays, Col. Ingersoll occupies a position where he can best listen to it. As well as good bathing he requires good music, and no better music than that at Long Beach floats seaward from any watering place. The robust sybarite from Illinois has established himself on terms of profound intimacy with the kapelmeister, who in turn regards him with deep admiration and respect."

STORIES of the murder of Christian children by Jews are generally treated as malicious inventions or revivals of Middle Age superstitions. But it seems to be believed at Pesth that a Christian girl was really killed last Easter in a Jewis synagog at Tisaezlai by some Jewish butchers. If the story told be at all true, the crime was the result of a plot; for butchers from a distance are said to hav come to take part in it. The popular belief is that the girl's blood was used in making a cake for some religious rite; and the excitement is so intense that 600 soldiers hav been sent there.

DURING the riots against the Jews at Balta, in Russian Poland, thirty or forty women sought refuge with their children in the garret of a house used as a synagog. While thus concealed, in breathless suspense, with the rioters in the street and on the lower floors of the house, a baby began to cry. At this some of the women, in a perfect frenzy of fear, beset the mother, tore the child from her arms, and endeavored to stifle it. Its mother fought wildly for it, and succeeded in recovering it, but it was already more dead than alive. Some of the cruelties inflicted upon the women during these riots almost surpass belief. The hospital at Odessa shows instances of fiendish ingenuity unfit for description, and paralleled only by the atrocities of the Apaches.

THE brutality exercised in convents finds another illustration in a story from Cracow, according to which a nun in a convent there has been inhumanly treated. She belonged to a good Silesian family, and gave all her property to the convent eighteen years ago. But for a faithful old servant who followed her into the convent in order to be near her, she would probably hav died under the treatment she received. Her brother could only obtain an interview with her by calling in the police. She had to be supported by two nuns, and appeared in a terribly emaciated condition. Having refused to accept a young confessor introduced into the convent some years ago, she was confined alone in a cell, and the sisters were forbidden to approach her. The story runs that she had worn the same gown for eighteen years, and had had no change of underclothing or shoes or stockings for seven years. Her cell had not been cleaned for a twelvemonth, and she was never allowed to leave it. The straw of her bed was rotten and full of vermin. The sisters with her contradicted her statement, but she persisted in imploring her brother to free her from her terrible position. The brother could only provide her with food and clothing. Until the affair has been decided in a court of justice the nun will hav to remain where she is.

A NEW style of begging has been invented by the Episcopalians. A pamphlet on the past history and present needs of the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal church has recently been circulated in large quantities among the practicing lawyers of this city. Inclosed in this pamphlet on a loose slip of paper is a printed notice which reads as follows: "As you are frequently called upon to draft wills for your clients, this pamphlet is sent to you to ask your attention to one of the most important eleemosynary institutions in our city. The corporate title is 'The General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States,' a corporation existing under the laws of the state of New York." The author of the essay appears by the title page to be the Rev. E. A. Hoffman, D.D., the dean of the seminary, and it is to be presumed that the slip which we hav copied is circulated by the authority of that institution. The notice is, says the Sun, substantially an invitation to lawyers to influence their clients in regard to the testamentary disposition of their property. It says, in substance, to the members of the bar: "You are often employed to draw wills for rich men; you thus come to know what property they hav, and what they propose to do with it. This knowledge is denied the world at large, and is imparted to you because of the confidential relation you occupy. Avail yourself of this position, and pour into the ears of the unsuspecting testator the manifold advantages which will accrue to his soul from a devise and bequest to the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal church." As a matter of morals, of course, it is wholly improper for a lawyer to do any such thing. He is not the keeper of his client's conscience, nor should he undertake to be. When called upon to draft a will, he should ascertain what the testator desires to do, and then he should advise him what are the necessary lawful steps to accomplish that result; but it would be almost as disgraceful to comply with the spirit of the above invitation as it is for clergymen to surround the bed of a dying man and endeavor to extort from him gifts to the church which he would never hav made in the time of health and strength and perspicacity of intellect. No honorable lawyer will comply with a request of this character.

WE hope the correspondent of the Boston Herald is mistaken in the following. Col. Ingersoll makes such good use of his money that we should like to see him the possessor of millions: "There is nothing more interesting in Washington just now than the affairs of the Ivanhoe mine, and I may as well tell you about it. The Ivanhoe mine is Bob Ingersoll's mine. That is, Robert is the heaviest owner in it at present, and it begins to look as if he were the heaviest loser in it also. The principal movers were Ingersoll and a firm of lawyers, Halbert E. Payne & Grafton, and Senator Plumb, of Kansas. A Washington banking firm was also interested. The property is said to hav cost $60,000, and therefore the shares of stock cost the original holders and issuers thereof 30 cents apiece! The company was formed about a year and a half ago, and soon after it was formed the most astounding stories of the wealth of the mine began to circulate all over Washington. I forget how many millions of dollars' worth of ore were always in sight in the mine. None of it was ever taken out, but it was stated to be there, and a good many honest people got to believe that it was there. After a while the able originators of the mine began to let some of their friends into this good and beautiful thing at the rate of about $3 a share. There seemed to be quite a demand for it at this figure, and consequently the price was advanced to $5 a share, and then the demand for it increased. The company held a meeting and set apart a quantity of stock to be sold at $5 a share, to be used to develop the mine. The reports of fresh millions of ore heaving in sight as the explorers advanced rapidly underneath the surface continued to arrive in Washington, and some of the originators of the mine put faith in them. Mr. Ingersoll himself became convinced that the mine was such a bonanza that he thought it a great pity that the company's stock should go off at the low rate of $5 a share. So he went and put all the money he could rake and scrape into it, and his friends generally did the same. One gentleman I know, who had nothing but his faith in Ingersoll to guide him, invested $38,000 in the stock at $4 and $5 a share. Somehow, there seemed to be a good deal of stock floating about, and after a while it began to sink a little, and then it sank a good deal, and last week I heard of a fellow buying 1,000 shares at ten cents a share. Ingersoll has paid something over $50,000 for what he could now buy for about $2,000. He is able to bear the loss, because he can get $1,000 a night whenever he chooses to lecture in Chicago, New York, or Boston, but some of the other sufferers are not as well able to bear it; in fact, the Ivanhoe mine has blown a sort of simoom of poverty over Washington. There was a regular craze about the stock last year, and people who had not much ready money even mortgaged their houses to buy it at $5 a share. The secret of the little affair was, of course, that while Ingersoll and his friends were buying, Plumb, Grafton, and their friends were selling."

A LITTLE LECTURING.

I had not been very long in Colombo before my friends gave me a pressing invitation to address them. It was in vain that I told them I was not a professional lecturer, that I never addressed a public audience till past fifty-five years of age, that the consciousness of my inability as a speaker, and my excessive modesty, had allowed me to make but a few attempts since that time, and that I had not come abroad to deliver lectures, but to see what I could of the world. They would not accept these very reasonable arguments and excuses, but still insisted that I should address them. I said that they had been so very kind to me that it would be a piece of ingratitude on my part not to oblige them, even though my efforts were feeble, and my oratory of a low class. "I am in your hands," said I, "while I am here, and will do what you wish me to do as nearly as I can." The result is I delivered ten lectures in Ceylon—fully as many as I had ever delivered before; and from the flattering compliments paid me it would seem I gave very fair satisfaction. Perhaps they are not hard to please.

My first lecture I wrote out and delivered it at the Kotahena Dipaduttama Vihare of the orator priest Mohottiwatte Gunamande, near the temple already mentioned. My audience numbered fully three thousand, nearly all natives, so that it had to be interpreted as delivered, and this changed into Singalese, I speaking a sentence or two and then the translation made. Mr. Simon Silva, Seneviratna Muhandiram, interpreter to the Colombo municipal council, acted as interpreter on the occasion. The chief priest whose name I have given introduced me to the audience, and recounted some of my varied experiences at the hands of my Christian friends.

I am somewhat noted for my long-windedness (save when in the Jordan, etc.), and I gave them about all the lecture they wanted on one occasion, the delivery and the interpretation occupying two hours and a quarter. But the audience, among whom perhaps there were two or three hundred females, paid excellent attention, and extended to me a hearty vote of thanks. There were twenty or more priests in attendance, among them the high priests of the city, the chief priest and orator of the Vihare, also the priest Mohottiwatte with whom I held the conversation out in the country; he came in the eight miles to hear me. Several of them told me that my examination of the subject was the most exhaustive and thorough they have ever heard, and assured me they were highly pleased with it. I was at once asked if I was willing it should be copied and translated into Singalese, as they wished to print it in large numbers for the people over the island. Of course I had no objection to anything of that kind. I was only too glad to do what I could to aid them in any way. Two of the friends sat up the better part of a night to copy it, soon to be printed in their own language. I confess I felt somewhat flattered by the compliments given me, but that you may see how little they were deserved, I will send the lecture along with this and let you read it for yourselves. I am sure considerable of it will sound familiar to you, for you have heard me talk in the same way before.

But here it is:

LECTURE TO THE PEOPLE OF CEYLON.

FRIENDS, BROTHERS, AND SISTERS OF THE SINGALESE RACE: I beg to assure you that it is with unusual pleasure that I visit your country of tropical delights and meet with so many kind and genial people as I find here. I have little desire to speak words of flattery to you, but let me say, though I have visited many lands and climes, I have nowhere found more friendly, kindly-disposed, and intelligent people than I have met with here. I am very glad to visit you at your homes and to become acquainted with you personally.

With your permission, I propose to address you to-night upon the subject of religion, and more particularly upon the Christian system, which is the prevailing religion in my own country, and which so many men and so much money are being employed to establish here in your lovely country. The subject of religion is an important one, and should interest every man and woman on the earth. It is of the first consequence that we have the right kind of religion, and are able to discard or avoid such kinds as abound in superstitions and falsehoods. The number of religions which men in the past and present ages have embraced reach thousands, and the number of gods which have been worshiped amount to millions. No man can truthfully claim that all these religions have been true; no man can claim that all these gods have had an actual existence, though the devotees of each religion and the worshipers of each god hav believed they had the most truth in their religion, and that their particular god was greater and more powerful than all the other gods.

It is my belief that all religions have possessed some truth, and that all have been burdened with some falsehood. Some have had more truth than others; some have abounded far more in falsehoods than others. We should make it our business to seek and embrace the truth and to detect and reject the error. There is no better employment than this.

In my remarks upon Christianity on this occasion I will divide my subject under three heads:

1. The origin of Christianity.
2. The truthfulness of Christianity.
3. Christianity compared with your own system of religion—Buddhism.

The subject is a wide one, and in the remarks I will have time to make I can embrace but a small portion of that which is to be said upon the subject, and my observations must necessarily be brief and imperfect. I ask you to attribute the limited arguments I may employ rather to a want of time than to a lack of proof or to a scarcity of truth.

Primarily, Christianity, so far as its god and its sacred book are concerned, is an outgrowth of Judaism.

Secondarily, Its dogmas, rites, and ceremonies are borrowed from paganism. There is an abundance of proof to establish these propositions.

Judaism and its offspring, Christianity, are based upon the Pentateuch, often called the five books of Moses, though there is not the slightest proof that Moses wrote a word of them, or that if he had written them they would have been any more divine or true in consequence. There are the best grounds, however, for deciding that he did not write them, for they contain an account of his own death and burial and many other events which did not take place till many hundred years after his death. No man has yet lived who was able to write an account of what took place long after he ceased to live, so we are justified in deciding that Moses did not write the Pentateuch. Who did write it is not known, nor at what time it was written; but as the books refer to the kings which reigned in Judea, we may safely conclude that they was not written till a few centuries before the Christian era.

I need scarcely repeat the fable of the creation of the world, of all upon it, and of the temptation and fall of man. You are familiar with it all. I will simply ask a few questions with reference to the tale. Is the world but six thousand years old? Was the universe created from nothing or brought out of nonexistence? Is the earth older than the sun? Were there no human beings before Adam and Eve? Did a snake ever speak the human language? Did knowledge and endless life grow on trees? Did a rain ever fall upon the earth which reached to the tops of the highest mountains? Were specimens of every form of animal life great and small, ever gotten together in one place and shut up in a box or vessel and pitched and made air tight? If such a thing could have been done could those animals, requiring different climates, different temperatures, different food, have lived homogeneously in that box, with food or without, for a period of thirteen months? Did the creator of the universe ever select 5,000 square miles of the earth's surface as his own country, leaving all the rest to his adversary, or to get along as best it might, without his care and blessing, he being indifferent as to what befell it? Did an infinite and omnipotent God ever attempt to have a special country of his own and people of his own, and fail in his efforts?

If one of these inquiries can be truthfully answered in the negative, then are Judaism and Christianity untrue, for the foundation upon which they stand requires them all to be answered in the affirmative. If any of these affirmations are untrue, then is Judaism false, then is Christianity false.

I will say, to begin with, that we have not the slightest grounds for believing that one of the foregoing questions should be answered in the affirmative. Priests tell us that the story was written by inspiration, but they have no grounds for setting up that claim. The story itself does not say it was written by inspiration, neither does it say by whom it was written, nor in what age of the world it was written. This no man knows, but we have the right to examine its probable truth.

As to the age of the earth, we have every reason to believe that it is not only six thousand years old, but that it has been many millions of years in existence. The strata of rocks, one above the other, showing wide eras between, with the fossil remains of many forms of vegetable and animal life which existed at periods many thousands of years apart, prove the earth at least hundreds of thousands of years old, and that the foundation claim of Judaism and Christianity is false.

The existence of the coal strata spread over many countries, and which strata were the product of an immense vegetable growth produced when the atmosphere surrounding the earth was far more warm, more humid, and more charged with carbon than it has been for many ages, show the age of the earth to be far greater than the Jew-book claims.

The great glacial periods, of the existence of which there are the amplest proofs in thousands of places, where immense rocks were transported for many miles by vast and slowly-moving masses of ice, the latest period of which must have been nearly two hundred thousand years ago, give proof of the same kind.

As to the universe being created from nothing, I will only say that the bare proposition is the most absurd one that can be advanced. But it must either have been created from nothing or always have existed in some form. If the latter, then of course a creation was equally impossible and unnecessary. If it always existed, the forces which exist in it and impel it must also always have existed. When we take the fact into consideration that not an ounce nor a grain of matter can be created, increased, or destroyed, it is far more reasonable to believe that matter and force, or the universe are eternal, and always existed, than that any god ever brought them forth from nothing. The writer of Genesis, however, knew nothing of all this, and we must decide that the foundation of the two systems of religion under consideration is untenable. The flippant and slip-shod style of the creation is appreciated by the fact about the creation of the stars. Six days were required to make all. Five days were required for the earth and what was on it, but we are told that in one day the sun and moon and stars were created. When we remember that the sun is a million times larger than the earth, that there are are millions of other suns and stars larger than ours, and so far away that it requires millions of years for light, which travels at the rate of two hundred thousand miles per second, to reach us, the looseness and ignorance of the remark, "and he made the stars also," must be perceived. The person who wrote that had not the slightest conception of the immense number, magnitude, and distance of the starry orbs which fill the vault of heaven.

As to whether Adam and Eve were the first individuals of the human race, we have the most positive proof that they were not. There are many places in different parts of the earth where the bones of human beings have been discovered where they were imbedded under a slow deposit of soil or of stalagmite formations which could not have been less than fifty thousand years in accumulating. The human bones that have been found side by side with the bones of animals which have not been known upon the earth within the last five thousand years, or since the historic period, prove man to have existed scores of thousands of years ago. The human bones and remains that have been found in the low strata of the earth's crust prove that man existed on the earth more than a thousand centuries ago. The positive proofs of the stone age, before the historic era, when man in a very low stage of development and civilization, knew nothing of the metals, and only had implements of stone and the bones of animals, show that the human race was on the earth thousands of years before the time of Adam.

Relative to the earth being older than the sun, and vegetation perfecting itself before there was a sun, it can only be said that the very thought is grossly absurd. As the sun is a million times larger than the earth, as it is the central body round which the earth and the planets revolve, and from which they obtain their light and heat, it is worse than childishness to claim that the earth is the older. It is believed by most scientific men that the entire solar system was once one thin body of matter, and that in obedience to inherent and ever-active forces the portions forming the planets and asteroids were thrown off, when, in obedience to a law of nature, they assumed the spherical form and took up their journey around the sun which for a moment they have never since abandoned. The opinion of these men of scientific investigation is worth a thousand times more than the ridiculous and unsupported statement of some unknown ignoramus about there being light, heat, day and night, and full vegetation on the earth before there was any sun.

With regard to the silly story about a snake being able to speak the language of man, when he has no organs to utter such language; that a snake should be able to thwart and circumvent the plans and wishes of an infinite creator, is too absurd to merit serious consideration. To claim that trees and stones and hillocks once spoke with human language would be equally sensible and true. The snake family have ever crawled upon their bellies, as they do now. They have never eaten dirt for a living, and never were able to stand and walk upon the ends of their tails.

The idea that knowledge and eternal life ever grew on trees is childish in the extreme. You have many varieties of trees on this beautiful island, and it is a great place for fruit, but I ask you if you have ever seen trees of knowledge or any fruit of eternal life. No; you have seen nothing of the kind, nor has anybody else in any part of the earth.

The claim that the infinite God of the universe repented of his work, regretted what he had done in attempting to people the earth, and that in consequence of this he sent a million times more water upon the earth than ever existed for the sake of drowning the inhabitants, when it was in his power to extinguish their lives in a moment without all that trouble, is another of the foolish and untruthful claims upon which both systems of religion are based. An infinite, all-wise God could not be so fickle and weak. The rain necessary to cover the earth to the tops of the highest mountains does not exist; it never did exist; the atmosphere is incapable of sustaining a thousandth part of it, even if it did exist; and if that amount of water by any means should be thrown upon the surface of the earth it would be compelled to remain there, the same as the ocean now remains, for there would be no other place for it to go to. The atmosphere, I repeat, could sustain but a small fractional part of it.

As to the idle story about the ambitions, enterprises, and experiments of the Jew God in the Jew country, about his total failure and disgrace, I will not detain you with many remarks upon the subject, but will only submit it to your judgment whether such tales are not too insipid, too extravagant, and too foolish to be applied to a being of infinite power, wisdom, and love, and whether the whole story is not unworthy of belief.

In connection with this branch of the subject, let me add that Judaism had nothing new or original in it. Its doctrines, rites, and ceremonies were borrowed from the nations that had an older existence. Thus circumcision was earlier practiced by the Egyptians, the Ethiopians, the Colchians, and other nations. The sacrifice of animals, to please the gods, was common to all the pagan nations centuries before there were any Jews in the world. A hereditary priesthood was common in Egypt, in Phœnicia, in Assyria, and other nations, before the Jewish nation had an existence. The form of their tabernacle and temple was from the Egyptian pattern. The monotheism, which has been loudly claimed for the Jews, was earlier taught in Persia by the great Zoroaster, before the time of Moses, Jabob, or even Abraham.

Prayer and prophecy were practiced by many nations long before the Jews. They simply borrowed those rites.

But I must not dwell longer on this branch of the subject. I think I have shown that the foundation of Judaism and Christianity is untrue, and not original, and that, therefore, the systems themselves are false in essence and reality. I must hasten on to the second branch of my subject.

Is Christianity truthful in its later claims?

It is a question not easy to decide, whether the reputed founder of the system ever had an existence. If he did exist, it becomes another serious question whether he was a demi-god, begotten directly by deity, without a natural father, upon the person of a human female, thus being half god and half man. But still, again, it is another question whether he set the laws of nature aside and performed miracles. It is also a most weighty question whether this story is original; whether the doctrines of his system are peculiar to it; whether his morals are better and purer than were taught by others before him, and whether his followers have led more angelic and better lives than the devotees of other religions. I shall not have time to do justice to this branch of the subject, but can only take a hurried glance.

Whether such a person as Jesus lived is, I repeat, a matter of doubt. There is not the slightest proof that there was such a person, save in the four stories attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. But what makes this claim extremely lame is the fact that those stories were not written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and nobody knows by whom they were written. All that we do know, with certainty, about those stories is, that they had no known existence till 150 years after Jesus was dead and buried, if it is conceded that he lived. There is no proof that those four stories were used, read, known, or even heard of till the year 181, or thereabouts. The Christian fathers and apostles, previous to that time, had never heard of them. This is a most damaging fact to Christian claims, but nevertheless it is true. I will offer here to-night a thousand rupees to any one who will prove to the contrary, and that either of those four books was written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John; but it will not produce the proof. A thousand lacks of rupees ($5,000,000) could not produce it.

If they had been written by those four individuals, that would not make them true, because we have no more assurance they were truthful men than thousands of others who have written falsehoods; and judging from the way they often contradict each other, and give their stories in a totally different manner, they must be very unreliable witnesses. Such evidence, in a modern court of justice, would be insufficient to convict a culprit of chicken-stealing; and when the naked fact stands out that it was not Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John who wrote those extravagant narratives, and we find that a gross falsehood has been told us to start with, that we have been egregiously deceived in the identity of the witnesses, the whole thing appears as it is, a delusion, and the entire story is not worth a straw. If a falsehood, I ask, has been told us at the outset, what confidence can we have in any part of the tale? None whatever.

It is possible, however, that there might have been such a person as Jesus; the name is said to have been a common one in the land of the Jews, and it is quite possible that a person by that name might have been a strolling lecturer, who was followed by a small band of admirers, and this man might have believed he had some claims to the throne of Judea, which belief he might have ventilated as he strolled about the country, and for these pretensions the Roman authorities, who ruled the country, may have deemed it prudent to put him to death to avoid any disturbance that might arise from his followers proclaiming him as the rightful ruler of the country. I say all that might have been possible, for similar occurrences have taken place in the world again and again; but there is no proof that any such thing took place. If, however, for a moment it be granted that the man Jesus did live, that falls very far short of proving that he was begotten by the supreme power of the universe, or that his second, or ideal partner, called the Holy Ghost, performed what is called the overshadowing feat, or that Jesus himself executed such miraculous feats as raising people from the dead, changing water into wine, casting out innumerable devils, multiplying bread and fishes to an unheard-of extent, of himself rising from the dead after being executed, and finally ascending up bodily into heaven through the intensely cold and intensely light air, where a person could not live for a minute.

The only foundation for the divine conception part of the story was a dream which it is asserted Joseph had, which is claimed to have been related by Matthew, though Matthew had no means of knowing what Joseph had dreamed, or whether he could dream out real facts or not. Dreams are poor things at best to build a religion upon. But we now learn that it was not Matthew at all who told the dream, but some unknown person, a hundred years later, who played the part of a forger or falsifier, and pretended to be Matthew, when he was not. The case of Luke is no better; he pretended to give a vision which Mary had, and which he had no means of knowing anything about, but he, also, now turns out not to be Luke at all, but rather some unknown false pretender and misrepresenter.

The other two gospel writers have not a word to say about the dream or the vision, or about the divine begetting and conception. They either never heard anything about it, did not believe anything about it, or were untruthful witnesses, and kept back a part, and are not worthy of credit. In all candor, it must be confessed that such evidence as this, to sustain an act totally impossible in itself, is entirely without value.

If there is the slightest truth in this story of the miraculous conception, it is very singular that neither Paul nor Peter, who had much more to do with establishing the system of Christianity than any other persons of their time, and whose epistles were written a hundred years before what are called the gospels were penned, have not a word to say about it; not a word about Jesus not having a natural father, the same as other men; not a word about his mother being a virgin. If there is truth in these claims these men should have known something about it, and should have said something about it. Also, if there is any truth in the wonderful miracles which it is claimed Jesus performed—of his raising the dead, of going up bodily into heaven—they should at least have a word upon the subject; but, strange to say, they have not a syllable.

In my honest opinion those events never occurred, nor were they thought of till after more than a century and a-half had passed, when the miraculous conception, the divine parentage, the miraculous performances, were deemed necessary to make the story go down well with the marvel-loving and superstitious people of the times.

It was perfectly easy, after the hero of the story had been in his grave for a hundred and fifty years, and when everybody was dead and forgotten who knew anything about the matter, to invent such marvelous additions, and add on these little extras; to have new stories written, new claims set up, a new set of statements to be believed, and a stronger religion established.

I do not say positively that this was the case, but it certainly looks as though it was, and it would have been perfectly easy to do so, and there was nobody to prevent it. This much is known, and cannot be contradicted. The gospels and epistles that were written in the first century say nothing of the miraculous conception, and nothing of the wonderful miracles Jesus performed; but in the subsequent centuries the best Christian authorities tell us there were hundreds of spurious gospels and epistles which were discarded as not being entitled to credit.

But there are no good reasons why the bishops and priests of the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, when they met to decide what gospels and epistles should be admitted into the Christian canon, should have accepted the four gospels now in the canon, and rejected the many that are not in. Those accepted were not so old as some that were rejected, and they possess no more proofs of divinity than those rejected; in fact, at that time, and since, it was claimed that the rejected ones were the best. Some of them claimed to be written by inspiration, but even this shallow pretense was not made on the part of the four gospels in the canon. There is no claim in either of them that they were written by inspiration; and if any one can show me the slightest authority, of the least value, that they were penned by inspiration, or that any invisible being had anything to do with them, I wish they would do so.

The councils which took upon themselves the business of deciding which writings should be admitted into the New Testament, and which not, in the first place had no authority for a work of that kind; and, in the next place, they were the most unsuitable persons for undertaking a work of that kind that could well be imagined. More noisy, discordant, and contentious gatherings have scarcely been known in the world. Their quarrels and fightings were a disgrace to the human race. We have the best Christian proof of this. The Council of Nice, presided over by Constantine the Great, was extremely noisy, quarrelsome, and uproarious. Constantine was compelled to send a large share of them home, to burn their church memorials, and to threaten that if they continued to make so much disturbance, and be so unruly, he would not longer fight the Infidels for them.

Saint Gregory Nazianzen, in a letter to Procopius, said, "I flee from all assemblies of bishops, because I never saw a good and happy end of any council, but that they did rather increase than lessen the evil, and the love of contention and ambition always overcomes their reason." In declaring his decision to never again attend another council, and giving his reason therefor, this good Christian said, "Because nothing is to be heard there but geese and cranes, who fight without understanding one another." In describing one of these meetings, the Christian writer, Tindal says, "Indeed, the confusion and disorder were so great amongst them, especially in their synods, that it sometimes came to blows; as, for instance, Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, cuffed and kicked Flavianus, patriarch of Constantinople, with that fury that within three days after he died." This was the second synod of Ephesus. Pappius, a noted Christian authority, described how these men decided which books were inspired, "By placing all the books under the communion table, and upon the prayers of the council the inspired books jumped upon the table, while the false ones remained under." Another writer says the matter was decided by vote, and that Luke's gospel was admitted by a single vote. Pretty ways, indeed, to form a word of God!

It appears that it took several of these contentious councils to get the canon of the New Testament fully settled, and really it was never fully settled. One council set aside what a previous council had enacted, and so they went on quarreling like a lot of noisy politicians After the great Council of Laodicea, in 363, two other councils were held—one in 406, the other in 680. That of 406 rejected several books which had been declared inspired by the council of 363; and then, again, in 680, books were pronounced inspired which the council of 406 had condemned. And in this way the book which Christians fondly and blindly revere as the "Word of God" was made up, und this is the compilation they depend upon to prove their founder and their religion divine.

I will not enlarge in this direction, but briefly recapitulate. The foundation dogma of the Christian religion depends upon a dream which probably never was dreamed, because the person who tells the story is quite another person from the one he pretends to be. As the real Matthew had no means of knowing Joseph's dream, the pretended Matthew, a hundred years later, positively could know nothing of it. Such stories as these were chosen by contentious, noisy councils, wholly unable to tell which books were written by inspiration (if any were), and which not. I will leave it with you, and other sensible people, to decide what such proof as that is worth.

A word about the originality and divinity of the Christian doctrines. The begetting of sons by mythical gods was common more than a thousand years before Christianity. Ormuzd had a son named Mithra. Vishnu had nine sons, or avatars, and prominent among them were Rama and Christna. Osiris begat Horus; Saturn had many sons, Jove had not less than a dozen, some by celestial females and some by earthly virgins; the Scandinavian god Odin begat Thor and Balder, and the Druid god begat Hesus; and so hundreds of other gods were claimed to have begotten sons long before the Jew God engaged in the same business.

The myth of "virgin and child" existed in Egypt, Assyria, Persia, India, Phœnicia, and other countries one and two thousand years before Christianity existed.

The 25th day of December was long ago kept as a festival by several pagan nations, because on that day the son of God was held to be born, and this a score of centuries before the birth of Jesus.

The cross was used as a religious symbol in Thibet, Egypt, etc., more than a thousand years before Christianity.

A belief in good and bad spirits, in heaven and hell, was taught in India, in Persia, in Egypt, in Assyria, and elsewhere more than a thousands years before Christians adopted it.

A belief in a trinity was old in India, Egypt, and other countries before Christianity was born.

Baptism by water was practiced in India in the sacred Ganges, in Egypt in the equally sacred Nile, and in other countries hundreds of years before Christianity began.

Prayer, humility, repentance, self-denial, etc., were taught and practiced many hundred years before Jesus.

It is not claimed that any of these were divine doctrines when practiced by the pagan nations, and I wish to be informed how they became divine because Christians adopted them. But these being pagan doctrines, I wish it explained what doctrines Christians hold that are not pagan, and which are any more divine than those just named.

There were several so-called sons of gods which might have answered as models to pattern the story of Jesus after, but I will not take your time to name them, but will simply refer to one, first brought to the notice of the Christian world by that excellent Christian, Sir William Jones, who many years acted as an English judge in India, and made himself well acquainted with the religions of the land. This was Christna. He was held to have been begotten by Vishnu, who overshadowed the virgin Devackai; his life was sought by the wicked tyrant, Nanda, who to destroy him caused great numbers of little children to be slaughtered. The young god, however, was sent away by heaven to be saved. When he grew to maturity he commenced his mission to his countrymen. He lived a holy life, he chose a band of disciples who followed him; he taught excellent morals; he performed wonderful miracles, but his enemies pursued him, arrested him, and executed him on a tree by the side of the Ganges; and thereby the good of mankind was greatly promoted. I will not follow the parallel between them more fully, enough having been said to show that the similarity between Christna and Christ was wonderfully great, and it seems that one might have been a copy of the other. You of course know that the story of Christna is many hundred years older than that of Christ. If it can be shown that the copy is more divine than the original, I wish it to be done. The parallelisms between Jesus and other sons of gods and great teachers is very great, but I will not recount them.

Let me now take up the third division of my subject—a comparison between Buddhism and Christianity. There are many points in common between them, and many points of difference. I will glance at some of them—the points of similarity first:

1. Both are claimed to have a mission to their fellow-men.
2. Both are believed to have been very good persons.
3. Both led lives of humility and self-denial.
4. Both had a band of disciples.
5. Both taught a good code of morals.
6. Both were tempted and tried by evil influences.
7. Both founded a large system of religion and have great numbers of followers.
8. Both are dearly loved by their admirers.
9. The memory of both is commemorated by images.
10. Both omitted to write down their doctrines before leaving the world, and their followers wrote them afterward.

There are other points of similarity, but these are sufficient for the present. Let me briefly see how they compare in the points I have named. 1. As to which was the best person there is a difference of opinion; the followers of each believing their favorite to be the best and the greatest. But as I am not a follower of either I ought to be an independent judge or umpire. I will give my honest opinion. Buddha sacrificed the most for the sake of his convictions. He relinquished wealth, fortune, family, fame, a prospective crown, a dear wife and child, home, friends, ease, and comfort, all to follow what he conceived to be his duty. Jesus had few of these to relinquish, so his sacrices were not so great.

2. As to the excellence of the lives of the two persons I must decide in favor of Buddha. His period of preparation and teaching continued fifty years, during which time he did no wrong, gave way to no anger, no passion, while the mission of Jesus, at the outside, continued but three years, and some stoutly claim but one year. As a long period of good deeds must be better than a short one, as much as fifty is more than three or one Buddha was better than Jesus; besides, the latter gave way to anger and unreasonably cursed the fig-tree; he called his fellow-beings very hard names, like vipers, serpents, fools, children of hell, thieves, etc., and on another occasion angrily and roughly beat and drove the dove-sellers and money changers from the temple, who had long been in the habit of being there.

3. As to which was the most humble I must again decide in favor of Buddha. Being a prince, an expectant ruler, he gave it all up, everything he had in the world, and lived the most humble life it was possible for a person to lead. He never sought to rule on the throne, he never sought public display in any way. On the other hand, Jesus claimed to be entitled to reign. He talked about sitting on the throne and making kings of his disciples; he allowed his followers to proclaim him a prince, he mounted an ass and rode in pomp and splendor into Jerusalem, whilst all around him were shouting in favor of his being king. Buddha did nothing of this kind, and clearly possessed the greatest humility.

4. As to which has had the greatest number of disciples, the decision must again be in favor of Buddha. He began preaching more than six hundred years earlier than Jesus, and his doctrines spread more rapidly. It is estimated he has now 500,000,000 of followers, while Jesus has but little more than half that number. It is very safe to decide that Buddha has had more than double the followers of Jesus. If these numbers fix the degree of divinity Buddha is twice as divine as Jesus.

5. As to which taught the best code of morals there is again a great diversity of opinion, but as a disinterested judge I must declare for Buddha. While I perhaps cannot accept all his doctrines, I am compelled to admit that his morals were invariably of the purest order. I do not remember that in the course of his half century of teaching he required one thing that was wrong or foolish. He did not command his followers to hate their parents, their children, their wives, their brothers and sisters; he did not require them to cut off their right hands, to pluck out their eyes, to reward theft. He did not preach that idleness and indolence, taking no thought for the morrow—is better than industry, thrift, enterprise, making suitable efforts to provide for winter, for old age, or a visitation of sickness and want. He did not praise up the uses of the sword, and command his disciples to sell their garments and buy swords. He did not show a disposition to have those slain who would not that he should reign over them; he did not say those who could not believe must be damned; he did not curse cities that refused to receive him; he did not instruct his disciples to take other people's asses or other property; he did not threaten to deny and curse those who denied him; he did not claim that if persons believed upon him they could handle poisonous serpents and drink any deadly poison without harm; he did not promise his disciples that they should have whatever they asked for, believing; he did not choose a bad, wicked man for a disciple; he did not demand that his followers should be perfect; he did not insult or speak harshly to his own mother; he did not assure his followers that they should be able to remove mountains by a word; he gave no assurance that God as his father would give whatever asked for; he called no one a liar without being able to prove it; he did not show cowardice, nor falter in the discharge of his duty; he did not pluck corn belonging to others; he did not favor the binding hand and foot, and casting into outer darkness a man who had no wedding garment; he was not timid nor cowardly at the hour of death. According to the account Jesus did all these, and consequently candor requires the admission that Buddha taught the best morals and performed the most faultless deeds. It is true Jesus is credited with uttering excellent maxims and morals (with several exceptions). His Sermon on the Mount contains many moral beauties. But the great drawback with that sermon is the great doubt about its being delivered. Matthew is the only one who mentions a Sermon on the Mount, and he was not present when it was delivered, so that admitting that the first gospel was written by Matthew, a great question must exist about his being able to report a sermon which was delivered before he was called to be a disciple, and when he was far away. Confidence is further shaken in the correctness of that report, as the others say nothing about it. But still further, when we find that the reporter was not even Matthew, whom he pretended to be, but some unknown person more than a hundred and fifty years after, every particle of confidence has flown away. It is impossible to believe that the report can be truthful, or even that such a sermon was delivered. But as to Buddha's moral teachings there can be but one opinion—they were the best that have ever been uttered, and in this opinion the ablest men of our age agree.

Max Muller says, "The moral code preached by Buddha is one of the most perfect the world has ever seen."

Mr. P. Horder, at the head of the Public Institution Department in Burmah, says, "Buddhists are guided by precepts older and not less noble than those of Jesus."

Klaproth says, "Their scriptures tend to elevate the human race, and have changed savages into amiable men."

Rev. Spence Hardy says, "Their ethics can hardly be equaled."

Rev. M. A. Sherrington says, "Buddha was a philosopher, a calm disputant, employing no physical force, whilst his morality was the purest the world ever saw."

It would be pleasant to quote many of his excellent sayings, but you are familiar with them, and time will not permit.

6. As to which endured the most temptation, it is only necessary to remember that it is not claimed for Jesus that he passed but forty days in fasting and temptation, while Buddha's stage of the same description lasted for years. Not another word need be said.

7. As to the number of followers to be claimed for each, I have already shown that those of Buddha exceed those of Jesus two to one.

8. I will admit that they are equally loved by their followers.

9. They also stand equal on the truth point.

Now let us examine some of the points of difference between the two teachers, and between the conduct of these followers There are perhaps as many points of difference as of similarity, but I cannot notice all of them; a few must suffice:

1. Buddha strictly enjoined temperance. He said, "Man is naturally intoxicated, and ought not therefore to use intoxicating drinks." Among the strict rules laid down for the guidance of his followers was one to use no intoxicating liquors. Jesus said nothing of this kind, but on the other hand he encouraged drinkers by making wine for them when already pretty intoxicated.

2. Buddha enjoined great kindness to animals, and forbade the taking of animal life. There was never a man who showed such a tender sympathy and such great carefulness for the animal kindgdom. Jesus did nothing of the kind.

3. Buddha was a philosopher and to a great extent a scientist. He penetrated more deeply into the nature of all existences, of cause and effect, of conduct and consequences, than almost any other man with whom the world is acquainted. His system has justly been termed one of philosophy rather than one of belief or religion. With Jesus the opposite is the case. He did not exhibit a philosophical mind. Scarcely an utterance of his showed philosophical thought. His leading characteristics were impulse, faith, and religion. His system is strictly one of religion, not of science or philosophy. I do not think he brought one scientific fact to light, or indicated a single scientific thought. Some of his advocates are now trying to reconcile his system with the teachings of science, but it is a task very hard of accomplishment. He gave not one scientific maxim; he taught not one scientific lesson; he knew few or no scientific truths; he knew not that the sun is the center of the solar system; he knew not that the earth is a sphere, and revolves round the sun; he knew nothing of the power of steam, of light, of magnetism, of electricity, of the science of chemistry, of geology, of astronomy, of mathematics; he knew nothing of the art of printing. A person at this age of the world with no more knowledge would be regarded as an ignorant person.

4. Buddha taught the existence of no being called the devil which Jesus and his followers so strongly believed in. He may have thought there are existences not good and pure, but he had in his system no head devil, always working in opposition to the good deity. Jesus did. He had a great deal to say about this devil, and much of his attention was devoted to casting out this devil or his minions from the human beings into whom he found entrance. Every case of insanity, of aberration of mind, was to him a devil. We now understand the error of this belief. Insanity is known to arise from other causes than the entrance of devils into human organizations. In this respect there was great difference between the doctrins of Buddha and Jesus.

5. Buddha recognized the great, ever-existing principles of nature, the eternality of matter and force, the unchangeable nature of cause and effect. He did not believe in the existence of a fickle, whimsical, personal God who superintends and operates all the events in the world. On the other hand, Jesus seemed not to comprehend the great laws of nature, but seemed to think a personal deity attended to everything that takes place even to the descent of rain and the falling of a sparrow.

6. Jesus laid great stress upon the importance of prayer to this personal God, and commanded that it be done with great frequency. Buddha not believing in such a personal God, could not believe in the efficacy of prayer to that which has no existence. His great confidence was in effort, in labor, and in strict physical and mental culture. In this direction he has excelled all other men who have lived. Jesus did not distinguish himself in that way.

7. Jesus believed in miracles and in supernaturalism. He thought his personal God often interfered, superseding the laws of nature, and did things wholly unnatural. Judaism and Christianity are wholly based on this doctrine of miracles. Indeed, if their claims and doctrines are true, a series of miracles have been performed for thousands of years; creation was a miracle, the government of the world is continued miracles; in fact, if a supernatural providence governs this world's events, millions of miracles have to be performed every day. Buddha was a naturalist, not a supernaturalist. With him eternal law and eternal causes were paramount to all else. He had no belief that events are the result of the whim of any being.

I need not pursue this subject any farther, but I must call your attention to the great and distinguishing difference between the actions and conduct of the followers of these two great teachers in the dissemination of their opinions among men, and toward those who do not accept their doctrines. Here exists the greatest difference of all. Buddha did not say "Whosoever believeth not shall be damned." He showed no disposition to damn anybody, whether they believed or not. Neither have his followers ever tried to crowd his doctrines upon the world by force or by oppression; and neither have they used cruelty or persecution toward those who have not accepted their views. I have never heard of a single instance where they have persecuted for opinion's sake. Buddhism is the only great religion in the world which has not resorted to persecution. Its record is clear and unsullied. Oh, happy would it be for the world, grateful would it have been to the millions who have suffered indescribable agony, could the same be truthfully said of Christianity! But oh, what a dark and bloody record is inscribed on the pages of history with respect to the conduct of that church. I cannot refer to a tithe of it. Beginning with its first great general, Constantine, who spread Christianity by shedding rivers of human blood, following down to Charlemagne, who visited the principal nations of Europe, compelling them to accept Christianity and its rites at the point of the sword and to save their lives, putting on one occasion one thousand persons to death because they would not be baptized, we come to the bloody and sickening wars of the Crusades, inaugurated by Christians for the purpose of driving a rival system of religion from what they called the Holy Land. These wars, which were continued for many many years, were called "holy wars," but, my friends, they were the most unholy wars and the most useless of any wars waged. In these cruel, cruel wars and in their consequence tens of millions of the lives of human beings were wasted, and rivers of human blood were made to saturate the earth. This is all true, too true! But, thanks to the doctrines of your great teacher and the practices of his followers, no such curse rests upon Brahmanism. It has built no inquisitions, it has had no subterranean religious dungeons which thousands of men and women have been thrust into at all hours of the night and day upon charges of which they were innocent and entirely ignorant. It has not burnt men and women at the stake for not holding the right sort of opinions; it has had no beheading-block; it has broken no bones; it has sundered no joints; it has pulled out no tongues; it has used no racks; it has not filled the human flesh with burning splinters of pitch; it has used no crushing iron boots; it has used no diabolical pincers, no pullies, no infernal machines of any kind to force people to accept their doctrines nor to punish them for disbelieving them. Christianity has done all of this hundreds and thousands of times over, until the mind grows sick and faint in the contemplation of such horrors.

I could tell you how the Christian church persecuted the Waldenses, drove them from their homes, dashed them from rocks, threw them from precipices, pulled out their tongues, hung them up in all conceivable attitudes and cruel positions, smothered them in caves, and put thousands upon thuosands to agonizing deaths of the most heartrending character. I could tell you how the church pursued the same bloody and cruel course toward the Albigenses, and how ten, twenty, fifty, and a hundred thousand innocent men and women were most cruelly murdered because they had the temerity to vary their religious belief in a very slight degree from the line the church prescribed. I could tell you of the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day in France, when sixty thousand people were put to death within three days in Paris alone by Christians, and where one hundred thousand were put to death over France. I could relate to you how the Christian butcher Alva roamed over the Netherlands and put fifty thousand persons to death in the name of the Christian religion. I could picture to you the bloody deeds of the Christian sovereign Charles of Spain, who carried the sword of Christianity and the persecuting implements to tens of thousands of homes. I could narrate to you how millions of hapless and wretched human beings were tortured and put to death in Europe in the interest of Christianity, charged with being witches and having devils! How these poor beings were torn from friends and home, kept for days without food and sleep until really insane when they were put to death in the name of the Christian religion! I could hold you for an hour detailing persecutions in the name of religion in Christian England, Scotland, and Ireland, Catholics torturing and killing Protestants, and Protestants torturing and killing Catholics wherever they had the power; and could give you almost an endless number of instances where the most revolting and terrible deeds were done in the interest of Christianity, but I have already detained you too long, and I cannot think you have any fondness for hearing of such bloody deeds. But all this and more, hundreds of times more, has been done in the name of Christianity, and still you and the world are asked to believe that it is a "religion of love." Oh, had there been far less of this kind of love in the world, better, far better, would it have been for its inhabitants!

But let us drop this subject. It is a most sickening and horrible picture. Let us for a moment look at something more pleasant.

But before leaving this field of murder and blood let me say that in taking a fair view of the record of what Buddhism and Christianity have done in the world, I cannot see that you have any good reason for giving up your religion and adopting Christianity in its place. You assuredly would by so doing have no better morals and no better record for good conduct. If the Christian nations have a superiority over the Asiatic nations in point of enterprise, progress, and civilization, it depends far more upon race and education than upon religion. Their religion is not better than yours. I have often thought what a blessing to the world it would have been when the nations of Europe embraced the Christian religion had they chosen the religion of Buddha instead. Could his doctrines of peace and love of humanity, of inoffensive lives and spotless conduct, have been honestly lived up to in place of the horrors of which I have mentioned a part, what an infinite blessing it would have been to the race. If western energy and enterprise could have been blended with your deep philosophy and pure morals of the East far better would it have been for us all. At all events, I cannot see that you have anything to gain by throwing away the teachings of Buddha and taking those of any other person instead.

I would like to tell you about what the Freethinkers of Europe and America are doing. I am proud that it is my privilege to work in co-operation with them. We are trying to do good to our fellow-beings. We are endeavoring to give our brothers and sisters the truths of nature and science. We are not only striving to tear down the castles of superstition and error, but we are toiling to erect temples of truth. We are trying to spread truth and knowledge everywhere; and I am glad to be able to assure you that truth and reason are gaining ground with us. The teachers of science and nature's laws are busily at work, and they find many studious and anxious pupils who desire to know more of themselves and of nature's laws and requirements.

The belief in supernaturalism, in gods and devils, is giving way. The more we know of nature the less we believe in gods and devils. We are fully determined to press on in the pathway of truth. We feel that you are our brothers, and that there is a strong bond of union between us. We feel great sympathy with the philosophy of Buddha and the principles you love. We may disagree a trifle on some points; we may not fully comprehend and accept the doctrines of "Karma" and "Nirvana," but in the main we can walk hand in hand, and we recognize you as comparative Freethinkers, while we are comparative Buddhists. You believe in the doctrine of love and progress; so do we. You believe in the brotherhood of man; so do we. You believe in the good results of good conduct, of a good moral life; so do we. You believe in the eternal principles and powers of nature; so do we. You believe in no fickle, cruel, torturing, personal God, who delights in afflicting his creatures; neither do we. Yes, I feel that we are much alike; that our cause is the same, and that our work should be in the same direction. Let us join hands and be firm and true friends. Let us co-operate to make this world better as much as we can, and to progress in the cause of truth. You, the followers of Buddha, in all Asia number about 500,000,000. The Freethinkers, and the scientists, and the Spiritualists, and the naturalists of Europe and America number not less than 10,000,000 more, and we are gaining. United, we equal the combined advocates of the two systems of supernatural religion, Christianity and Mohammedanism. We are nearly half the population of the globe, and let us hope we possess our full share of honest morality and intelligence. Let us strive to move forward. Let us learn more and do more and more good. Let us unite our efforts forever in this glorious search after truth, and the opposition to error.

And now, with your permission, I will say a parting word. There is one desire stongly impressed upon my mind. I wish to see the Buddhists of Asia take a forward step of reform in two or three particulars. I fear in the centuries that have passed some errors have crept into your religion, not authorized by your great teacher. I allude particularly to the use of images and the treatment of woman. I would rejoice to see all images done away with among you. They are of no benefit to you; you do not require them to make you remember Buddha's teachings. You have too much intelligence, you have too pure a religion to require them, and they are a reproach to you. I know that Christians have them in great numbers, but that is no excuse for you. Oh, revere and worship truth and not images! By taking this step you will place yourselves better before the world, and your religion will take a higher stand.

I much wish to say a word in behalf of woman, and want to urge you to emancipate her and elevate her. The wives, the mothers, the sisters, and the daughters of this world are an important half of this world's population. Nature is as much female as male; so is the world. The more intelligent the mothers are the more intelligent will be their offspring. Let me urge you to give your women more education, more equality, more happiness. They will be better companions for you and better mothers for your children. Send your girls to school as much as your boys. Educate both. Give your daughters as much liberty as your sons. Give your wives equality in social and other positions. Take them with you when you go abroad—when you go to meetings, to places of amusement, and to places of pleasure. Make them equal at home, equal abroad, equal everywhere. They will be none the less chaste and virtuous on account of it. You will love them more and they will love you more. I wish your priests would move in this matter. I wish when I return to my native land to be able to say to my friends that reforms are being inaugurated among our Buddhistic brothers; that the priest are leading in the matter, and that good will be sure to come out of it. Even before the close of the present year some steps should be taken in this direction.

My last word is, Return to the pure morals and the sound philosophy of your great teacher; discard whatever errors may have crept in among you, and you will truly be among the grandest people on earth. Co-operate with Col. Olcott and the Theosophical Society, whose march is in the right direction, and I am sure your lives will be spent in doing good, and that a rich reward will crown your efforts.

I thank you for your kind attention.

VISIT TO A PANSALA.

After the lecture the high priest invited me to pay him a visit the next day to his residence, which invitation I accepted and duly attended to, two or three friends accompanying me. The residence of priests is called a pansala, and in this commodious building several usually live together somewhat like monks. No priest is allowed to have a wife. If he is a married man and wishes to become a priest he has to dissolve the marriage relation and live no more with his wife. On the other hand, if a priest becomes tired of the austerities of the priesthood and wishes to follow the ordinary custom of the world, he is at liberty to do so, though I am told these cases are not numerous.

The pansala of the high priest of Colombo is a very pleasant home. The grounds comprise a few acres, and beside the residence is a college for the education of young priests, of whom, I think, he has some thirty with him steadily, besides others who go there to take lessons. To become a priest requires a great deal of study, particularly of the teachings of Buddha and the voluminous commentaries upon them. As these are all in the Pali language, which is no longer a living language, that aslo has to be thoroughly studied. It takes seven years, as the high priest informed me, for a young man to complete his studies and become fitted to act as priest. This property, if I remember correctly, was partly donated by some rich person or rajah for the purposes of a college, and the government have also aided the enterprise, but just to what extent I will not attempt to say. The buildings are good, and the place wears the air of comfort. The library building is light, spacious, and rich. The high priest kindly showed me through it. On the first floor are the European works, principally in English, which they deem it necessary to keep. I noticed among them cyclopedias, histories, dictionaries, etc. It looked familiar to see "Webster's Unabridged" lying upon the table. I was, however, more interested with the Buddhistic books on the second floor. The teachings of Buddha and the numerous commentaries upon them are all inscribed by hand upon the leaves of the Palmyra palm, much in style of the first copy of Buddha's teachings ever written. I had often heard of palm-leaf books, and of writing being done upon palm leaf, and I was particularly glad to see the books.

PALM-LEAF BOOKS.

The leaves of the palm are about thirty inches in length and two inches or two and a half in width; these are gathered from the tree at the proper time, and are made smooth by rubbing and rolling them—perhaps a process like sandpapering. They are made precisely of a length and width, so the edges may be gilded or colored as desired. A hole is made about one-fourth the distance from each end of the leaves, and through this cords pass—somewhat as in Venetian blinds—which hold the leaves in their places, and prevent their becoming disarranged. On the outside is what may be called the cover, which probably is made of wood or other suitable material, just the length and width of the leaves, and neatly painted, gilded, and decorated. The cords are wrapped around the cases or covers, so each book is always together and in place, and it is often kept in a neat box or outside case, when the book is of large size. The number of leaves or pages varies from five hundred to two thousand. These fit very compactly together; they are about as thick as heavy book paper, and far more durable. These palm leaves will last for hundreds of years with almost steady handling. Many Buddhistic books are in existence one and two thousand years old. Had they been paper they would have been entirely worn out.

The inscribing on these strips of palm leaf is done by hand with a stylus, which is an instrument with a dull steel point, like a needle with the point cut off, and with a metal handle ten inches in length, so it is very much heavier than a pen. The stylus makes an impression into the surface of the palm leaf, and, when the page is completed, a mixture of lampblack and oil (like black paint) is rubbed over the surface, and then wiped off with a cloth; this leaves the letters black, while the surface is as free from ink as before. In this way the letters are as black as our print, and as easily read. The copyist is an artist; he puts the same number of lines on a page, and the same number of words and letters in a line as in the book from which he copies; and when he is done his labor is a perfect transcript in every particular of the book from which he worked. The inscribing is done as rapidly as writing with which some pains is taken. I have seen copyists at work, and was surprised to see how rapidly and neatly they accomplished their labor. The lines run lengthwise with the leaf, which has lines sufficiently distinct to be followed without the necessity of ruling.

The lines are quite straight and a good distance apart. Thus these books are very neat, durable, and far more compact than I supposed. They occupy but little more space than large works do with us, but are of different shape. When put away in the book-cases they look as neat as any library, but of course quite different from ours.

I was shown some large books executed in Burmah, very rich and expensive, which were a present to the college by the king of Burmah; also the teachings of Buddha. The leaves are about twice the width of the palm leaf, and are of the bark of some tree, prepared most neatly, made perfectly smooth, and the edges and covers richly gilt, with precious stones set in the latter. The letters in these books were not made with a stylus, but look as though painted on with a small brush, and a black paint having much varnish in it, for the letters had considerable breadth and shone like a varnished surface. The work was executed with wonderful neatness and skill, and, as one volume had nearly a thousand leaves, must have taken a great amount of time to accomplish it. Thus, the teachings of Buddha and the commentaries are all copied by hand, and in the original Pali. His works are not printed and placed in the hands of the people, neither are they often copied in the Singalese language, but are kept in the original language, and in the hands of the priests, who have a monopoly of them. This I did not approve of, and I said to several of the friends that Buddha's moral teachings should be printed in cheap book form, and put within the reach of every individual in the country, so that at any and at all times, if they wished to read the sayings of their great teacher, they could do so, the same as Christians do by the sayings of their great teacher. I said if this was done, but few priests would be needed, and the expense of supporting five thousand priests in Ceylon alone would be saved. I said, also, that it was a puzzle to me what Buddhists want of so many priests; they have no god to pray to; they have no big devil to be saved from; they have no miracles to be performed, nor anything of the kind, and to me such numbers of priests seemed a useless superfluity. I said with Christians it is different; they have a god, who every day must be advised and directed as to how he ought to run this universe, and that nobody knew how to perform this kind of service so well as priests; and, again, they have to visit the sisters through the week, and see that they are duly supplied with the Holy Ghost, while on Sundays they have a sermon or two to get off to their flocks; so, upon the whole, they have considerable to attend to; but your priests here seem not to be needed. The most they do is to tell the people what Buddha taught; and if every person had a copy of Buddha's instructions the priests could be dispensed with, and the good time hastened on, when every man will become his own priest.

I did not quite say that to the high priest, for I was his guest, and it would be impolite to offend him in his own home; but I said it to several who I thought possessed the influence and ability to gradually inaugurate a change. The teachings of Buddha are very voluminous. Holding a volume of four hundred pages in my hand, I put the question to the high priest which I had asked before—"How many volumes the size of that would the teachings of Buddha make, aside from the commentaries upon them?" He studied over the matter a little while, replying that they would make fifty or sixty; and when I looked over the mass of volumes before me, I could hardly doubt it. So it can be seen at a glance how much more the teachings of Buddha amounted to than those of Jesus, whose sayings, though given four times over, comprised only some sixty pages. Buddha's metaphysical doctrines alone amount to a hundred times as much as all that is attributed to Jesus.

I sat down in the library, and, through an interpreter, the high priest and myself held a conversation of over half an hour; I asking him several questions, and he putting some to me. He wished to inquire some about Freethought, and what Freethinkers are doing. I was pleased to give him this information. He is a man of good intelligence and extensive learning, though, as with all the priests here, principally in their own particular line. It occurred to me that they ought to study something besides Buddha. Admitting that he was one of the greatest teachers, and his one of the propoundest minds that ever existed, there have been other great men who have uttered most valuable truths, and there is much other education in the world which they ought to understand. They ought to know more of modern or Western science and education. In its way, it is as valuable as the sayings of Buddha. But my visit to the high priest was a pleasant one, and I left him with the conviction that according to his light he is a very worthy man. His name is Hikkaduwe Sri Sumangala, principal of the Widyodaya College.

On the evening of the same day (Friday), by request, I addressed an audience at the hall of the society upon the subject of the education and elevation of woman. I had talked with some of the friends, and took the liberty to tell them that I thought they should make a reform in their treatment of the opposite sex. I had been in several houses, and I noticed that from custom, or exceeding modesty on the part of the women, I was never introduced to them, and they did not come in sight as the women do in our country. I saw that the women were kept too much in the background, and I freely expressed the opinion that they should inaugurate a change. Some of the good friends fell in with my suggestions and thought they had not been doing quite right in the matter, and wished me to speak to an audience of women and try to awaken in them an interest in education, lectures, public meetings, etc. Of course I was willing to do what I could. The audience was composed of both women and men, and the hall was well filled. It was interpreted as before and by the same person.

I endeavored to show them that the highest state of civilization and the happiest condition of society depended upon male and female being equal, and going forward hand in hand in every good work. I tried to show that woman fell short of performing her duty in life if she did not make an effort to cultivate her mind and to be interested in all questions which concerned the two sexes in common. I gave it as my opinion that girls should be educated as well as the boys, that they should be fitted for the responsible positions in life in which the mind has to work as well as the body; that the women of Ceylon would perform their duty better, they would be happier and their husbands would be happier if they, the women, would become interested in the same mental topics, the same subjects of reform, the same means to elevate the race that interested their husbands; be willing to attend instructive lectures, and to improve their minds in every way they could.

I cited to them what woman has accomplished in various ages of the world. I told them of Aspasia and the intellectual women of Greece. I talked to them of the grand matrons of Rome, and came down to our own times. I told them of what Mrs. Besant is doing in England, of the editorial work she performs, of the numerous books she has written, of the many lectures she delivers, of her almost unheard of prosecution of scientific studies. I told them of what many women in my own country were doing, of the many that were acting as public teachers and lecturers, of the eloquence many of them displayed, of the number of female authors, editors, writers in the various departments of literature, of the numbers who had fitted themselves as physicians and lawyers, and that it all went to prove that woman is capable in mental capacity of doing almost everything done by man; that when they resolved to make the effort they were pretty sure of accomplishing; that many of them were becoming as distinguished in the world as men, and that men did not love them the less for it, but the more. The more the mind is improved, whether male or female, the more lovable and the more estimable they become. I said it is all a mistake that men should be learned and women ignorant. Women have brains as well as men, and they should be be cultivated and improved as carefully.

The more intellectual women become the better companions they are, the better wives and mothers they make. The more intellectual the mother, the more intellectual the children will be. The mothers have much to do in forming the character of the people of the world, and they should be fitted for it in the best possible manner.

I brought the matter home to them and showed them that the world is moving forward, and they should feel anxious not to be left behind; that there is now more general intelligence diffused among the women of the world than in any previous age, and that the world would inevitably be improved by it. And while this reform was taking place in other parts of the world the women of Ceylon should also have a part in it. In closing I urged them to begin to move in this matter, to drop to some extent the old course they had always pursued, to insist upon going with their husbands to lectures and meetings, and to interest themselves in what interested their husbands and male friends. I tried to convince them if they never began they would never accomplish anything, and that they should not defer it longer.

The women present seemed to pay close attention to my remarks, and two or three came to speak to me after I had finished who looked as though they wished it was different with them; but I fear the change will be very slow. The people of the East are greatly the slaves of custom, and they seem illy calculated to show the enterprise and activity evinced in the West. I was introduced to Mrs. Andrew Perera, whose husband is the president of the society, and one of the most progressive men in Ceylon. I regretted she cannot speak English, for she sesms a very pleasant woman, and I wished to impress upon her mind the importance of some prominent woman moving in this manner. I said—and the interpreter put it into Singalese—that I hoped she would co-operate with her husband in the good work in which he is engaged, try to induce other women to join her, and above all be sure and attend the meetings of the society, especially when lectures were delivered. She gave me a promise that she would do so, but I fear it was rather faint. It seems like an immense struggle for her to throw off the customs of the past.

On Saturday, the 25th, fried De Silva accompanied me to Panadure, nearly twenty miles on the railway toward Galle. They had applied there for me to visit them and give a lecture, but upon arriving there I found that it had not been advertised, and that no audience was in attendance. I, however, had a good drink of cocoanut water, had a good visit with the priests in their pansala, looked at the temple and dagoba, looked at the very large bo-tree growing there (the same kind of sacred tree under which Buddha sat and under which he attained his Buddhahood), and rode by carriage out into the country where a rich native, a Mudaliar, is erecting a large dagoba a hundred feet tall and a hundred feet in diameter at the base. It is of about the same use as a pyramid, a showy and expensive place in which to deposit some relic, where the faithful can visit at stated periods and make their offerings. This, like most others, is round, conical in shape, with a cupola or altar on the top. The one visited costs much money, but the Mudaliar is wealthy and can afford it. We called at his residence hard by, but as he was ill we did not see him. Several large meetings have been held at the dagoba, where a large temporary structure for the purpose has been erected.

Of the temple in the village, Rankoth Vihare, a little should be said. It is noted for its wealth and architectural beauty. Its roomy monastery, commodious school-house, and well-furnished library and magnificent temple, with its fresco paintings of the fatakas and other ornamental works, and the images of Buddha in standing, sitting, and recumbent postures, are perhaps not excelled upon the island for symmetry of figure and chaste execution; and the stupendous dagoba, with its crown of gold-plated brass (which cost in London fifteen hundred rupees), prized both as a work of art and as enshrining great wealth in books (inscribed on gold and silver), relics of Buddha and many a rahat (saint) and other treasures held sacred by Buddhists, invite the attention of the sight-seer and the lover of art. The large bo-tree in part shades the temple.

The high priest in charge here is Weligame Siri Sumangala, said to be one of the most learned priests in Ceylon. I was invited into the pansala and had a conversation with one of the venerable priests on the subject of Buddhism. It was arranged at this interview that if I would visit their town again on the following Monday night they would have the notice duly circulated and an audience would be ready to hear me. With that understanding we returned to Colombo.

On the evening of the same day I spoke in the hall in Colombo to a very good audience of people who understand English, so it was not interpreted. Several Europeans were present, and many who are called "burghers," the descendants of the Dutch and other Europeans born in the country. I gave some account of my journey, especially in Palestine and Egypt, and made some strictures on the Christian religion. I am afraid I was not extremely complimentary toward that system of religion, for I noticed there were some tender-skinned Christians present who did not like my remarks well enough to stay and hear them out. But that a large portion of the audience appreciated what I had to say I had good reason to know. Some very complimentary observations were made by several of those present, and a warm vote of thanks given me.

On the next morning (Sunday) I took the train for Kandy, seventy-two miles east of Colombo, and the ancient native capital of the island. The friends there were expecting me, and I wished, of course, to see some of the interior of the country. For some thirty miles the country is level, the vegetation luxuriant, and much of the character before described, save that a large share of the low lands are rice fields, though the crop has been harvested. Rice is grown largely under water, and the fields, even if but little out of level, are terraced and dammed so that the water will stand alike over the entire level, and run from the higher beds to those next lower, and so on. I saw thousands of acres fixed in this way, and even where the ground is tolerably steep, so as to hold the water, and to have it run from one part to another. Many of the fields thus terraced look like large amphitheaters, with elevated seats or terraces around. The native name for rice is paddy, a name not hard to remember, for it has a familiar sound. Paddy is a most important crop in Ceylon, as the people use that far more than any other kind of food. Though immense quantities are grown here, considerable has to be imported in addition to feed the nearly three millions of people of the island. No wheat is grown upon the island; it lies too near the equator for that, the southern part being but six degrees from it.

I judge the soil of Ceylon is not extremely rich, but the weather is so warm, and the rain so frequent, that the climate is a forcing one, and the vegetation most luxuriant. After reaching the higher lands the class of vegetation gradually changes, other forest trees taking the place of the cocoanut. I also passed many coffee plantations and fields of cinchona. Some coffee fields, proving no longer fertile enough, have been abandoned and allowed to grow up in whatever wild growth pleases to come in. As the road begins to climb the high grounds the scenery becomes picturesque and grand. Our way wound around among the hills, steadily ascending, going through several tunnels, passing on the sides of steep hills, where one can look away down, down on one side, and away up, up, up on the other to the top of some peak two thousand feet above you.

Kandy is nearly six thousand feet higher than Colombo, so you can readily understand we had to do some climbing. The higher peaks on the island are nine thousand feet above the sea, so after we got among the mountains it can be understood that we must have had grand views. I found, too, that the temperature moderated as we rose in the world, it being considerably cooler at Kandy than at Colombo.

Upon arriving at the station in Kandy, I found several friends in waiting with a carriage for me to ride in. I was taken to a hotel, where a suite of rooms were provided for me, and they wished to know what was my pleasure. I said I wished to see their town and the country around, what I could, and as to my services, they were at their command. It seemed they had arranged for me to speak at 2:30 P. M. I have the same report to make here as at Galle and Colombo; the friends were extremely kind and genial, and had I been ten times the man I am they could hardly have done more.

This Sunday lecture was an out-door affair. I was stationed on a wide wall, in front of the Mollegow Buddhistic temple, with my audience some ten or twelve feet below me. Next beyond was a fine square of green grass, then a beautiful artificial lake, covering a hundred acres or so, surrounded by pleasant residences, blessed with an exuberance of foliage and flowers, and back of that smoothly arose a majestic mountain, surmounted by three domes or peaks, perhaps two thousand feet higher than where I stood; while behind me, on the opposite side of the town, rose most picturesque hills, affording magnificent views, with gardens and pleasure grounds beautiful to behold. I thought the surroundings ought to be sufficient to inspire me to make a good speech, but probably it was not qual to the place. I had a good large audience, and among them twenty priests with the yellow robes. I spoke an hour and a-half, and my remarks were interpreted by a school teacher, M. Silva Babewanlerdava. I spoke without notes, as I have done in all cases except the first, but pursued a similar subject as in my first lecture at Colombo. Whether good or bad, it gave full satisfaction to those who heard me. A priest succeeded me, and held the audience for another hour. It is easy to see that it pleases both the priests and all the others to have their own religion shown to be superior to Christianity, and this is not hard to do. The facts only have to be stated to make the truth apparent.

After speaking I climbed the hill in the rear of where I stood and greatly enjoyed the beautiful valley and town spread out before me like a panorama. Kandy is beautifully situated, nestling among the hills on all sides, and is one of the prettiest places I have seen.

After my evening meal I visited the Mollegow temple, one of the most sacred places to the Buddhists on the island. As I approached the entrance I heard the measured beating of a drum, which, together with the blowing of a horn, constitutes a part of the worship. Several friends accompanied me, and we were admitted into the small apartment containing the shrine of the relics. Here is said to be deposited one of Buddha's teeth, with some other relics which I have forgotten. The same are kept in a golden shrine or place of deposit, the gold and silver in it weighing two hundred pounds. It is of rather curious workmanship. Before this shrine, on a table covered with silver, flowers are spread to the memory of Buddha. The flowers were largely tube roses, and several bushels of the blossoms were provided for the purpose. I thought I had respect enough for the pure life and excellent morals of Buddha to justify my spreading some tube rose blossoms on the table before me. There is certainly no harm in such beautiful and odorous blossoms, nor in spreading them around, so I spread some of these flowers in memory of Buddha. It may be called worship. Well, call it by what name you please, I spread the flowers.

Several priests were in attendance, and among them the high priest of Kandy and that part of Ceylon. He outranks the high priest of Colombo and of Galle. He showed much attention to me, and caused some very valuable gold vessels of various kinds and sizes to be brought forth from their places, to be uncovered and shown me. Some of them have settings of precious stones of great value, and are heavy with pure gold. They are the presents of the old Kandian kings who once had their thrones in this city. The high priest said they did not show those valuables very often, but they looked upon me as a special friend, and he was only too glad to show me all the respect possible. I duly appreciated their kindness, though I must confess that the reverence evinced for Buddha's tooth and the golden vessels seemed too much like the veneration which so many European Christians show for pieces of the cross which Jesus was crucified upon, the spikes that fastened him to the same, as well as the handkerchief which St. Veronica lent him to wipe the profuse prespiration from his face. I would give more for the knowledge of one true science, one important fact in nature, than all the relics that could be piled up on a large barn floor.

After looking at the golden vessels, and taking them in my hands to my heart's content, I was led to another part of the temple, where there are several images of Buddha, one reclining and several sitting, some of precious metals, one of crystal from Burmah or Siam, almost as transparent as glass. A light placed behind it illuminated it curiously. Here were more flowers, considerable kneeling before the figures, and I must acknowledge it smacked too much of image-worship to just suit my notions. I should prefer to see more intelligent understanding of nature's laws and forces, in place of so much blind veneration for a person or the image of that person.

I was next shown the library of Buddhistic books, inscribed, like those I saw at Colombo, on leaves of the palm. Here were also some very rare and neatly executed works from Siam, presented to this temple. This collection of Buddhistic works is large and rich. But as I retired from the building I heard the tom-tom beating, the horn sounding, and other noises made which sounded to me like absurdity. Those contribute to the mode of worship here, as much as the organ and other appurtenances in Christian worship. It is, perhaps, because I am not spiritual-minded or worshipfully inclined that I cannot duly appreciate them.

On the next morning (Monday) I left on the 7:15 train for Nawalapitiya, a town some twenty-eight miles in a southeast direction. I was accompanied by Geo. Frederick Werasekera, who lives at the town just named, and who had gone to Kandy to request me to visit his town, and talk some to his people. The railway leads through a very interesting country of high hills and deep valleys, with a profusion of tea-gardens and coffee-fields. The coffee-tree is a neat, trim-looking tree of small size; it will grow fifteen feet high, but is usually kept cut back to about five feet, and some six feet apart each way. The coffee grows in a pulp or kind of fruit, and it must be quite a little labor to gather it, free it from the pulp and dry it for market; but there are plenty of people here to do the work. The crop has been gathered. I could say much about the beauties of this ride, but perhaps you can understand that Ceylon is made up of beautiful and picturesque scenery. Mountains can hardly be otherwise than interesting. I watch the farming operations with special care, and conclude the plantations here are not excessively large, but divided into small lots. I see some meadow ground, but the grass is different from anything we have. I judge the grass is cut with a sickle, or with a heavy crooked knife, used with one hand with a striking blow.

When we reached the station a carriage was in waiting for me, and I was conveyed to my hotel with as much display as though I had been a prince. At 10.30 I addressed an audience of natives in which there were a few Europeans. Mr. Werasekera interpreted my remarks, which seemed to be well received, and continued about an hour and a half, when dinner, or "tiffin," was attended to. At 1 P.M. I took the return train, stopping at Gampola to address another audience, the interpreter being the same as on Sunday. We then returned to Kandy, where in the evening I addressed, at a speaking-place called Nata Dewule, a large audience in English, making three lectures that day, and in three different places. I did not know but I did about as well as political speakers sometimes do in election campaigns. I shall not say too much by claiming that my remarks in each place were well received, and a vote of thanks carried. Twenty priests attended my last lecture. Mr. Werasekara accompanied me back to Kandy.

On the following morning I rode out some three miles to the Royal Botanical Gardens, some fifty or one hundred acres in a fine display of tropical trees, shrubs, and flowers. It is doubtful if a finer collection of tropical trees is to be found anywhere. These gardens belonged to the kings of Kandy several hundred years ago, and many trees were planted there then that would be difficult now to procure. I wish I had a list of them, but have not. I remember there are sixty varieties of the palm, and others in proportion. I saw immense clusters of the bamboo, containing over a thousand poles two or three inches through and forty or fifty feet tall, and a bright yellow in color. What I have seen before have been dark. I think there are twelve varieties of bamboo in all. I saw two very large trees of the banyan family; they had some auxiliary besides, but their roots were the greatest curiosity; they grow principally on the top of the ground, and edgewise, fully two feet high and four inches thick, looking somewhat like very heavy joists or planks, standing on edge, and extending thirty feet or more from the base of the tree. The gardner, Mr. Ferdinandus, is a very intelligent man, and very kindly showed me around through the beautiful grounds.

At 2:30 I took a train for Colombo, arriving there a little after six, when a few friends joined me to accompany me to Panadure. At the appointed house of the lecture fully two thousand people had assembled, and I talked to them nearly two hours. The same interpreter served here as at my lectures in Colombo. The people seemed highly pleased with what I said to them. Besides a vote of thanks, two persons came to the stand and chanted to me several stanzas in Pali, composed for the occasion by two of the young priests in the pansala. Though extravagant, they give the reader an idea of the style of Indian composition:

Sarada sisisirakanti, hara diddhassawanti
Sarasija suradanti, singinikamadenti
Wara wisuta mahanti, seta muttungakitti
Chira manatu, sakanti, yan Bennett nama manti.

May the great, bright, famous, eminent, heroic, and patient Mr Bennett, who bears comparison to the bright moon of the autumn, to a pearl, the celestial river, a lotus, the heavenly elephant, and the wish-conferring cow of heaven, live long!

Wividha pachura witta, sajjanawasabhuta
Nijawisa yudayagga, bhatu Lankana bhango
Sajana nalina jato, milayanto nudanto
Parasamayata moghan, so Bennett nama sura.

May the sun Bennett, who is like unto a shelter that screens learned men, who dispelling the darkness of superstition, causing the blossoms of virtuous and true-hearted men to blow up their fine petals, and, rising from behind the udayagiri rock of America, his native country, appeared in the sky of fair Lanka (Ceylon), shine long!

Lasatu wara saro D. M. Bennett nama manti.

May Mr. D. M. Bennett, who is like unto a pond which is covered with the flowers of his members of face, hands, and legs, etc., which is interspread with lotuses of his eyes, which has the foamy bubbles of continual smiles, which is filled with the waters of generosity, which enjoys the melodious outpourings of praises of the birds of people, and which has a high shore of complaisance, shine long!

The following is by the priest who composed the foregoing poem, and was appended to the translation of the words:

Sansuddhasesa wara bharati hausi kilo
Sisanli pali lulito lapanara windo,
Suttunga kitti dhawalo kavi sekarabho,
Yopannawa Siri Samangala thera pado.

Sissolu sanga niwuto wiyaosadiso
Bhumitthi sekharika Panaturakyagame
Lakkhi sarojasama kanchana singaname
Aramake lasati tassa maha kavissa.

Pavdra sura nara wiwidha sukhadada pada, pankaja sundaro,
Wipulatara Gunaratana jalanidhi sasanambara, bhakaro
Lasati yati Gunaratana madhiwachanope tassacha terako
Ruchiratara tarunikara pariwuta wutta puddha wiharake.
